King Henry the Eighth.

Together with which is briefly represented
A General HISTORY of the Times.

Written by the Right Honourable Edward Lord Herbert of Cherbury.

IT is not easie to write that Prince's History, of whom no one thing may constantly be affirmed. Changing of Manners and Condition alters the coherence of Parts, which should give an uniform Description. Nor is it probable that Contradictories should agree to the same Person: So that nothing can shake the Credit of a Narration more, than if it grow unlike it self; when yet it may be not the Author, but the Argument caused the Variation. It is impossible to draw his Picture well who hath several Countenances.

I shall labour with this Difficulty in King Henry VIII. not so much for the general observation (among Politicks) that the Government of Princes rarely grows milder towards their latter end; but because this King in particular, (being about his declining Age, so diverse in many of his Desires, that he knew not well how either to command or obey them) interverted all, falling at last into such violent Courses, as in common Opinion derogated not a little from those Vertues which at first made him one of the most renowned Princes of Christendom.

His Education was accurate, being destined (as a credible Author affirms) to the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, during the Life of his elder Brother Prince Arthur; that prudent King his Father chusing this as the most cheap and glorious way for disposing of a younger Son. For as he at once disburnd his Revenues, and the Publick from the Charge incident to so great a Person, so he left a Passage open to Ambition; especially ever since Eugenius IV. had declared the Place of a Cardinal above all other in the Church. Besides, he consider'd it would be no little Security to his Posterity, that this Dignity was conferr'd on one who had Interest in the Conservation of the Crown. By these means not only the more necessary Parts of Learning were infus'd into him, but even those of Ornament; so that, besides his being an able Latinist, Philosopher and Divine, he was (which one might wonder at in a King) a curious Musician; as two intire Masses compos'd by him, and often sung in his Chappel, did abundantly witness. These were Qualities which invested in an excellent and well form'd Personage, made him every way recommendable. To which again, a great Courage and active Spirit being added, he seem'd to hold that strong Temper of Authority, which made him esteem'd and redoubt'd both at home and abroad. Had his Age answer'd his Youth, or Expectation, none of his Predecessors could have exceeded him; but as his exquisite Endowments of Nature engag'd him often to become a Prey of these Allurements and Temptations, which are ordinarily incident unto them; so his King Henry a good Latinist, Philosopher, Divine, and Musician.

He was Brave,

1509. Courage was observ'd by little and little to receive into it some mixture of Self-will and Cruelty.

But Obstinate and Cruel.

I am the more particular in his Description, for that Princes Actions are not always drawn from Reason of State, but sometimes even from Inclination and Humour. They have many ways to be Wise, and seldom err while they keep their Estate and Reputation. Nothing is so easie as to reign, if the Body of Government be well framed. Let the Counterpoises of Reward and Punishment go aright, the Wheels of this great Clock seldom fail. This King used both well as long as his Means and Complexion suffer'd him; though at last, passing these Bounds on either side, he cannot be denied to have fallen into divers Irregularities.

April 22.

The time of his Birth was June 28. 1491, and of his coming to the Crown April 22. 1509, when though he might be thought apter for Delights than Business; yet, as he follow'd the Advice of able Counsellors, fewer Errors were committed than when all things were sway'd by his own Arbitrement; for, as they were selected (out of those his Father most trusted) by the Countess of Richmond his Grand-mother, (noted to be a vertuous and prudent Lady) so he took their Impressions easily, both out of a diffidence of his own strength in the managing of the weighty Affairs of his Kingdom, and a desire he had to be free to those Exercises which most sort'd with his Youth and Disposition. And certainly it was a happy Conjunction for him, since, if the first part of Wisdom consist in an Ability to give good Counsel, the next is to take it; the Condition betwixt both being ever most obnoxious to Danger. But that their Names may be known to Posterity, I shall mention them as they are upon Record.

His Council.

William Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Lord Chancellor of England.

Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester, Secretary, and Lord Privy-Seal.

Thomas Howard, Earl of Surry, Lord Treasurer of England.

George Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, Lord Steward of the King's Household.

Sir Charles Somerset, Lord Herbert, of Gower, Chestow, and Rayland, Lord Chamberlain.

Sir Thomas Lovel, Master of the Wards, and Constable of the Tower.

Sir Henry Wyat.

Thomas Ruthall, Doctor of Law.

Sir Edward Poynings, Knight of the Garter, Controller.

* April 9.

Sir Henry Marney, * afterwards Lord Marney.

Sir Thomas Darcy, † afterwards Lord Darcy.

The frame of this Council was of Scholars chiefly, and Soldiers: Among the former sort I find the Archbishop Warham, much celebrated by the learned Erasmus; and of the latter kind, there will be divers mention'd with Honour, in the following History. So that their Choice proceeded rather from their sufficiency in the Business they were to discharge, and Care of that Authority they must support, than from any private Affection. Insomuch, that notwithstanding the high Reverence they bore to their Prince's Person, they were observ'd so to love the Prosperity of his Affairs, as they would not only impartially advise, but often modestly contest with him in any thing for his Good. Besides, among them (though not many) there were divers able to execute and perform as well as counsel. So that, without divulging any Secret, or descending from the Dignity of their Place, to require Advice from their Inferiors, they mov'd in their own Orb. This held up the Majesty of the Council. Only I find it strange, that among all these there was not so much as one that I may call stiled from the Common Law; which, though I cannot commend, (Wisdom evermore beginning at home) yet I doubt not was so temper'd, as, when any Difficulty in this kind did arise, the Counsel learned in the Law was sent for. However, it seems that King kept them at a distance towards the beginning of his Reign, though towards the middle and latter end I find some were (through their great Abilities) received into the Body of his Council; yet so, as the King was noted not to admit reason of Law every where; for reason of State: Therefore he us'd to take their Advice obliquely, and no otherwise than to discover how safe his own Designs were, and so with less danger to vary from them. Which Deviations yet he would so regulate, as his Actions at home had still, if not their ground, yet at least their pretext from the Common Law. Neither was it hard, the practice thereof having been so long intercepted in the Civil Wars of Lancaster and York, as there were not a few Overtures for the Regal Authority, both in his Father's time and his, to appear in, and enter.

The first Office perform'd by these Counsellors, was mix'd betwixt Piety to their deceas'd Prince, and Duty to their new; it being the best continuance of that Regal Authority which should never die, to revive the memory thereof in that way only which is permitted, being Pomp and Ceremony. This appeared not only in a great Funeral, but by that magnificent Structure in Westminster, where the Chappel having been finished by Henry VII. himself, had the Tomb afterwards added and perfected by his Executors, 1519. Concerning which, though it be reported that the Chappel cost only 10000 l. (or, as others say, 14000 l.) and the Tomb 1000 l. yet as Monney went then, it might be thought a sumptuous Monument.

Henry VII. Chappel cost but 14000 l.

While the Obsequies and Rites were preparing (the particulars whereof Hall after his manner relates) King Henry retired privately from Richmond (where his Father died) to the Tower of London, both that he might with more leisure advise with his Council concerning the present Affairs of his Kingdom, as also the better to avoid those Salutes and Acclamations of the People, which could not but be unseasonable, till the Lamentations and Solemnity of his Father's Funeral were past. He thought not fit to mingle the Noises. Here then it was in the first place resolv'd to make good his Authority, as having more undoubted Right to the Crown by the Union of the White-Rose and the Red in his Person, than any King ever deliver'd to us by warrantable History. For this End he found or took occasions. In one kind Henry Stafford, Brother to the Duke of Buckingham, serv'd for Example, who (upon I know not what suspicion) was apprehended presently, and committed to the Tower; which yet seem'd afterwards so frivolous, that to repair this Disgrace, he was the same Year made Earl of Wiltshire. In the other kind, Doctor Ruthall became the Object, being (together with one of his Council) made the same Day Bishop of Duresme. Thus, though it seems he hast'd to take upon him the real Marks of Sovereignty, yet he so temper'd them, as to leave his Subjects in hope of an even hand. Besides, that he might shew himself gracious to his Subjects, he not only confirm'd the Pardon his Father gave a little before his death for all Offences, except Murder, Felony, and Treason, (to which (employed lately for taking the Benefit of Penal Statutes) that it was thought fit to call them before the Council, where Empson spake to this effect:

Empson and Dudley call'd to an Account.

April 25.

Empson's Speech before the Council.

I Have remark'd two Causes in general, that move Attention. One is the greatness, the other is the strangeness and novelty of Argument. Both these concur so manifestly in the Affairs now question'd, that I will not much implore your Patience. Though on the other side, considering my violent Persecution, I cannot but think it a favour, that I may speak for myself; but (alas) to whom? The King my Master, to whom I should appeal, as to my supreme Judge and Protector, abandons me to my Enemies, without other Cause, than that I obey'd his Father's Commands, and upheld the Regal Authority. The People, on whose equal trial I should put my Life, seek my Destruction, only because I endeavour to execute those Laws whereof themselves were Authors: What would have happen'd to me, if I had disobey'd my King, or broke my Country's Laws? Surely, if I have any ways transgress'd, it is in procuring that these Penal Statutes might be observed, which your selves in open Parliament decreed, and to which you then submitted, both your Persons, Estates, and Posterity; and if this be a Crime, why do you not first repeal your proper Acts? Or if (which is truth) they stand still in full force and virtue, why do you not vindicate from all Imputation both your selves and me? For who ever yet saw any Man condemn'd for doing Justice? Especially when by the chief dispenser thereof (which is the King) the whole frame of the proceeding hath been confirm'd and warranted? Nay, whoever saw Man on these terms not rewarded? And must that which is the life and strength of all other Actions, be the subversion and overthrow of Mine? Have you read or heard in any well-govern'd Country, that the infractors of Laws made by Publick Vote, and Consent escap'd without Punishment, and they only punish'd who labour'd to sustain them? or when you had not read or heard any such thing, could you imagine a more certain sign of ruine in that Common-wealth. And will you alone hope to decline this heavy Judgment? When contrary to all Equity and Example, you not only make Presidents for Injustice and Impunity, but together with defaming would inflict a cruel Death on those who would maintain them; as if this might be a fit Guerdon for those who (I must tell you) every where else would have been thought the best Patriots; what can we expect then, but a fatal Period to us all? But let God turn this away, though I be the Sacrifice. Only, if I must die, let me desire that my Enditement may be entred on no Record, nor divulged to foreign Nations, lest if they hear, in my Condemnation, all that may argue a final dissolution in Government, they invade and overcome you.

To this was answer'd briefly. That he receiv'd a great deal of liberty to speak ill, as well as to do: That he should find at last, he was punish'd for passing the bounds of his Commission from the late King, and for stretching a Law which in its self was severe enough to the common and poorer sort of People, from whom he exacted most unjustly. The chief parts of his Accusation (that I can find) were,

Moffet.

1. That he had committed divers Persons to prison, without suffering them to answer till they had compounded for their Fines.
2. For searching unduly Mens Estates, and bringing them wrongfully to hold under that Tenure they call in Capite; without that the Parties could be permitted to a Traverse, till they had payed great Fines and Ransoms.

3. That Wards, being come to full years, were not allow'd to sue out their Livery, till they had paid an excessive Composition.

4. That Outlaw'd Person could not be allow'd to sue out their Charter of Pardon, till they had paid half the profit of their Lands for two years, upon pretence that it was according to Law.

5. That he usurp'd upon the Jurisdiction of other Courts, in hearing and determining divers matters properly belonging to them.

6. Lastly, That whereas a Prisoner being indicted for Theft, in the City of Coventry, to the value of one pound, was by the Jury acquitted; the said Empson conceiving the Evidence to be sufficient, committed the Jury to Prison, till they enter'd into Bond to appear before the King's Council; where the matter being again consider'd, it was order'd they should pay Eight Pounds for a Fine, (which was thought so heinous, as, at a Sessions being held afterwards at Coventry, a particular Indictment was fram'd against him, and he was found Guilty.) How many of these Allegations were verified, or how far they might be warranted by the last King's Commission, appears not to me. Howsoever, for the present, they were * committed to the Tower.

This Empson, reported to be a Sieve-maker's Son in Worcester, from this mean beginning, by his Wit and Industry, came to be of Council to King Henry VII. and Master or Surveyor of his forfeits in divers kinds; in which place he served as an Instrument, for raising great Sums to the King. Dudley (a Gentleman of Birth, and such parts as he was chosen Speaker of the Parliament House † 19 Henry VII.) assisting him. † 1503.

These Men (call'd by Polydore Virgil Judices Fideles) having it seems, exceeded their bounds, were detested of all, but especially the poorer sort, who found it easier to hate, than to pay. To satisfy their Complaints therefore, it was thought fit to permit them to the ordinary ways of Justice: The Promoters they used being so severely punish'd in the mean time, betwixt the Pillory and Shame, that they dy'd all (a few days after) in Prison, save one Giovanni Baptista Grimaldi, who, foreseeing the storm, took Sanctuary in Westminster.

Empson & Dudley's Informers punish'd.

All Clamors being thus silenc'd, the next care was, that the Crown might be put on the King's Head, with that Solemnity, which in former times was used. This was not yet so speeded, but that the King's Council thought fit first to advise with him concerning his Marrying. About which many Propositions being made, the graver sort told him, that the same reasons which made his wife Father chuse to match with Spain, (first by marrying his eldest Son Arthur, to Katharine Daughter of Ferdinand King of Arragon, and after Arthurs Death, by treating a Match between the said Lady and Him) were in force still. That since he had pretences on France, no Alliance could be useful on that part. Besides, that betwixt great Estates adjacent to one another, such Jealousies use to rise, that they may make Peace sometimes, but never Friendship. That Leagues and Confederations have in them the nature of harmonical Accords, which jar in the second, but agree in the third Interval. Therefore, that he should match with Spain, or at least with some Prince, that might joyn with him, when there should be question of opposing France, which, since the late * Union of the Dukedom of Britain, he was to consider as a potent and dangerous Neighbour. As for the House of Burgundy, Reasons offer'd to K. Henry, for his marrying the Princess Kat. of Spain, his Brother Arthurs's Widow.

1509. and Low-Countries, (which was come to the hands of Maximilian the Emperor, by his match with Mary, Daughter and Heir to the last Duke called Charles the Bold, Carolus Audax) he needed not fear any thing, unless he did wilfully provoke them; the causes of love on that part seeming to be perpetual, as being founded upon the mutual necessity of those Ports and Havens, to which, upon all foul weather, the Shipping must resort on either side; and lately confirm'd by a new Contract of Charles, Grandchild and Heir of Maximilian, with Mary the King's Sister [which yet held not,] it was then consider'd, whether he might not immediately take the said Lady Katherine; and the rather, because the Treaty had not only been dispensed with, in the time of Henry the Seventh, his Father; but some offence lately taken by Ferdinand, because it was deferr'd so long; (for perfecting whereof therefore, he had sent ample Commission to his Ambassador here, (as I find by our Records, about this time;) and to conduce hereto, was alledg'd (as Polydore hath it) the Law, Deuter. 25. of marrying the Brother's Wife; and, to help this again, the Princess Katherine protested her self to be a Virgin, offering to be try'd by Matrons. It was added also, that the Lady was present, and that saved time and charges; besides, she had given so much proof of Vertue and sweetness of Condition, that they knew not where to parallel her. Again, when she should depart the Kingdom, a great Dower must follow her, which would be transported yearly out of the Nation. All which Motives were corroborated by the above-mentioned Dispensation, obtain'd divers years before from Julius II. who, as he was a stirring and warlike Prelate, and had his ends upon King Henry the Seventh, in the Wars then begun in Italy, made no great difficulty to grant it; and the rather, because he was sensible that all the Children which should be gotten betwixt them, would be firm to the Papacy; since, if ever they renounc'd the Pope's Authority, they must disclaim the Power by which themselves were made Legitimate. A Messenger therefore having been sent to Rome, Anno 1503. (Ferdinando's Power and Mediation concurring) obtain'd a Licence from the Pope, many of the Cardinals, in vain, opposing it; whereof more amply, when we shall have occasion to speak of the Divorce. Thus, upon the third of June, being about six weeks after his Father's Death, he espoused the Lady Katherine.

June 24. Their Coronation was yet deferr'd till the 24th of the same Month. The Forms and Magnificence whereof being set down by Hall, Hollinshed, and others, are by me purposely omitted.

June 29. Not long after the King, who had left off Mourning, was forc'd to take it again, for his Grandmother, the Lady Margaret, Countess of Richmond and Derby, a vertuous Lady, and a great Benefactor to both our Universities, by whose Advice (as is said) chiefly the King's Counsellors were chosen: Whom she so disposed, as they might deliberate well among themselves always, before they gave their advice to this young King, as not thinking fit (at that Age) he should be distracted by difference of Opinions. Neither did they vary much, during her Life; though afterward, some smothered Jealousies broke out into open Faction. Inasmuch that Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey, and Richard Fox Bishop of Winchester, out of a competition for being most eminent in the King's favour, became at last not sufficiently united between themselves. But, as it is a rare felicity in Princes to make election of able Counsellors, so it is no less to order them aright. For, as secret Combination for their own ends, usuall brings them too close to one another, so ambitious Opposition keeps them too far off; the true distance being that only, which is created by a just emulation to do their Master Service; in which posture, unless they be studiously kept, without being suffer'd to decline to either extream, many inconveniences must follow in the administration of Publick Affairs.

Now though these two (as Polydore relates) had brought all business within their Verge, (William Compton chief Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, and who was next in favour to them, being more attentive to his profit, than to Publick Affairs:) I doubt not yet, but their fellow Counsellors were often admitted; though, perhaps not being acquainted with all the Premises, they were hardly able to ground a solid Advice. The Bishop was an old and intimate Counsellor to King Henry the Seventh, and knew all the Mysteries of State. The Earl of Surrey was (in deed) later in Credit, yet a brave and understanding Nobleman, though (as Polydore observes) his Estate was much waisted by the Civil Wars, (his Father John, who was made Duke of Norfolk by Richard the Third, having been kill'd in Bosworth-field on his side, and the Earl himself kept Prisoner in the beginning of Henry the Seventh's Reign.) However, his very place of Lord Treasurer, which he held ever since the 16th of Henry the Seventh) made him much in request; as one who both kept and dispensed that Mass of Wealth, left by Henry the Seventh; which (if we may believe Authors) was 1800000 Pounds Sterling. A greater Sum (doubtless) than any King of this Realm before had in his Coffers. And such as might be thought in effect quadruple to so much in this Age. It seems yet, so great a part of it was by the King's Order, distributed to divers of the Court-Gallants, that the Bishop, who was Lord Privy Seal, and remember'd how hardly it was gotten, repin'd at it, and thereupon did ill offices to the Earl, as if (saith Polydore) he parted with it too easily, or, perchance, made advantage to himself thereby. But that we may leave these things to the credit of Polydore (in whom I have observ'd not a little Malignity,) I find it resolv'd between them, that in imitation of his Father (who instituted first a Band of 50 Archers to wait on him) some Horse-Guards should be ready always to attend his Person. The number propos'd was but 50. But, as every one had an Archer, a Demilance, and a Cuffrel (as our History calls it, but being truly Coustil-lier) or a kind of Ambactus, or Servant belonging to him, besides three great Horses for his own use, so it grew to a considerable number: Of these Henry Bourchier Earl of Essex was Captain, and Sir John Peachie Lieutenant. But whether this might raise some Jealousie among the People (which yet my Authors mention not) or that their expence were greater than that it could continue after the rate it began, (both they and all their Horses being trapp'd in Cloth of Gold, Silver, or Goldsmith's Work) I find it was dissolv'd at last, and came to nothing.

This Year a great Plague begun at Calais, which though it consum'd many Persons, was not thought sufficient yet to keep off an Enemy. So that Sir John Peachie with 300 Men, was sent thither to defend the Place; by whose good order the Town was secured.

Empson and Dudley being (as is above said) committed to the Tower, new and strange Crimes were found and objected against them, as appears in their Indictments upon Record, wherein, they are accus'd of Conspiracy against the King and State; and first, that during the sickness of the late King in March last, they summon'd certain 1509. of their friends to be in Arms at an hours warning; and upon the Death of the said King, to hasten to London. Out of which, and other Circumstances, it was collected by the Jury, that their intent was to seize on the Person of the new King, and so to assume the sole Government, or when they could not attain this, to destroy him.

July 16. Of which Crimes, how improbable soever, Dudley in his Tryal at Guildhall in London, July 16. 1509, and Empson at Northampton, Octob. 1. were found guilty by their Juries, and both condemn'd of Treason, and so remanded to the Tower.

Our King being thus settled in his Throne, took several prospects upon all his Neighbouring Princes.

The Foreign Princes Contemporary with K. Henry. 1503. In Scotland (then) reign'd James the Fourth, being of a middle Age; who was his Confederate by Treaty, and Brother-in-Law by the Match of Margaret (whom Henry the Seventh gave him, Anno 1503.) Howbeit, as he held a stricter Correspondence with France, than stood with the Interest of our Kingdom; some Jealousies of State arose betwixt Henry the Seventh and him, which yet were past over a little before our King's coming to the Crown, and the former Treaty confirm'd.

1498. In France, Louis the Twelfth, an old and warlike Prince reign'd; who studiously yet conserv'd the Peace made betwixt Henry the Seventh and himself, 1498, both that he might the better incorporate and settle in the French Crown the Dukedom of Brittain, claim'd by him in Anne his Wife's Right, (being not only a large addition to his Dominions, but of great nearness and consequence to this Island) and that he might be freer to attend his designs in Italy (whereof in its due place.) For which reasons also he had concluded (by the means of James the Fourth) a League with John King of Denmark, and Sweden then powerful by Sea, by which that King was bound to assist him, in case of Invasion.

* 1490. In Arragon, Ferdinand an Ancient and Politick Prince rul'd in his own Right, and in Castile by the right of Isabel his Wife, Inheritrix thereof, who dy'd 1504. By this Lady he had one Son, who deceas'd 1497, and four Daughters. Isabel the eldest being Marri'd to * Alphonso Prince of Portugal, and afterwards to Manuel King thereof, † dy'd without Issue, whereby Jone the second Daughter became Heir of Castile in the Right of her Mother; and had by her Husband Philip (Son to Maximilian the Emperor) Charles and Ferdinand (Emperors successively) and four Daughters, Leoneta, Katharine, Mary and Isabel. This Philip shortly after his * coming to the Kingdom of Castile in the Right of Jone his Wife † dying, and she through some Indisposition of Mind or Body, proving unapt for Government, Ferdinand reassum'd his Power in regard of the Minority of his Grandchild Charles. Mary third Daughter to Ferdinand, was Wife to the foresaid Manuel King of Portugal, in place of her deceas'd Sister. And for the Match of Katharine with England, the following History will sufficiently speak it.

1503. In the Empire Maximilian (though chosen only King of the Romans) appear'd potent; both by the Authority deriv'd thence, and by the Match he had made with Mary, Daughter and Heir of Charles the Bold, Carolus Audax last Duke of Burgundy; by which not only his Estate there, but all the Low-Countries descended to him. Nevertheless, as he consider'd of what Importance it was, for his designs to make a firm Alliance with England, He first offer'd a League 1503. to Henry the Seventh, and (for Consolidation thereof) his Daughter Margaret, Dowager of Savoy; 1509. and, when that fail'd, procur'd a kind of Contract Decemb. 16. 1508. betwixt Charles (afterwards Emperor, and not above eight years old) his Grand-child, and Mary (afterwards Queen of France) younger Daughter to Henry the Seventh. Neither of which Marriages yet taking effect, the result was only a Peace and Friendship, establish'd upon the first proposition of Alliance betwixt them; of which also Maximilian was no less glad (as having secured the Low-Countries thereby) than Louis XII. was for Brittain. And they had reason; the adding of the one to France, and the other to the House of Austria, being not only the greatest strengthening our most suspected Neighbours ever had, but a weakening of us, while we lost two of our best and most useful Confederates; so that the permitting thereof so easily, may be thought a greater Indulgence than could stand with reason of State, had not a consumption and weariness, through our long civil Dissentions at home occasion'd it. For the Inhabitants of both Countries, wanted not pretext to dispute the right of their Princes: In Portugal reign'd Manuel, of whose Matches having formerly spoken, I shall add little more, than that he had already made divers discoveries towards the East-Indies. 1501.

In the Low-Countries, Margaret Duchess of Savoy, appointed Regent by her Father Maximilian, and having also the charge of her Nephew Charles his Education (who was born at Gaunt.) many ways approv'd her self a discreet Lady; as appears by the many good Offices she did to our King, and to all other Christian Princes, as well as by the bringing up of her Nephew for a Tutor, to whom, in that part of Learning call'd humaniores Literæ, the politer Studies, she chose Adrian of Utrecht, afterwards Pope; and for State-business Anthoine de Croy, Lord of Chièvres, an able Person, who instructed him therein as soon as he was capable of it. 1508. 1500.

In the Papal See Julius the Second, a warlike Prelate presid'd; who having far more, and other designs than stood with the Dignity and Function of an Ecclesiastical Person, adventur'd to trouble all things. As supposing himself not only priviledg'd by his Place, from all Attempts of Foreign Princes; but that the power of Peace and War did so immediately depend on him, that he should at least, not want occasion to exercise his charge of Arbiter of their Differences. Towards which also, because he knew how much our King could contribute, he passionately desir'd a strict League with him, which was embrac'd, as will appear hereafter.

As for the Great Turk Bajazet the Second, though now grown a formidable Enemy to Christendom, our King look'd on him at a distance, and no otherwise than as he stood in Relation to his Confederates.

Having thus survey'd the present Monarchs in particular, he did not forget to take into his special Consideration the State of Venice, which about this time did much enlarge it's Territories, so that, notwithstanding the opposition not only of the chief Christian Potentates, but even of the Turks themselves, they extended their Dominions every way: Insomuch, that the Pope Maximilian, Ferdinand and Louis the Twelfth had the last year, being 1508, enter'd at Cambray into a League against them, the Conditions whereof were; That they should not desist till they had recover'd all those places which the Venetians had taken from them; upon confidence yet, that the first Conqueror should restore to any of the Confederates that which belong'd to him. And that 1508. Dec. 9.

1509. that Louis the Twelfth should be General of the Armies, and personally present in the Expedition. To which also he was the more dispos'd, for that the Venetians had gotten from him sundry places belonging to the Dutchy of Milan. Howbeit, as these Affairs did not directly concern our King, so he took the more leasure to attend the event, and to serve himself thereof.

A Parliament
call'd.

Jan. 21.

By this time it was thought fit for many Reasons, but especially for contenting the Commonalty, which seem'd to be wholly alter'd by the rigorous proceedings of Henry the Seventh, to call a Parliament, which began in January following. Here then Empson and Dudley, formerly not only expos'd to the revenge of all Men, but publickly condemn'd (as is above related) were attain'd of High Treason. And here I shall touch a little upon the Laws enacted the first year of this King, as far as they may concern the more Historical and Political parts. I find therefore, divers of these Statutes by which King Henry the Seventh took advantage of the People, repeal'd, explain'd, or limited. Among which the benefit of forfeitures for Penal Laws, was reduc'd to the term of three years next preceding. Inasmuch that the principal scope of this Parliament, seem'd to have reference to Empson and Dudley's business, which was so represented, (by the Lower-House of Parliament chiefly) that the King was willing to restrain his own Authority in some sort, that he might enlarge the Peoples Confidence and Affection towards him. Lastly, in this kind some untrue Inquisitions found by Empson and Dudley, as also some assurances of Lands past to them, were annihilated and made void. Besides which I find little material, save only that a Sumptuary Law against Excess of Apparel, was Repeal'd, and a new one a little more decent Subrogated.

As our King was now in high esteem with his People for Justice, so was he no less redoubt'd abroad, for the hopes he gave of being an Active and Courageous Prince. All which was the more regarded, because his Treasure was so great, that he might be thought able suddenly, and without the delays usual in raising of Money, to execute his Designs.

Therefore divers Ambassadors repair'd to him from France, Denmark, Scotland, and other places, who were magnificently entertain'd.

The business of the French King (Louis the Twelfth) was chiefly to keep good Correspondence between the two Countries, while himself went on with his Wars in Italy. In sequence hereof also Tillet saith, there was a Peace made between England and France this year, March 23. 1498. And, whereas at the Treaty of Peace in July 1498. Louis the Twelfth had given caution to Henry the Seventh, to pay that which remained of 745000 Crowns, due according to a Treaty made between Charles the Eighth, and the said Henry, 13 Novemb. 1492. Now the said Louis did stipulate to pay the remainder of the Sum.

That of Scotland was Congratulation in King James the Fourth's Brother-in-Law, and his Sisters Names, with confirmation of the late Treaty of Peace; containing also some Propositions tending to the penetrating of our Kings present Designs, that they might frame their Counsels accordingly, which was with some relation to France.

That for Denmark, was chiefly to establish a better course for Trade; for which purpose a Statute was repeal'd at this Parliament, which did prohibit our Men other Traffick towards Denmark and Iseland, than to a place call'd Norrburn.

The King finding now all things safe both abroad and at home, took those liberties which became his Youth; yet were not his Exercises sportful alone, but had in them a mixture of Letters and Arms. Therefore though some relate that he us'd Singing, Dancing, playing on the Flute and Virginals, making Verles and the like: Yet his more serious Entertainments were the study of History and School-Divinity (in which he especially delighted,) Jufts, Turneys, Barriers, and that not in an ordinary manner, but with the Two-handed-Sword and Battle-Ax. These again were set forth with costly Pageants and Devises, and these so frequently, that not only much time, but a great part of the Treasure was consum'd in 'em. Of which whoever desires to see more, may peruse Hall and Hollinshed, who have many particulars worth looking on, for him that hath so much leasure. Besides these, he us'd sometimes Tennis and Dice, at which certain Strangers used to play with him; till the King, finding 'em to be Cheats, at length chas'd 'em away.

Empson and Dudley lying now in Prison, condemn'd and attain'd by Parliament, the importunate clamours of the People prevailing with the King in this years Progress, he not only restor'd divers Mults, but for further satisfaction to the Commonalty (by a special Writ) commanded to have their Heads struck off, August 18. doing therein (as thought by many) more like a good King, than a good Master.

Julius the Second having recover'd what he desir'd in Italy, by his Wars the last year, was contented now to accept the submission of the Venetians, with whom (his Confederates not being privy thereto) he made Peace Feb. 24. 1510. and being jealous of the greatness of the French in Italy, (with whom he had also this quarrel, that they defended Alfonso d'Este Duke of Ferrara against him) he endeavour'd all he could to oppose them; to this purpose he inclin'd Ferdinand Speed. by giving him the Investiture of Naples, King Henry the Eighth he solicited, by putting him in mind of the Glory of his Ancestors, &c. and offering him the Honour to be Caput faderis Italici. Our King upon this sends Christopher Bambridge Archbishop of York, to reside at Rome, and treat of these matters. In the mean while the Pope and the Venetians proceed, and attempt Ferrara, Genoia, and other places. But as they prosper'd not, he lays hold on his Spiritual Sword, and Excommunicates Este, with all his Adherents. Louis the Twelfth on the other side calls a Synod of the French Church at Tours in France; where certain Questions touching the Popes late Actions and his Authority were proposed, and resolved against him, and his Excommunication pronounced void. It was also decreed, that an Admonition should be sent to him, to imbrace Peace and Moderation; which if he refus'd, he should be summon'd to call a free and general Council (according to the Decree of the Council of Basle.) Louis having proceeded thus far, communicated the matter to Maximilian (whom as yet the Pope had not won from him) and joining with themselves the Cardinals Bernardine, Brisenet, and others, they summon'd a Council to be held 1 Sept. 1511. at Pisa, commanding the Pope to appear there. While these things were doing, the French under Chaumont came before Bononia, where the Pope now lay sick, and besieg'd it, forcing him to such hard Conditions, as upon the coming of relief he would not stand to. Howsoever, this besieging of the Pope being given out, sounded so ill, that our King presently made a League with Ferdinand for his Defence; which was an engagement for greater Actions hereafter, as we shall see in its place.

Jan. 1. The first day of this year, being 1511, the Queen was brought to bed of a Son, which therefore in the Name of a New-years-Gift, was by her presented to the King. But as the Child liv'd not to the latter end of the next Month, so the greatness of Joy did more than expire in the shortness. Notwithstanding which, it is said the youthful Parents were soon comforted, reputing, that in Children (as in Silver Vessels) little is usually lost, but the fashion. But it fell not out so well, for it pleas'd God, that no Heirs Males remain'd betwixt them two. In the mean time Feb. Ferdinand King of Arragon, being not ignorant in what estate his Daughter was, sent Ambassadors to perform his due Complements on that occasion, and withal, to sollicite the King for Assistance against the Moors in Africk. He had already conquer'd those in the Province and City of Granada; through the Streets whereof as he rode triumphantly, 1492, the certain News was brought him of those great Riches, discover'd in the Indies by Columbus; which I therefore mention, because (to use the Spanish Phrase) I think it the greatest Coyuntura that ever happen'd; he having reduc'd his Dominions in Spain to an intireness, and at the same time receiv'd News of that immense Treasure in another World. His demand was presently granted by our King, and the Lord Thomas Darcy sent with 1500 Archers (the Soldiers then in request) to Ferdinand, with whose help he intended to revenge the loss receiv'd the * last year at Gelves in Barbary. Aug. 30. Howbeit, as Julius the Second being much press'd by the French (whose Affairs prosper'd in Italy) requir'd the help of Ferdinand against them; he desist'd from his Enterprize, and resolv'd to succour the Pope; whereupon also our Men richly rewarded, did return home.
May. In like manner Margaret Regent of the Low-Countries, obtain'd of the King 1500 Archers to assist her against the Duke of Gueldres, though Confederate of Lewis the Twelfth, and James the Fourth. These therefore under the Command of Sir Edward Poynings Knight of the Garter, lately * made Warden of the Cinque-Ports, presently after their landing were met by the said Lady Regent, and thereupon united and recommended with much favour and particularity to the rest of her Army. The Exploits done by this brave Cavalier, and our English, I have not expressly set down, both for that the Lady Regent joyn'd not any considerable forces with them, for the employing great Actions; and that themselves were not free to attempt any thing by themselves. Howsoever, I find they were licensed to return, (not without great testimonies of their worth) and that, upon review of the Troops, Sir Edward Poynings found that not fully a hundred of his Men were wanting.
The King's Authority over the Narrow-Seas (studiously conserved ever by his Ancestors) was about this time somewhat lessen'd by the Piracies of Andrew Breton (whom our Chronicles call Barton) a Scottish-Man. This Breton, in revenge of his Fathers Death, as also other Injuries, having in vain sought redress in Flanders, for a Ship taken from his said Father by some Portugals, obtain'd Letters of Mark from James the Fourth, upon condition yet, he should not exercise Piracy. Notwithstanding which, he seiz'd on divers of our lesser Barques (upon pretence of carrying Portugal's Goods) and pillaged them. For remedy of which Inconvenience, the two Sons of Thomas Earl of Surrey (Lord Treasurer, and Earl-Marshal of England) were employ'd. The younger call'd Edward, being Lord Admiral, commanding in one Ship; and Thomas the elder Brother in another. Thereupon (in several places, though at one time) they invested Bretons two Ships; which, though the Scottish Writers make to be far less than ours, maintain'd a cruel Fight: The obstinate Pirate (though so grievously hurt that he died on the place) encouraging his Men with his Whistle, even to his last Breath. But our English pursu'd their point so, that at last they forc'd these Ships, and brought them (together with the Men that remain'd) away, and presented them to the King; who, upon their submission, graciously pardon'd them; so that they would depart out of his Kingdom within 20 days. James the Fourth hearing of this, sent to require satisfaction, as being against the Treaty betwixt them. But it was answer'd, That it did not become a King to impute breach of Treaty to his Confederates and Allies, only for doing Justice on a Pirate. The Messenger, rather silenc'd with this Answer, than satisfi'd, returns to his King; who, when occasion was offer'd, fail'd not to shew how ill he took the death of Breton.

The Pope being freed from Siege at Bononia, proceeds in his Wars against the French; goes in Person against Mirandola, and by Composition takes it; but, not long after loses Bononia to the French, led by Gaston de Foix, his whole Army being routed. Yet was not this a greater Affront to him, than the Council to be held at Pisa, a City now in the hands of the Florentines, whom therefore Julius presently interdicts, and shortly after expelling Soderinus (Governor thereof by means of Charles the Eighth of France) restores the Family of the Medices, who were formerly expuls'd. The Princes also and the Cardinals who summon'd this Council being Excommunicate, &c. notwithstanding which they proceed. But being slighted by the Citizens of Pisa, they translate the Council to Milan; but finding no better respect there, they remove it to Lyons in France; where they summon'd Julius to appear, and answer, and finally suspended his Authority. Upon this, the Pope thunders against France, exposing it, (together with Navarre, whose King favour'd Lewis) to the Conqueror; and, to Abrogate the Council of Lyons, he summon'd another to be held at the Lateran in Rome, April 19. 1512. Unto this Council our King sent his Commissioners, being Sylvester Bishop of Worcester, John Bishop of Rochester, Thomas Docwra Lord Prior of Saint Johns, and Richard Abbot of Winchelcombe, Feb. 4. 1512, as appears by our Records. In this Council the Sentence of Excommunication was confirm'd against the Authors of the other Council, and the Acts of it revers'd. Not content herewith, he sent also to Ferdinand, and to King Henry the Eighth (who had already privately mediated a League with him) to take open Arms, and fall upon France. Not neglecting together to use all means for withdrawing Maximilian from the French Party. For though he had joyn'd with Lewis to call the Council at Pisa, (first rough-hew'd at * Tours) and did still adhere to him: Yet, as the Pope and Ferdinand, whom he would not disoblige, offer'd him more advantageous Conditions, he was gain'd at last to the contrary Party, and Lewis expos'd to the Danger. The Principal Agent which the Pope used to our King, was Christopher Bambridge, who had resided a while at Rome; and for this Service was thought to deserve the Cardinals Hat, which also he obtain'd in March 1511. In the mean while, the business being brought to our Council-Table, some spake in this manner.
That a fairer Opportunity was never offer'd, whether be desir'd to maintain the Authority of the Pope, or to recover his own Right in France. That either of these were just Considerations, but both together not so the Pope.

Reasons for a Breach with France in favour of the Pope.

1511. to be pretermitted. To further these Designs, he should not only have the Assistance and Blessing of his Holiness, but of his Father-in-Law. Besides which, it was possible Maximilian the Emperor might joyn herein; however he and Lewis the 12th, had of late concurred in their Designs. That it was probable, his Subjects in France retain'd still a due Memory not only of their Allegiance, but of the benefit receiv'd from the Crown of England. Besides, that in France there never wanted discontented Persons, who would joyn with his Forces. And for his Coffers, they were not so full in any King's time; to which again he could not doubt but a large Supply would be given by Parliament, which never fail'd in Contribution, when there was no question of War with that Country. As for the Difficulties he should find in the Enterprise, they were not considerable. Louis the Twelfth being not only deeply engag'd in a War in Italy, but having lost his best Men there; so that before he could give order for his Affairs at home, he might be oppress'd; or, when he would leave his pretences on Italy, to look to his own Country, that would yet free the Pope from the danger he was in, and consequently give his Majesty the Honour of performing his Intentions.

Reasons

Some yet, that did more seriously weigh the business, opin'd thus; That the Kings Title indeed in France, especially to the Hereditary Provinces, was undoubted; the occasion fair; and many Circumstances besides conducing to this great Business: Yet that all these were not sufficient for the making of a War against so potent a Neighbour, unless there were more than possibility of effecting our Purposes. This they might consider by comparing these times with the former. And if when all Guyenne, Anjou, Touraine, and for a long while Normandy was ours; and when, besides this, the Duke of Bretagne was our friend, and the House of Burgundy an assur'd Ally and Confederate to this Kingdom, we yet could not advance our Designs in that Country, what hope is there now to attain them? Are we stronger now than at that time? Or can we promise our selves better Success? Let it be granted, that as many Battels as we have fought against the French, have been almost so many Victories; what was this Kingdom the better for them; Who can say he made a fortune thereby? Had we ever a more glorious time than that of Edward the Third; and was yet the Country ever more poor or weary of the Wars. If you will not believe our Histories, look even on our Records, and you will find not only how the Treasure of our Kingdom was much exhausted, but even the People themselves glutted with their Prosperity. And shall we trust now to better days? What though with our 12000 or 15000 we have oft defeated their Armies of 50000. or 60000? Stands it with reason of War to expect the like Success still? Especially, since the use of Arms is chang'd, and for the Bow (proper for Men of our strength) the Calcever begins to be generally receiv'd. Which, besides that it is a more costly Weapon, requireth a long practice, and may be mannag'd by the weaker sort. Let us therefore (in God's Name) leave off our attempts against the Terra firma. The natural Scituation of Islands seems not to sort with Conquests in that kind. England alone is a just Empire. Or, when we would enlarge our selves, let it be that way we can, and to which it seems the Eternal Providence hath destin'd us; which is, by Sea. The Indies are discover'd, and vast Treasure brought from thence every day. Let us therefore bend our endeavours thitherwards; and, if the Spaniard or Portugals suffer us not to joyn with them, there will be yet Region enough for all to enjoy. Neither will a Piety, equal to that of succouring Julius the Second, be wanting; since, by converting those Infidels to the Christian Religion, there will be a larger field open'd for doing of good, than by establishing a doubtful and controverted Head of the Church: The Council of Pisa having determin'd both to depose him, and substitute another.

But our young King, with whom zeal to do the Pope Service, and ambition to recover that Patrimony whereof our King Henry the Sixth was in possession, and which our Civil-Wars only lost, declin'd this sober Advice, and adher'd to the former. And that, especially, for two Reasons urg'd by way of Supplement; whereof the one was, that there was new hope Maximilian the Emperor would be won to his side. The other was, that he understood from Rome, the Pope had an intention to take away the Stile of CHRISTIANISSIMUS from the French, (which their Historians confess) and transfer it on him; which he thought would be a perpetual glory to the Nation.

Hereupon it was resolv'd, together with calling a Parliament, to send (by John Young Doctor of Law, and Master of the Roul) unto Louis the Twelfth a Monitory Ambassage, requiring him to desist from War against the Pope. But Louis, whether out of his own Courage, or that he thought the Emperor assur'd to him, or that (indeed) there was no hope of a Peace, (he having been privately advertis'd that our King resolv'd War) regarded not at his Advice; Our King therefore, that he might have more than one Title to invade France, sent to require his Patrimonial Inheritance of Anjou, Guyenne, &c. and, in case of refusal, to denounce War. This then being proclaim'd, Leavies were commanded, and Money's granted by Parliament (which began Febr. 4.) were rais'd. While these things were doing, I shall observe my former Method, and by the way touch on the Laws then enacted, which may belong to History.

There was also confirm'd an Order formerly taken concerning Escheators, Commissioners, and finding and turning of Offices; which it seems had relation to Empson and Dudley's proceedings. Because also unlawful Games kept Men from shooting in the Long-Bow, they were put down, and Archery commanded. For the better understanding of which Act, another part, whereby the Cross-Bow was also forbidden.

There were likewise certain great Priviledges granted to Men that went beyond Sea with the King. As also Penalties ordain'd for Captains that abridg'd the number of their Soldiers, or detain'd their Wages; as also for Soldiers departing without Licence.

At this Parliament also the King was pleas'd to restore John Dudley, Son and Heir of Edmund Dudley lately attainted. On whom, towards the end of his Reign, he conferr'd the place of Lord Admiral of England, as shall appear in this History.

About this time there was one Hieronymo Buonviso born at Lucca, who being a Bankrupt Merchant, through his friends in Italy, obtain'd so much favour from the Pope, as to be made a kind of Agent here. This Man being acquainted with all the Popes business, and upon his Letters of Credence, receiving likewise the King's and Council's Answers to his Negotiations, became so expert in all those Affairs, that being corrupted by the French, (who gave him a Pension, as I find in our Records) he discover'd many things that much concern'd either side. And from hence it arose chiefly, that Louis the Twelfth was so particularly inform'd of our Designs, that he used many Preventions, as may be observ'd in the following History.

Buonviso,

The War with France being thus determin'd, it was consult'd in what part we should begin. And though 1511. though that of Callais seem'd the most ready way, yet, because Ferdinand promis'd to joyn with the King in this War, (which was call'd Holy) it was by his consent resolv'd to land somewhere in the Spanish Dominions; and that from thence both their Armies (being united) should joynly invade Guyenne. For better understanding of which Project, I must observe, that both the Kings (besides that of vindicating of Julius the Second) had their several Designs, as will appear afterwards. The General nam'd by the King was Thomas Grey Marquis of Dorset, with whom went, besides his three Brothers, the Lord Thomas Howard, Son and Heir to the Earl of Surrey, the Lord Brook, Lord Willoughby, and Lord Ferrars, and divers Knights and Squires, all of them brave Persons, and about 10000 Soldiers; among whom I find in the Spanish History, there were about 5000 Archers, who besides their Bows and Arrows, carri'd Halberts, which they pitch'd on the ground till their Arrows were shot, and then took up again to do execution on the Enemy. An excellent part of Military Discipline, and yet not remarkable by our English Chronicles. These Men about the third, or as the Spaniards have it, the eighth of June, (being shipt in Spanish Vessels) arriv'd at Passage, a Port in Guipuscoa, where one Faderique Bishop of Siguenca, (an able Person) attended them. This Bishop after he had assur'd them of their welcom, and that the Duke d'Alva, General of the Spanish Forces, with 1000 barded Horse, 1500 Gennets or Light-Horse, and 6000 Foot would shortly joyn with them, did much cheer our Men after their long Sea-Voyage. In the mean while John d'Albret (King of Navarre in the right of his Wife Catharine de Foix) having the Spanish Army in Arragon on the one side, and the English on the other of his Kingdom, thought himself in some Straits. And the rather, that the Pope having lately Excommunicated him for assisting the French, and by a Bull dated March 1. 1512, expos'd his Kingdom in prey to the Conqueror; He suspected Ferdinand had some design upon him. Neither was he deceiv'd; for, that he might be drawn away from Louis, or at least that a quarrel might be pickt against him, Ferdinand sends to require that he would declare himself; pretending some jealousy of his proceedings ever since Louis the Twelfth (who was advertis'd of this Holy League, as it was termed) had requir'd his help, or when he would refuse, threaten'd him with taking Bearne away, as being a Feud held of France. To comply with Ferdinand also, the English General sent to him, not only to remember the ancient League and Friendship betwixt the two Nations, when the English were in possession of Guyenne; but thereupon (as well as in the name of the Church) to require his help in this Holy War. The King of Navarre in this perplexity (for he was urg'd no less to the contrary by the French) protested that it concern'd him to be Neutral, he being as much in danger of losing Bearne on the French, as Navarre on the Spanish side. Yet, whether to gain time, or indeed really to shew his forwardness in this Church Affair, he offer'd (upon security given that neither Ferdinand nor the English should molest him) that for four Months space, the States of Navarre should (by their Oaths) solemnly assure him of all amicable usage in that Country; and before that time he doubted not, but Bayone (which was the Key to Guyenne) would be taken by Ferdinand and the English. But this was not thought sufficient; therefore it was demanded that the King of Navarre would deposite some Towns as cautionary on that behalf. But as he still excus'd himself, the English and Spanish (who had sepa-

1512. rately treated before) thought now joynly to send their Agents to the King of Navarre, so that Antonio de Acuna Bishop of Camora, and Sir John Stile (Resident Ambassador for our King in Spain) were presently dispatch'd to him. Being admitted to Audience, their demand was, to have the Fortresses of Estella, Maya, and San Juan, consign'd for their security in the Enterprize of Guyenne. But the King of Navarre protesting still that it concern'd him to hold Neutrality, was at last press'd to make a final Answer. Here then he agreed that Viana, and some other places of less strength than those demanded, should remain as Pledges of his Fidelity: Yet, before this could be settled, the French were come to the confines of both Jurisdictions: Where the English, being desirous to give some proof of their Valour, without any order from their General, pass'd over the River of Vidassona, which divides Guipuscoa from Guyenne, to skirmish with the French. This grew at last so hot, that the Marquis was constrain'd to pass over the rest of his Army to disengage them, which being done, he retir'd again to his Camp near Fuentarabia, in good order. Hereupon the Marquis of Dorset began to complain, that the delay of Ferdinand had given the French time to raise these Forces to oppose them; and together demanded briefly his clear Resolution, what he meant to do in the point of invading Guyenne: But he was answer'd, that since the King of Navarre would not admit a way through his Dominions, he must be forc'd; neither did he think that John would take it ill to suffer a little Violence, when it were for nothing else, but to shew the French, that he did not voluntarily consent thereunto. The Marquis reply'd, that this being no part of his Commission, he must first acquaint the King his Master with it. But Ferdinand finding that both the French Army increas'd, and that the suffering them to come nearer might frustrate his designs in Navarre, commanded the Duke of Alva without more delay, to invest Pamplona, the chief Town of Navarre, entertaining in the mean while John's Ambassadors with hope of an Accommodation, who seem'd also to believe it, until they heard of the Siege. The industrious Ferdinand, that he might draw also the Marquis of Dorset to assist him, us'd these Reasons, That the passage to Bayone by the way of Fuentarabia was narrow, having the Sea on one side, and on the other side the huge Mountains of Navarre and Bearne; so that if they should undertake the Siege at Bayone, without assuring themselves of the Countries behind them, they might be shut up on every side, whensoever John should declare himself for the French Party. Therefore that he should proceed according to Military Rules, and prevent this Inconvenience by seizing first on all the Avenues. The Marquis of Dorset hereupon calling a Council of War, return'd this Answer; That he desir'd to lose no time, and therefore thought it the best course for both to divide the Armies: And that Ferdinand should enter Guyenne by Navarre, while he took the way of Bayone. Yet the King who still pursu'd his Design, seeming not satisfi'd herewith, desir'd rather that both the Armies might pass joynly through Navarre. The Spanish marching still first, and making way for the English to follow. But the Marquis of Dorset answer'd again, he might not transgress his Commission, which permitted him not hostily to enter into Navarre upon any Terms. Insomuch that now almost six weeks were spent in those Treaties.

Ferdinand finding no more to be expected from the English, resolves alone to invade Navarre, promising the Marquis yet from thence to fall

1512. on Guyenne; not doubting (on this assurance) but the Marquis would stay, and at least serve as a Countenance to his Enterprize. Hereupon the Duke of Alva being commanded to * proceed, (without hurting any yet but those who resisted) soon after † took Pamplona, which when our Marquis heard, he testifi'd much Discontentment, both as he found Ferdinand kept not his Promise, and as his Victuals were much shortned on this occasion, he having been abundantly supply'd before from Navarre.

In the mean while Ferdinand to prevent that ill Intelligence, which the Marquis might give, sends to England a Messenger on purpose, with account of his Actions, and to desire a more ample Order to the Marquis to assist him; not neglecting the while, any occasion either for reducing the best part of Navarre to Obedience, or * entitling himself to the Right thereof, as our Records tell us: Which in all particulars of this Affair, do much confirm the Spanish History.

Being thus advanc'd, He thought fit again to sollicite John King of Navarre (now retir'd towards Bearne) that he would joyn in this Holy War. And that he might do so the better, He temper'd Threats and Promises in a more effectual manner: The Bishop of Camora and Sir John Stile hereupon were dispatch'd again, requiring his final Answer. But the Duke of Longueville being come with puissant Forces near to those parts, they made bold to detain the Bishop, not without terrifying him with worse usage; giving leave yet to Sir John Stile to return. Things being brought to these Extremities, John King of Navarre thought fit to go to the French Court, to excuse himself for suffering the Spanish to become so soon Masters of Navarre. Neither had he it seems any way to make this so credible, as by permitting the French with the same facility to seize on Bearne. Thus was this King in a short time, dispossest of all his Estate, only for not knowing how to behave himself, either like a Friend or Enemy.

Now Louis the Twelfth, though not so much as hoping that the English and Spanish should stand thus divided, yet as he desir'd rather a War in that Country, than his own, so he prepar'd as if he were at once to sustain both their Forces; commanding the Duke of Longueville to proceed warily. But the difficulty was not great. For though Salvatierra was kept by John, as long as he treated with Ferdinand; yet now he abandon'd it to the French, and retir'd himself to Paris. Betwixt this Town and Bayone, then the French encamp'd their Army, though for having 5000 in that City (daily reinforc'd by new Levies) it seem'd not to stand in so much need of Defence. This while the Duke of Alva requires an Oath of Obedience from those of Pamplona, and in general from the rest of the chief Inhabitants of Navarre. They again offer it upon the terms agreed on, which was for four Months, and till they had given proof of their Neutrality in the business of Guyenne. But the Duke reply'd, that King John being fled away to the French, and therein having declar'd himself an Enemy both to him and this Holy War, He would now accept no Oath, but that of a simple Obedience to his King and Master: Upon this ensu'd disputes and diversities of Opinions; all which yet were moderated by the Spanish Army, which did not much insist upon Reason, having Power in their hands.

Navarre being thus in a manner reduc'd, Ferdinand sends the Mareschal Aquilera to the Marquis Dorset, protesting that his Army should pass the Mountains at Saint Juan de Pie del Puerto; And 1512. this he did to try whether it would move him yet to joyn Forces. But the Marquis, who was inform'd that the place did lead to Bearne (which remain'd only for an intire Conquest of the Dominions of John) as well as to Bayone, thought fit to attend more certainty, concerning the way of the Spanish Army. Ferdinand on the other side, taking this as a delay, would not omit the prosecuting of his Intentions, laying (in the mean while) all the fault on the Marquis slackness. But no Man ought to blame any General in this kind, unless he knew his Instructions. Ferdinand therefore was too forward herein. But the Duke of Alva who consider'd of what moment diligence is in great Affairs, sends some away presently to seize on Saint Juan de Pie del Puerto; which accordingly was perform'd, though the French were now entering that Country. To make this good also, the Duke himself (by the King his Master's Commandment) follows with the Body of his Army. And now Ferdinand again sends to invite the Marquis. But as the English could not pass thither, but by a place call'd Maya (a rough and almost untrodden passage) or another way far about (for either of which they wanted Horses to draw their Ordnance) so was there a new difficulty interpos'd, for joyning the Armies. Howsoever, it concern'd Ferdinand (after many delays) to acquit himself so far, as to seem at least roundly to go on in the invading of Guyenne. And his Master-piece was, together with performing his own Intentions, now to have brought his offer to our King, within the compass of Probability. He consider'd also, that alone, he was too weak for the French Forces, so that he had more than one reason to sollicite the English Army.

Being in this Posture, he begins to think what remain'd to be done: On the one side, he had the honour of diverting the French from their great Designs in Italy, (for Louis began now to attend his home Affairs) and therein to have freed the Pope. On the other side, having reduc'd all Navarre, (only Esfella excepted, which he took afterwards) and pass'd the Mountains, He seem'd engag'd to secure his Conquests. Therefore he thought on nothing now but going on; trusting for the rest, to the Negotiation of Martin de Ampios, whom he had sent to our King. And this Man (if we may believe the Spanish History) obtain'd that the Marquis Dorset should do whatsoever he was advis'd by Ferdinand for the Holy-Cause. But, before this Instruction could come, the Marquis, who saw Winter now approaching, and very near 3000 of his Men sick or dead of Disorder, and drinking those hot Wines, and for the rest suffering much for scarcity of Victuals; and lastly, being advis'd that the French had fortifi'd Bayone, and planted a great Army before it, thought it too late to begin any great Enterprize. Therefore he sent the Treasurer of his Army, and Sir John Stile to Ferdinand, to represent those Difficulties, and to acquaint him with his Determination to be gone. At last, though with much ado, Ferdinand (according to an Article of the Agreement) provided some Ships for the English; but before they could depart, the Marquis between Discontent and ill Diet so distemper'd himself, that he fell sick, the Lord Howard being substituted in the mean while for Command of the Army. While yet they made ready for Sept. their Journey, Letters came from our King by Windsore the Herald, commanding the Army to stay; promising withal to send a New Supply under the Lord Herbert his Chamberlain. But the Soldiers so mutined, that at last the Generals were 1512. were constrain'd to embarque themselves, and come home (about the end of November) to England. Whereupon Ferdinand (who desir'd now only to maintain what he had gotten) turns himself to other Arts; labouring (by Maximilian's Mediation) to withdraw the French from assisting John. The Conditions being, that Charles Prince of Castile their Grand-child should match with Reynera, or Reynee, second Daughter to Louis the Twelfth (which yet was but colourable as appears in their Histories) and, that the French should condescend hereunto, it was no little Motive, that they had acquir'd so much in Bearne; so that keeping their possessions on either part, much Treaty pass'd without any other effect, than that John on both sides was outed: Though, for Ostentation, Richard de la Pole (calling himself Duke of Suffolk) as I find by our Records, was appointed by Louis to attempt the recovery of Pampelona though in vain. And thus ended this Voyage to the grief of our King, who seem'd so much offended with the ill Success, that he purpos'd once to punish the principal Authors of it. But his General excus'd himself by the narrowness of his Instruction, and partly lay'd the fault on Ferdinand, who being bound by promise to furnish the Army with many Necessaries, yet fail'd. Lastly, they made it appear that Ferdinand never intended any thing but the Conquest of Navarre, (which therefore his Successors hold to this day.) ¶ Though this Voyage were prosperous, yet I find by Polydore, that Sir Edward Howard, who conducted the Marquis to Spain, having with the Fleet first clear'd the Seas from Enemies, landed at a little Bay in Brittain, and march'd seven Miles into the Country, whence (after burning some Towns) he brought away rich Spoils. Not contented herewith yet, he put his Men on shore at Conquet, and divers other places; where the French still receiving the worse, they at last desir'd a Parley. The substance whereof was, That the English would leave off this kind of desultory and cruel War, which tended only to the burning of Villages, and ransacking the Poor. But he reply'd, He was not to take his Directions from them. Besides, that it was the part of brave Gentlemen to defend their Country, and not shamefully to sue for Mercy. After which, and a Banquet in his Ship, they were dismiss'd, and our Admiral return'd home. ¶ The French in the mean while, making great preparatives by Sea, Our King thought fit to reinforce his Fleet, adding to twenty Ships under the Command of his Admiral, five and twenty more under the Command of the choicest of those Gallants that attended him; placing in the chief Ships call'd the Regent, Sir Thomas Knevet Master of his Horse, and Sir John Carew in the Sovereign; Sir Charles Brandon, and Sir Henry Guilford, went with sixty of the tallest Yeomen of his Guard. This brave Fleet chancing to meet thirty nine Sail coming out of Brest in Brittain, assaulted them; where two of the greatest Ships on both sides being grappled, fell on fire by some Accident, or as the French will have it, by the desperate Courage of Primauguet (barbarously, as I conceive it, styl'd by our Chronicles Sir Piers Morgan) and so were consum'd. The Captain of the English Ship (being the Regent) and of the French (call'd the Cordeliere) together with the Soldiers in them, perish'd all, save only a few French, who sav'd themselves with Swimming. Howsoever, the rest of the French were so terrified herewith, that they made away presently, some to Brest, and some to the Isles adjoining. To repair this loss, our King built a Ship, the greatest ever known before, though Buchanan and Lesle say, that James the Fourth, King of Scotland made one; whom the English and French King desiring afterwards to imitate, fail'd so much, that they were not able to make it steer.

The King finding now that businesses were grown to some extremity, betwixt the two Nations, discloses his design of going in Person into France, as choosing rather to make War in his Enemies Country, than to attend it at home. This also, that he might the better perform, He is advis'd to discover what Correspondence he might expect from his Neighbours and Confederates. Therefore he had sent a good while since Sir Robert Wingfield to Negotiate with Maximilian, and draw him to his Party; neither found he much difficulty therein. The Emperor being glad that the Warlike Disposition of our King turn'd it self against France; so that with assurance of his Affection, he encourag'd our King to go on. For Maximilian was now falln off from the French, both that the Pope strongly procur'd it, and that he thought it best to adhere rather to Ferdinand and his Grand-Child's Interests: For pretext whereof, yet alledging only some breach of Article of the Treaty of Cambray on Louis his part. The French on the other side, joyning with the Duke of Ferrara, prepar'd to defend themselves; raising for this purpose a puissant Army, under the command of Gaston de Foix, Duke of Nemours, Governor of Milan, who (in the name of the Pisan Council) fought the Battle of Ravenna, which being won for his King, he lost for himself, as dying (almost wilfully) against a little Body of the Enemies, when the Victory for the rest was gotten. Howbeit, the French under Monsieur de la Palisse proceeding took Ravenna, and divers other places, which they deliver'd to a Cardinal Legate in the name of the Pisan Council, so that they were now (together with this City) Masters of Milan, Genoa, Bononia, and Florence. Nevertheless, as the contrary part led by Raymond de Cardona, (Vice-Roy of Naples under Ferdinand) had in the name of the Holy-League, brought huge Forces into those parts, the French were forc'd to quit all those places, within the space of two Months: (as Sandoval hath it.) Maximilian Sforza (Son to Lodovico) whom the French had divested, being replac'd in Milan, to hold it in the Name, or at least under the protection of the Suisse, whereupon also the Duke of Ferrara (unable any longer to subsist) humbled himself to the Pope, and was pardon'd. Maximilian yet, not content with these Victories, would have added to them Vicenza detain'd by the Venetians. But they refusing, the Pope, whether desirous to conserve Maximilian's friendship at what price soever, (since he had now disavow'd the Pisan Council) or that perchance he thought not himself sufficiently reveng'd on the Venetians, joyns in the Enterprize.

Ferdinand in the mean while, (according to his wonted manner) makes a double Treaty. On the one side therefore, he not only joyn'd Offices with our King to Maximilian for this purpose, but encourag'd him to repair the imputation of slackness laid on the English in their Voyage to Spain, desiring yet, that if he sent any Army again into those parts, it might be under the command of his General. While on the other side, he secretly treated with Louis the Twelfth, for the match above mention'd; promising also to assist him in his Affairs in Italy. That Politick King's Intention being, by one means or other, to divert the French from aiding King John to recover Navarre: (who yet I find * dy'd of grief not long after.) Lastly, our King 1512. remembering how the Scots have usually helpt the French, and being inform'd besides, that James the Fourth did resent still the Death of Breton, and some other Affronts, he sends Nicholas West Dean of Windsor, and Doctor of Law, to know how he stood affected: And the rather, that he was inform'd King James had an Army on Foot. To which he answer'd, That he lov'd and esteem'd alike, both Henry the Eighth, and Louis the Twelfth; and therefore that he thought it best, to be Neutral in any difference betwixt them. West reply'd, that he might do well to signifie thus much by Letters. But King James said, that the sending any Declaration of Neutrality under his Hand, might argue he inclin'd a little to the English side, and consequently might breed a Suspicion; especially when Louis the Twelfth could not be ignorant of the favourable Audience given him, and therewithal dismiss him. Upon whose return; our King taking this Cautelous Answer into mature Consideration, found it arose from a private League betwixt Louis and James, (which our Records furnish us) to this effect.

Articles of a Treaty between the King of France and Scotland, against K. Henry. May 22.

I. Because the King of England's Predecessors have often sought to endamage both Princes and Realms, therefore they combine to resist the same; and one to aid the other perpetually against the said King.

II. If the King of England shall at any time wage War against the King of Scots, the King of France and his Successors shall wage War with all their power against the King of England, and the Scottish King promise the like.

III. Neither King shall suffer his Subjects to serve or aid the King of England against the other.

IV. Neither of the two may take Truce with the King of England, without the other give his consent, or be comprehended therein if he please.

V. If the said Louis decease without Children, and there be strife about the Succession, the King of Scots shall not intermeddle, but accept him who shall be made King, for his friend, and defend him against his Adversaries, if the King of England assist them. And the same Louis promises to do, if the Scottish King decease without Issue.

This Convention shall be confirm'd by the Pope, and neither of the Contrabents shall procure nor accept any Absolution from the Oath.

Our King understanding this, resolv'd to send his Treasurer Thomas Earl of Surrey into Yorkshire, and the Northern parts, to have an Army in readiness, in Case the Scots should stir in his absence. Together with all this provision, He thought fit to call a Parliament, where, besides enacting divers good Laws (whereof I shall hereafter mention some) He obtain'd two fifteens and four demies. He had also a kind of Subsidy, call'd Head or Poll-Money, That is, of every Duke ten Marks; an Earl five Pounds, a Lord four Pounds, a Knight four Marks, every Man valu'd at eight hundred pound in Goods, four Marks: And so after that rate till him who had forty shillings in Wages, who paid Twelvepence, after which every one who was above fifteen years of Age, paid four Pence. Order was also given that Bulwarks, Brays, and Walls, should be rais'd in his Castles, and strong-holds on the Sea-side, wheresoever it was needful.

1513. Feb. 21. Julius the Second expecting now the Success of that War he had kindled against the French, * dyes; in whose place was chosen Cardinal Giovanni di Medici, by the name of Leo the Tenth. This Pope pursuing his Predecessors Designs, encourageth our King to War against France. But he having now accomplish'd the Age of twenty one years, needed little Invitation, and the rather, that he was assur'd by his Ambassadors, Sir Edward Poyning, Sir Thomas Bolen, and John Turg, that Maximilian would really perform his Treaty with him, only he suspected Ferdinand. Therefore (I find by our Records) he sent into Spain, William Knight Doctor of Law; commanding him together with Sir John Stile, to use all Arguments to perswade Ferdinand, that the return of the English Army, was contrary both to his Will and Command; offering further, that if he might have Assistance against France for the Conquest of Guyenne, that 100000 Crowns should be given in hand to Ferdinand, and as much more when it was gotten. For this purpose also promising pay for 6000 Men at six pence per diem for six Months. But Ferdinand now, to whom nothing was dearer, than the Conservation of his Conquest in Navarre, cunningly declin'd this Proposition; as hoping by a Treaty with France, to effect his Purposes; howbeit he advis'd our King to send his Standard Royal with some Forces to Guyenne; and to try whether the People would follow it; since he said, they were very affectionate unto him. But our King gathering hence, as well as by some private Advertisements, that Ferdinand treated secretly with France, resolv'd to press him to declare himself, and therefore by Letters, June 17. he requires Ferdinand to seal a Treaty against France, to which his Ambassadors here had consented. But Ferdinand disavowing his Ambassadors proceeding, since the Holy League (as he said) became void, upon the return of the Kings Army, discovers withal that he had made a Truce with France for one whole year, which he advis'd our King also to accept. The Treaty to which Ferdinand's Ambassadors enter'd at this time, was the Treaty here set down, which I find among our Records, and have mention'd, as being full of design, how ever eluded.

I. The first Article of the Confederation made between the Pope, Emperor, Kings of England and Arragon, against Louis the Twelfth, was to be Friends of the Friends, and Enemies of the Enemies, &c. K. Henry was the Head.

II. To denounce War within 30 days after the date hereof, and within two Months to invade him, viz.

The Pope in Provence or Dauphine.

The Emperor in some other fit place.

The King of England in Aquitaine (or Guyenne) Picardy or Normandy.

The King of Arragon in Bearne, Languedoc, and Aquitaine. Not to desist from Hostility, or make any Truce without common consent.

III. That the Subjects of the Confederates serve not the Enemy under pain of losing Life and Goods.

IV. That the Emperor (if he have not yet done it) shall recall the Authority by him given to the Schismatical Cardinals, and their Conventicle, and within a Month after the date of this, signifying his pleasure to them, shall Void and Nullifie all their Proceedings and Acts in the same.

V. The Pope shall (at the request of the Confederates) fulminate his Ecclesiastical Censures against all that oppose this League.

VI. The King of England shall give the Emperor, (towards the great Charges he shall be at) 100000 Crowns.

VII. Yet the Emperor by his Treaty will not engage his Grand-child Charles (now under his Tuition) into this War with Louis.

But this Treaty being refus'd by Ferdinand, our King proceeds by the help of his other Confederates, to the War with France; the Pope for the more declaring himself, both confirming an Excommunication granted by Julius the Second against James King of Scots, in case he should break the Peace and Treaty with the King of England, and * granting an Indulgence to all that should assist King Henry, and the other Confederates, March.

1513. federates, against Louis and the Schismaticks of the Council of Pisa.

All things here being thus dispos'd for a War, Maximilian with some patience attends the coming of our English Army; as being confident, however the business succeeded between the two Nations, he could make his advantage thereof. That he might do this the better, he thought it not amiss to interpose some difficulties. Neither could he be wholly won, till he had obtain'd of Henry 120000 Ducats towards his charge in bringing 3000 Horse and 8000 Foot which should enter Burgogne, as soon as the King attempted Picardy.

While these Preparations were in hand, our King, to take off James, sends Doctor West again into Scotland, where, instead of all other Offices, that King exhorted ours to a Peace with France, promising on those Terms his Friendship. But our King being resolv'd to proceed, thought fit in the first place to clear the Sea from the French Navy: And therefore sends his Fleet, being compos'd of forty two Sail, besides lesser Barques, against them. The French being inform'd hereof long before, had gotten one Pregent, a Knight of Rodes, (called by our Historians Prior John) with four Gallies to pass the Streights, and come to Britagne, where many good Ships were appointed to join with them. And till they came, it was thought better to keep within the Haven of Brest, than to encounter our Navy lying at Anchor in sight of them. Our Men therefore resolve to attempt them in the middle of their Defences; while they intend this, one of our Ships (under the command of Arthur Plantaginet) was cast away on a blind Rock. This staid our Men a while; at last they pursue their Design, and enter the Haven, where the French Fleet lay under the Covert of many Platforms that were rais'd on the Land. Besides, they had joined twenty four Hulks together, with purpose to set them on fire, and let them go adrift with the Tide, when our English should approach them; or (as our Records have it) to keep the Fire from theirs. Lastly, they moored their Ships as near the Castle as they could, and so attended Pregents coming. Being prepared thus, the Lord Admiral, Sir Edward Howard, considering the order in which the French lay, thought fit to advertise his King and Master thereof, advising him withal to come in Person, and have the glory of this Action. But our King's Council taking this Message into Consideration, and conceiving that it was not altogether Fear (as was thought) but Stratagem and Cunning, that made the French thus attend their Advantage, thought the King was not so much invited to the Honour, as Danger of this Action, and therefore rejected the Overture. Thereupon they write sharply to him again (as our Historians say, though our Records mention not this particular) commanding him to do his Duty. Whereof that brave Cavalier was so sensible, as it caused him to hazard his Person afterwards so rashly, that it occasion'd his death; the manner whereof was thus, as it is drawn out of our Records: Where, by a Letter dated from him, April 17, it appears, That, after he had come before Brest with his Navy, he sent out his Boats, to make a shew of landing; whereupon the French flocking to the shoar, to the number of above 10000 (the English in all the Boats being not above 1500) he thought fit to land over-against Brest, where he burnt the Country in sight of the Castle; the French Ships (the while) lying beneath it, being defended with their Hulks: And that he thought not fit to do any more till Victuals came, whereof he stood then in need, though he said he had them at a great Advantage, their Gallies being not yet come. Together with which Dispatch unto the King, he sent Mr. Arthur Plantaginet, much discourag'd as he said by the casting away of his Ship; and disabled to serve in any other kind, because his Soldiers that remain'd were bestow'd elsewhere. After which I find by another * Letter of Sir Edward Echingham (who was present in the Expedition) that, April 22. six Gallies of the Enemies, (being two more than were expected) and four Foylts under Pregent, put into Blanc-sablon-bay near Conquest, a little below Brest; which being notified to our Admiral, he himself, being attended with four choice Captains, resolv'd to board them April 25. Whereupon entering himself into one of the two Gallies (which only the English had at that time) and committing the other to Walter Devereux Lord Ferrers, he advances with two Row-Barges and two Crayers; in the one of which was Sir Thomas Cheyny and Sir John Wallop, in the other Sir Henry Sherborne and Sir William Sidney; Pregent (this while) lying betwixt two Rocks, that had Bulwarks on them, full of Ordnance. All which yet could not deter our Lord Admiral, who therefore about four in the Afternoon (the same day) boarded the Galley in which Pregent was, and enter'd it with his Sword and Target, one Carroz, a Spanish Cavalier, and seventeen English more attending him, commanding together his Galley to be fastned or graped to his Enemies; but whether the French hewed asunder the Cable, or our Mariners let it slip for fear of the Ordnance, the English Galley fell off, and this Noble Person was left in the hands of his Enemies; of whom therefore our Men could give no other account, but that when he was past all hope of recovering his Gallies, he took his Whistle from his Neck, and flung it into the Sea. The Lord Ferrers in the mean time (who was in the other Galley) fail'd not to do his part, until having spent all his Shot, and seen the Admiral's Galley fall off, he retired; which the Row-Barges also did, as not knowing but the Admiral was safe. The sad News of whose loss yet being at length made known, it was thought fit to send to the French Admiral, to know what was become of him. Whereupon Sir Thomas Cheyny, Sir Richard Cornwall, and Sir John Wallop came to know what Prisoners were taken; to whom Pregent (or Prior John) answered, None, but a Mariner, who told him, that a certain Person they bore overboard with their Pikes was their Admiral. Lastly, he added (in the Letter) that the French in Bordeaux had made six new Gallies, which were shortly expected at Brest, and that our Gallies, as he said, could do the French Men most displeasure.

Sir Edw. Howard, the English Admiral, engages the French.

And is kill'd.

May 4.

The French land in Suffex, and are repuls'd.

Upon news of our Admiral's death, his Place was * presently bestowed on his Brother the Lord Thomas Howard; who, wisely considering the advantage of the French Gallies in a Calm, and number of their Ships, and the danger of the Winds for us, if they blew South-west, desired of the King so many Soldiers as might both man the Ships, and make good the Landing. But before he came, our Fleet (it seems wanting one to command it) was return'd, and Pregent (upon notice thereof) encourag'd to land in Suffex, from whence yet he was quickly repuls'd, without doing more that Year. And now the Lord Admiral having equipp'd the Navy Royal, scoured the Seas, and secur'd our King's intended Passage. The Particularities I shall omit, until (in imitation of Polydore) I have set down the Description of Thomas Woolsey (afterwards Cardinal) a Man at this time beginning to be in special favour with the King, the Original whereof I must

1513. must deduce from his chief Raiser and Founder, Richard Fox Bishop of Winchester. This Bishop, being made Principal Secretary and Privy-Seal, became not only an able, but potent Minister of State; having yet difference with the Lord Treasurer Thomas Earl of Surry, a Noble Man of great Courage and Experience in Affairs, he stood not secure. They had often been reconciled by the King, who not only best knew, but often suffered most for their opposition. Yet as the wiping out of Blots sometimes makes them greater, so Satisfaction for Injuries seldom expiate them so totally, but that some impression remains. Therefore they stood still at a distance, in which Condition yet they wanted not their Advantages on either side. The Bishop had abundant matter to suggest; the huge Treasure, which Henry VII. left, being so exhausted, that it was now almost consumed; while the Lord Treasurer in the disposing of this young King's Bounty, so ordered Business, as in facilitating Dispatches, he got him many Friends and Followers. The Lord Treasurer, on the other side, said, that nothing being done without the King's special Order, it was through Envy only the Bishop thus oppos'd him. In these terms then they stood still, without almost concurring in any thing, but in excluding all others from gaining on the King's Disposition; which yet they did not so much by mutual Consent, as by diminishing in their turns, every body else, that was extraordinarily in his good Opinion. At last the Bishop thinking how to better his Party, brought in this Thomas Woolsey; to which purpose also Sir Thomas Lovell Knight, and Master of the Wards, assisted him. This Man, though of mean Birth, being observed by them to be of a quick and stirring Wit, and particularly famous for a Dispatch in Henry VII. his time, wherein he used extraordinary diligence, was thought a fit Instrument for their purposes. He was already a Chaplain in the Household, and Almoner, and from thence raised to the place of a Counsellor. Being in this nearness he knew as well how to discourse with the King in matter of Learning, (the King being much addicted to the reading of Thomas Aquinas) as to comply with him in his Delights; insomuch, as (saith Polydore) he would sing, dance, laugh, jest, and play with those Youths in whose Attendance and Company the King much delighted. Briefly, (to use Polydore's words) he made his private House Voluptatum omnium Sacram, quo Regem frequenter ducebat: A Receptacle for pleasures of all kinds, where he frequently entertain'd the King. He omitted not yet in the midst of all these Jollities, to speak seriously, representing to all Business to the King, as he got much Credit with him. And this, again, was confirm'd by those Gallants, who contributed no little thereunto. Whereupon he began to tell the King, that he should sometimes follow his studies in School-Divinity, and sometimes take his Pleasure, and leave the care of Publick Affairs to him: Promising that what was amiss in his Kingdom should be rectified. Likewise, he omitted not to infuse Fears and Jealousies of all those whom he conceived the King might affect. Whereby he became so perfect a Courtier, that he had soon attained the height of Favour. For as Princes have Arts to govern Kingdoms, Courtiers have those by which they govern their Princes, when through any Indisposition they grow unapt for Affairs. These Arts being hopes and fears, which as doors and passages to the Heart, are so guarded by their vigilancy, that they can both let themselves in, and keep all others out: And therefore may be termed not only the two ends of that Thred upon which Government

1513. depends, but through their dexterous handling, may be tyed upon what Knot they will. Particularly, he desired to reduce all Businesses to himself; for which End he spake in this manner:

Sir, Your Highness hath now sufficient experience of strange effects, which Contradictions in Councils bring forth: It is unsafe to believe singly either of those on whose advice your Highness most relies, and impossible to believe both. May your Highness therefore choose some one, who being dis-interested, may have no passion or thought but to serve your Highness. All those strong Reasons of State which conclude Monarchy the best form of Government, make for a Favourite in the next place. Insomuch, that of Supreme Authority, as of those Pyramidal heights on which the Statues of Princes were anciently plac'd, I dare say, there can be none well rais'd, that from the lowest foundation is not sharpened by degrees unto its point. But lest this should be thought looking upwards only, be pleas'd a while to look down, and consider things the other way, and the Prospective will hold its Proportion. For how, Sir, should a King conserve his Power, if he divide and let it fall at once on divers inferior Persons? Believe me, Sir, to diffuse it over-suddenly, is to take away not only from the Dignity, but even intireness of it: It being with Authority, as with a Spring or Fountain, which, that it may keep his Course and Name, must be cherish'd and entertain'd, till it grow great, by the Contributions and Concurrences of those lesser Heads that run into it. Kings must never descend but by steps. The more Orders are under them, the higher still they stand. Neither will your other Counsellors think themselves much less'n'd this way; for when they may use the ordinary power and sway allow'd them over their Inferiors, they will not think themselves much concern'd for the rest. Besides, your People will be glad of it, as knowing which way to address their Suits. To leave them more at large, were to expose them to those delays and uncertainties they would never patiently endure. Again, it would be impossible any other way to keep secrecy in Business, (which yet is the life of Council) or almost to find out who is the Divulger. Moreover, when your Highness in some great and perplex'd Affairs, hath occasion to acquaint your Counsellors only with some part of your meaning, what instrument can be so apt as a Favourite? While, if things succeed ill, or otherwise that your Highness would not seem to have the Advice proceed from you, how easily may your Highness disavow all, and lay the fault on him? Thus may your Highness find the many uses you may make of your Favourite. Yet, Sir, let me say, I should never advise your Highness to see by his Eyes, or hear by his Ears only; this were to keep you in too much Darkness and Subjection. To prevent this therefore, be pleas'd to appoint able Persons, and such as may not know of each other, by whom your Highness may be inform'd, not only what is done, but even said vulgarly. Thus shall your Highness take order not to be deceiv'd. As for the more doubtful and intricate parts of Business, which require particular Scrutiny and Examination, your Highness in my Opinion, may do well to have three or four confident Persons, not yet of the Body of your Council, with whom separately your Highness may advise, before those difficulties be brought unto them. This will enable your Highness to speak thereof when you transfer it to the Body of your Council, and make you discern their Opinions; only, if any thing be determin'd, let your Favourite still be the chief Actor in the Execution. Hereof then your Highness may please to advise. Neither will I presume to nominate my self otherwise; only I will crave leave to say thus much, that when your Highness would out of your own Election, think fit to use my best Service herein, I should not doubt but so to establish and conserve your Highness Authority, as to make you the greatest and happiest Prince living. Neither should I fear to fall when any benefit might grow to your Majesty thereby. The young King being perswaded thus, without other Advice or Consideration adopted Woolsey, and thereupon orders him to dispatch his chiefest Affairs. This got him not only Estimation and Addresses, but Presents and rich Gifts from the greatest Persons. They again brought him to that Insolency, that he seem'd not only to forget his Birth, (being a Butchers Son) but all his former Friends; insomuch as no Man (saith Polydore) durst remember him of an ancient Acquaintance. A Badge or Livery whereof (he saith) appear'd in his outward Garment, he being the first (saith the same Polydore) among all Priests, Bishops, and Cardinals, that ever wore Silk for his uppermost Vestment. Yet was it not alone; for as divers other Priests imitated him, some envy was rais'd on the whole Clergy. But this was when Silk was either more rare, or more esteem'd; it being in this Age so common, that it is become the wearing of every mean Person. The Gallants of the Court finding now the Kings favour manifestly shining on Woolsey, apply'd themselves much to him. And especially Charles Brandon, who for his goodly Person, Courage, and Conformity of Disposition, was noted to be most acceptable to the King in all his Exercises and Pastimes. Notwithstanding all which (saith Polydore) the King sadly examin'd busineses himself; and howsoever the chief trust was committed to Woolsey, did not omit yet (as far as his youth would suffer him) to use his own judgment in his weightiest Affairs.

Reasons against the King's going in to France in Person.

Reasons for it.

All preparations for the expedition to France being now hattned, amongst which that of Victualling the Army was (not without a Sarcasm to his Birth) recommended to Woolsey, it was yet controverted whether the King should go in Person. They who oppos'd it, urg'd first their due affection to, and tenderness over him; saying further, that if the King should die without Issue, (however the Succession were undoubted in his Sister Margaret) yet that the People were so affected to the House of York, as they might take Edmund de la Pole out of the Tower, and set him up. That the War in France was not of that Consequence (especially since, with the death of Julius the Second, it seem'd the chief causes of dissention ceas'd) that the King should go in Person, and desert his own Kingdom. On the other side it was alledg'd, that to commit an Army wherein the flower of his Nobility and Kingdom was, to any one Subject, was not only unsafe, but to the prejudice of many worthy Competitors for that Honour. That it was no new thing (whether they regarded the ancient Kings of England, or the modern Emperor, and two French Kings successively) to go in Person with a Royal Army. That the same Providence rul'd every where. But it was reply'd, that till the King had more Issue (and that Masculine) it was against all reason of State to hazzard the Kingdom to those Tumults which might follow; to which Opinion, as the best, it is likely the King would have condescended, had not fresh Letters arriv'd from Maximilian, in the Popes name exhorting him speedily to come; and promising that he would not only give him meeting, but take pay under him. In the mean while it was thought fit that Edmund de la Pole (Son of John de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk, by Elizabeth Sister to Edward the Fourth, who had been made Prisoner by Henry the seventh, and so continu'd many years) should have his Head * struck off; Our King therein but executing what his Father Henry at his departure out of the World commanded, (as Bellay hath it.) And true it is that he was of a turbulent and audacious Spirit: But whether any late matter was alledg'd against him, doth not sufficiently appear to me by any Record. Though some Correspondence with his younger Brother Richard de la Pole (who I find by the French Writers, commanded 6000 French at the Siege of Therouene) might perchance accelerate his End.

The King resolv'd now to go in Person, ^{Hall.} thought fit yet to send his Vanguard before. This was commanded by George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, High Steward of the King's Household, who was accompany'd with Thomas Stanley Earl of Derby, Thomas Docwra Lord Prior of the Order of St. John's, Sir Robert Ratcliffe, Lord Fitz-water, the Lord Hastings, the Lord Cobham, Sir Rice ap Ithor Captain of the Light-Horse, and many other brave Knights and Esquires, and the number of above eight thousand, who came to Calais in Mid May. These being follow'd again with the Middleward of about six thousand more, commanded by the Lord Herbert, Lord Chamberlain to the King (whom also the Earls of Northumberland, Kent, and Wiltshire, the Lords Audley and De-la-ware, the Barons Carow and Cursyn, and divers other worthy Knights and Esquires, accompany'd) arriv'd at Calais fifteen days after. These two Lords attending the Kings further Directions, stay'd there till June 17. when they both in good order of Battel march'd towards Therouene, before which Town they arriv'd upon the two and twentieth following, pitching their Tents about a Mile off. This Town was fenc'd with a large Ditch, strong Bulwarks, and quantity of great Ordnance, which shot freshly, insomuch that the Baron of Carow Master of the Ordnance was the first night kill'd by a Bullet in the Lord Herberts Tent, which came so near him, that the French (though erroneously) writ he was slain there. ^{They attack Therouene. I. de Serr.}

The Earl of Shrewsbury planted himself on the North-west, and the Lord Herbert on the East side of the Town, whence they made their approaches. In the Town was a Garrison of about two thousand Foot, and two hundred and fifty Lances, commanded by Monsieur Francois de Teligny, and Antoine de Crequy, Sieur de Pondromy: To relieve them again, the French rais'd a puissant Army, to which ten thousand Men under the Duke of Gueldres, and six thousand more under Richard de la Pole, Brother to Edmund lately Beheaded, were added.

In the mean while our King having constituted Queen Katharine Regent, passeth the Sea to Calais upon the last of June; bringing with him the rest of his Army, which was transported with about 400 Sail: With him came also the Almoner, and new Favorite, Thomas Woolsey, who for having liv'd long in that Town under the Treasurer thereof, was perfectly acquainted with the Addresses of it. The King being visited by the Ambassadors of the Emperor, the Regent of Flanders, and Duke of Brumwic, stay'd here till the 21 of July, when hearing that the French meant to relieve Therouene, under the Command of Louis Duc de Longueville, and Marquis de Rotelin, whom le Seigneur de la Palisse, as also the famous Bayard, la Fayette, Clermont d'Anjou; and Buisse d'Amboise accompany'd, he hasten'd his departure. His Army consisted of about 9000 good fighting Men, besides those who belong'd to the Carriages, which were some 2000 or 3000 more. Sir Charles Brandon (a little before * Crea- May 15. ted Viscount Lisle) had the Vanguard, whom the Earl of Essex (Lieutenant-General of the Spears) accompanied. In the Battel the King came, having the Duke of Buckingham on the one hand with 600 chosen Men, and Sir Edward Poyning on the other with as many more; Sir Henry Guilford carrying the Standard Royal. In the spaces betwixt, the great Ordnance (among which Bellay mentions those call'd the 12 Apostles) was drawn, and part of the Carriages dispos'd. After all these yet came Sir Anthony Oughtred and John Neville with 400 Spears. This little, but flourishing Army, was scarce enter'd the French Confines near Ardres, when news was brought that the Enemy appear'd. Hereupon Sir Rice ap Thomas (who came from Therouene with 500 Light-Horse to meet the King) joyning with the Earl of Essex, and Sir Thomas Guilford, who commanded 200 Archers on Horse-back, drew towards the French, but they presently disappear'd. As they march'd yet, two pieces of Ordnance miscarry'd, the one

* July 28. whereof was * lost, the other † recover'd in despite of the French. Upon the fourth of August the King came to Therouene, before which he caus'd a sumptuous Pavilion to be pitch'd. Sir Alexander Baynam, Captain of the Pioneers, shortly after caus'd a Mine to be made under the Walls; but the French countermining, it was well disputed, and divers kill'd on both parts. Aug 9. Maximilian being * now come to Ayre, it was thought fit an Interview should be made. But the day being very foul, the Ceremony was short.

Aug 11. About two days after, Lyon King of Arms in Scotland in his Heralds Coat, comes to the Camp, and desires leave to deliver a Letter * to the King. Garter brings him in. The King having perus'd the Contents (which were Expostulation for some pretended Injuries, and thereupon denunciation of War unless he return'd) makes a sharp Answer by word of Mouth, among other things telling him, That he had left an Earl behind him in the North, who could very well defend his Kingdom against the attempts of his Master. But Lyon refus'd to carry any verbal Message. Whereupon our King thought fit by Letter again, to answer to this purpose, That he understood this Expostulation, to be nothing but the picking of a Quarrel to assist the French, and invade him in his absence. That he wish'd him to call to mind how John King of Navarre, for aiding the French in the same manner, lost his Kingdom; and advis'd him to take that for a warning. Lastly, He bid him be assur'd, that what he did to him or his Realm now he was absent, should be remembered, and requited again in like measure. Before yet these Letters could be deliver'd by Lyon, his King and Master James the Fourth was kill'd, as shall be hereafter related.

Aug 12. Upon the twelfth of August, Maximilian the Emperor came to the King, in the quality of his Soldier, and therefore not only wore the Cross of St. George, but receiv'd his pay duly, which I find by some, to have been a hundred Crowns per diem. Notwithstanding which, that all due respect might be render'd to his Person, the King gave order to lodge him according to his Dignity, in a Tent of Cloth of Gold, for the rest most sumptuously entertaining him the space of two days that he stay'd in the Camp. Therouene was not yet so streightly besieg'd, but that on the one side which was towards the River Lys, there was a way open, on which part the French intended to relieve it. The King therefore commanded five Bridges to be instantly made over the said River, by which himself with Maximilian 1513. mish, fled away in much Disorder, which seem'd the stranger, that the fight was between the Horsemen only, and many of the bravest of their Nation were among them; Our Men pursued and took Louis Duc de Longueville, Marquis de Rotelin, Bayard, Fayette, Clermont, and Buisse d'Ambois, and brought them away, together with nine Cornets. The Seigneur de la Palisse, and Monsieur d'Imbrecourt were also taken, but agreeing for their Ransom upon the place, were presently let free, or as others say, escap'd. This Battle hapning the 16th of August, was call'd by the French, la Journée des Espérons, because they made little use of any thing but their Spurs, for the good success whereof therefore both the King, and Maximilian the Emperor (wearing still his Badge of the Red-Cross) did upon the place congratulate with each other, and afterwards assisted at a solemn Te Deum for this easie Victory.

Aug 16. Neither had the French better fortune, in setting upon a Convoy going with Provisions for our Army betwixt Guisnes and Therouene, they being repuls'd (as Bellay hath it) and Monsieur de Pleffis slain. While the French held Battle with our King as is aforesaid, part of their Cavalry, which had divided it self that it might the better bring in Provision, fell on the quarter of the Earl of Shrewsbury, and Sir Rice ap Thomas on the other side of the Water; but they were also soon repuls'd, though the Garrison and Townsmen taking this occasion, sallied forth upon the Trenches of the Lord Herbert to make a Diversion; for that Lord being prepar'd to receive them, they were quickly beaten in again. Few days after the Seigneur de Pontdormy despairing to keep the place long * yielded both it and the Ordnance to the King, upon Condition they might depart with their Arms, Bagg and Baggage, and Drums beating in Military Order. Which being done, our King and the Emperor (who as I find it confirm'd in an Ancient Manuscript Diary extant in our Records, still gave our King the Precedence) entred the Town, August 24.

This City being gotten, it was now disputed whether our King should hold it; a question which could not but seem strange as well to the Authors of the Council as Complices in the hazard, especially since it cost so much, as Guicciardine doubts not to call it, Spesa intollerabile & infinita; Howbeit it was at last resolv'd, that because it so confin'd on Maximilians Territories, and that the Garrison infested his Subjects by frequent Incurfions, that at Maximilians Intreaty, the Town should be raz'd, save only the Church and Religious Houses; so much did our King defer to the Emperor Maximilian for being his Soldier, and taking pay under him. Besides, our King consider'd that to leave any Troops behind, would disable his further designs, for which Motives therefore he gave the Town to Maximilian, who levell'd it, which yet I find was not so done, but that the French did shortly after repair, and put it into defence. From hence the King (being perswaded to it by Maximilian) resolves to besiege Tournay; But by the way, being diverted by the Princess Marguerites perswasions (who desired much to see him at Lile) he pass'd three days in her Company, and the many fair Ladies that attended her; when remembering himself, that it was time to visit his Army (which lay at some distance from him strongly encamp'd) he takes leave of the Ladies. Being now out of the Gates a Mile or two, some such mist happen'd both to him and all his Train, that they had lost themselves; neither could they resolve which way to turn, until a Victualler coming by chance from his Army, both inform'd him where it lay, and conducted him thither, to the great rejoycing of

The 15th of Septemb. the Army (which Maximilian had now left, upon pretence of I know not what unsatisfaction which yet was shortly repair'd,) set down before Tournay, which thereupon was summon'd to yield; but the greater part refusing, the King encamping on the North, the Earl of Shrewsbury on the South, and the Lord Herbert on the West of the Town began their Batteries. When upon the 21st a Messenger from the Earl of Surrey brought the Gantlet, or as * others say, the Coat-Armour of James the Fourth, as a Token of the Victory obtain'd at Flodden. This, as it rejoyc'd the King, so it put him in mind of the Vicissitude of all worldly things. Therefore he temper'd his Mirth with a serious Consideration of the events to which Wars are subject. Howsoever, he caus'd Te Deum to be sung publicly the day following, and a Sermon to be preach'd by the Bishop of Rochester, who laid all the fault on that King's breach of Word. Which day also those of Tournay capitulated and yielded to our King, by the name of Roy Tres-Chrestien (as I find in the Original * Contract) upon condition of Fidelity, and present payment of fifty thousand Crowns de Soleil, and a yearly Pension of four thousand pounds Tournois, for the space of ten years. Whereupon the King, as John Taylor Doctor of Law, present at the Siege, faith in his Manuscript Latin Diary, gave them leave to enjoy their Ancient Customs and Liberties; upon Condition yet they should admit a Garrison. Neither as it seems could they do otherwise; the French being so much discourag'd by their late Misfortune, that they did not attempt the relieving of it. Thus, on the 24th of September, our King enter'd the Town Triumphantly. And here, upon Consultation what was next to be done, it was resolv'd to surcease the War for this year, Winter now beginning to enter. It was thought fit also, to leave Sir Edward Poyning with a strong Garrison to keep it. Which cannot but seem strange, to those who consider that Therouene was raz'd; since Therouene was nearer the English Pale, and might be better defended, and would besides, have kept the passage open to this. But false Counsels are like false Gemmes; which how counterfeit soever, have (when they are well set) one good light to be seen by. Therefore Woolsey, (who was so much Author of this Council, as he got the Bishoprick of the place thereby) could glose his advice, with telling the King, he might now have confidence in Maximilian, as having serv'd under him. Besides, that the razing of Therouene at his request, would put a perpetual obligation on him. But as for Tournay, that it was fit it should be kept as a Trophée of his Victories; and the rather, that Caesar (in his Commentaries) confesseth here, more than in any place else, to have found a valourous Resistance. But how well the Arguments were grounded, the sequel will shew. The first use our King made of this Town, was to repay the Courtesies receiv'd of the Princess Margaret. Hereupon she being invited, came thither, as also her Nephew Charles Prince of Castile; (afterwards Emperor,) between whom and his Sister Mary, there had interceded a kind of Contract, (as is before related) ever since the time of their Father Henry the Seventh; which likewise for the present seem'd to be confirm'd betwixt them, insomuch that they came to divers Particularities; among which one was, that the King should bring her with him the next Spring. I find also some Overture of a Match between Charles Brandon, now Lord Lisle, and the said Princess Margaret; which, though it took no effect, was not yet without much Demonstration of outward Grace and Favour on her part. In the mean while, that the Ladies and the Emperor who came with them, might be receiv'd according to their Quality and Worth, the King taking the said Lord for his Associate, did * hold a solemn Jufts there against all Commers; which he bravely perform'd. And now having feasted the Ladies Royally for divers days, he † departed from Tournay to Lisle, where he was invited by the Lady Margaret; who caus'd there a Jufts to be held in an extraordinary manner; the place being a large Room, rais'd high from the ground by many Steps, and pav'd with black square Stones like Marble; while the Horses to prevent sliding and noise, were shod with felt or flocks, (the Latin words are feltra sive Tomento.) After which, the Lords and Ladies danc'd all Night.

Yet, as I find by Foreign Authors, these Jollities were not the only cause of his stay. For Ferdinand (the first mover of these Troubles) hearing that the War against France was likely to cease for this year, sends Pedro de Orrea, and Juan de la Nuca, and Gabriel de Orti to Henry the Eighth, with Commission to treat for a League, by which both Kings, with the Emperor, should severally enter France the next Spring: And that, for this purpose, each of them should from their Frontiers begin the War. That Ferdinand therefore from Navarre should invade Guyenne with fifteen thousand five hundred Foot, and one thousand five hundred Horse of his own Subjects, and to be paid by him; and six thousand Germans, to be paid at the rate of twenty thousand Crowns Monthly by the King of England. In Consideration whereof, the War was to be made in the said King of England's Name, and for the recovery of his Patrimony in Guyenne. On the other side, that the King of England assist by Maximilian, should with sixteen thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse, from his Territories, invade Normandy or Picardy; and that they should not relinquish this War without mutual consent. Lastly, there was place left for the Pope, the Prince, Arch-Duke, the Duke of Milan, the Swiss and the Florentines, to enter into this League; which was Sign'd at Lisle on the 17th of October, by Richard Bishop of Winchester, and the Marquis Dorset on our Kings part; The Seigneur de Berghes first Gentleman of the Bedchamber to the Emperor, and Gerard de Pleine President of his Council; and Pedro de Orrea, Don Luis Carroz, and Juan de la Nuca, Ambassadors of Ferdinand. This being done, and the King for the rest testifying much Satisfaction, departed thence, and two days after in good order of Battel, came to Calais, having in this Voyage bestowed honour upon divers persons of Worth. Sir Thomas Cornwall, Baron of Burford, Sir Thomas Leighton, Sir Tho. Blount, Sir Henry Sacheverel, &c. being made Knights Bannerets; and Sir John Maynwaring, Sir John Scuth, Sir John Digby, &c. created Knights. And here the King gave order for securing Tournay, as well as the rest of his Possessions in those parts, which being done, and the wind proving fair, he shortly came to his Queen at Richmond, who had long expected him.

Having now related the King's Expedition (which I was unwilling to interrupt by any intervening Occasion) I must return to the Narration of that Battel, which was fought betwixt James the Fourth, and Thomas Earl of Surrey, commonly call'd Flodden-field. This King retaining in his Mind some rancour for divers Causes formerly related, thought he could not any time more seasonably revenge himself, or for the rest give a more acceptable Testimony of his love to Louis the Twelfth, than now in the King's absence, by invading his Realm. Therefore, having

The Scots War.

1513. Aug. ving first denounc'd War by his Herald, he sent Alexander Lord Humes, his Chamberlain, to forrage the Borders; which Sir William Bulmer hearing, used that Diligence, that he overtook and fought with him in his Retreat, so that he recover'd a rich Booty. The King hereupon in Person, with an Army of sixty thousand (some write a hundred thousand) Men, enters the Country, and, after a few days Siege, takes Northampton-Castle. Thomas Earl of Surrey hereupon hastens his Army, which consisted of twenty six thousand, appointing his Son the Lord Admiral to come by Sea, and meet him at or near Alnwick, in Northumberland. This brave Lord fail'd not his time, bringing with him also about one thousand Men; of whom when the Earl had taken view, and given order in what place every one should fight, he marches towards the King; who had remov'd his Army to an Hill call'd Flodden (or Fluden) on the edge of the Mountain Cheviot; where he strongly entrench'd himself. The Scotch Writers here relate, that many of their Country-Men (for want of Victuals) secretly fled home, leaving the Kings Troops but thin. Our Writers on the other side, make the Scotch-Men much superior in Number. Howsoever, the Earl of Surrey desir'd nothing more than to fight, as finding the whole Country thereabouts so forrag'd and spoil'd, that he could not long subsist. Therefore on Sunday, Sept. 4. he thought fit to send Rouge-Croix Herald, with a Trumpet, and Instructions to James the Fourth, to tell him, That in regard he had violat'd his Faith and League, and hostily enter'd the English Ground, that on Friday next he would bid him Battel, if the said King would stay so long in England, and accept it. The Lord Thomas his Son, also requir'd Rouge-Croix particularly to certifye the King of his Journey by Sea; and that, because he could meet no Scotch Ships there, he thought fit to land, that he might justifie Andrew Breton's Death; And added further, as he look'd for no Mercy from his Enemies, so he would spare none but the King only, if he came in his Hands. And to make all this good, that he would be in the Vanguard of the Battel. Lastly Rouge Croix was charg'd, if any were remanded, he should (for preventing espial) bring him no nearer than two Miles unto the Camp. James the Fourth receiv'd this Message gladly, and as he was a Prince of great Courage, by his own Herald assures the Earl, that he did so much desire to encounter him, that tho' he had been at Edinburgh, he would have left all business for that purpose: And therefore wish'd him to rest assur'd, he would not fail to abide Battel the day nam'd, which was Friday. This being done, the Herald delivers a Protestation from his King and Master, in these very words, being in answer to the former exhortation of the Earls.

Sept. 4. Hall. His defence of his invading England. As to the Causes alledg'd of our coming into England, against our Bond and Promise (as is alledg'd,) thereto we answer; Our Brother was bound as far to us, as we to him; and when we swore last before his Ambassador in presence of our Council, we express'd especially in our Oath, that we would keep to our Brother, if our Brother kept to us, and not else. We swear our Brother brake first unto us. And since his Breach, we have requir'd divers times him to amend. And lately we warn'd our Brother, as he did not us ere he brake. And this we take for our Quarrel, and with God's Grace shall defend the same at your assign'd time, which with God's Grace we shall abide. Hereupon the Earl advancing, came within three Miles of Flodden; but perceiving that the King still kept upon the Hill, which was unapproachable, He sent Rouge Croix again, with a Letter subscrib'd by himself, his Son the Lord Admiral, and divers other principal Noblemen and Knights, where in 1513. respectful Terms, they provok'd him to descend from his Fortifications, and fight in a large Plain call'd Milfeild (which lay between them) upon Friday following; alledging for this purpose, the promise they receiv'd from his Grace heretofore. But no Satisfactory Answer being given to this, and the Heralds being return'd on either side, the Earl removes with his Army to such a place, that if the Scotch-Men would not leave the advantage of their Site, he might cut off their Victuals, and consequently draw them down. James the Fourth hereupon firing his Huts, dislodges covertly by the benefit of the Smoak, and keeping still on the higher Ground, at last he commands a stay. Presently after the Earl also traversing some Boggs and Marshes, till he arriv'd to the bottom of this Bank, found the ascent not very steep, and thereupon encourageth his Men to fight. This done he marcheth up; the Vanguard was led by his two Sons, the Lord Thomas and Sir Edmund; the Battle by himself, and the Rear by Sir Edward Stanley. The Lord Dacres with his Horse, being appointed as a Reserve on all occasions. The King observing this well, and judging that it was not without much disadvantage that the English came to fight, exhorts his Men to behave themselves like brave Soldiers, and thereupon joyns Battle. Sir Edmund Howard at first was in some distress, by the singular Valour of the Earls of Lenox and Argile, but the Lord Dacres coming to his Succour, as also one Heron, the fight was renew'd; the Lord Thomas Howard pursu'd his Point better, yet so, as he found a brave opposition from the Earls of Crawford and Montross. The Kings Battle, and the Earls likewise maintain'd together a long and sharp fight. This while Sir Edward Stanley by force of Archers, constrain'd the Scots to descend the Hill, inasmuch that for avoiding his storm of Arrows, they open'd their Ranks, and therein seem'd to give one of the first Overtures for Victory. The King perceiving the Disorder, redoubl'd his Courage, inasmuch that our Writers confess he had almost overthrown the Earls Standards. But the Lord Thomas Howard, and Sir Edward Stanley, who had discomfited their opposites coming to Succors, and the Lord Dacres also flying in with his Horse, the Scots were so hardly put to it, that for their last defence they cast themselves into a Ring; in that order of fight doing all that valiant Men possibly could to defend themselves. No Man yet did in his Person more than the King; Inasmuch, that pressing on still, he was at last kill'd on the place, as our Writers have it. The Scotch Writers yet say it was one Elphinstone, who wearing the same Arms the King did, was taken for him, affirming further that the King fled over the River Tweed, and was there (I know not how) slaughter'd. The fight continuing three hours, made the event doubtful, and the execution great. In conclusion, most of the nobler fort, one Archbishop, and two Bishops, besides four Abbots on the Scots side were slain there, and about ten thousand others. On our side (says Polydore) there died about five thousand, others say fewer; so that as it was a Bloody Victory, it might be thought somewhat uncertain till the next Morning, when the Body suppos'd for the King's, and so acknowledg'd by divers of both Nations (as our Historians say) was found among the dead Carcasses, having receiv'd (as our Writers have it) a mortal wound with an Arrow, and another with a Bill. The Scots lay the occasion of their Overthrow chiefly on some of their Troops that look'd on, and never so much as gave stroak. But that we may leave these things to their Relations, I find after this Battle the Scots that remain'd, main'd, return'd home much griev'd for the unfortunate success of that Day, being Sept. 9. The Earl took all the Ordnance, and particularly seven extraordinary fair Culverins, call'd the seven Sisters. And so after giving God thanks, dismiss'd the greatest part of his Army, and retir'd himself home, until News of the King's coming to Richmond brought him thither, taking order in the mean time, that the dead Body, being embalm'd, should be carried first to New-Castle, and after to Shene in Surry; though, as that King was excommunicate, it may be doubted, whether it were buried in any Consecrate place; since I find by Breve dated November 29. 1513, and extant in our Records, that our King obtain'd a Breve from the Pope, for transferring the Body to St. Paul's in London. Upon condition yet, that the Bishop of London should first absolve the said James, and our King Nomine ipsius aliquam convenientem penitentiam adimpleret; in his Name underwent some fitting Penance.

Regni 5.

Our King now (the Parliament still sitting) establish'd an Order, how the Subjects he had in his new Acquisitions in France, might recover their Debts from those in England, as well as the English from them. Moreover it was enacted, that every Person that would sue for the King's Pardon, upon certain Articles, should have it.

In this Parliament also Margaret, Daughter of George Duke of Clarence, late Wife of Sir Richard de la Pole Knight, petitioned, That since, by Act of Parliament, 19 Henrici VII. Edward Earl of Warwick was declar'd Traytor, and so his Lands forfeited; it would please the King, that she might inherit (as being Sister and next of Blood) his State and Dignity, and so be stiled Countess of Sarum; which was granted.

A Tumult in London by the Apprentices.

I find little else memorable this Year among our Historians, save only a Commotion in London; which hapned on this manner. The Villages of Islington, Hockston, and Shoreditch having so inclos'd their Grounds, that they debarr'd the Citizens from their accusom'd Freedom and Exercises; the Apprentices of London threw down the Hedges and Ditches, after this manner. A Turner running in a Fools-Coat through the Streets, and crying Shovels and Spades, was presently follow'd in such numbers, as all their Inclosures were quickly levell'd. For which therefore the Lord Mayor was well check'd, and command given him to prevent further Mischief.

The French King, now finding two principal Frontier Towns taken, the Flower of his Chivalry made Prisoners, while the rest ran away, his best Confederate James IV. kill'd, and the chief Administration of Scottish Affairs devolv'd to the hands of Margaret, Sister to King Henry VIII. (at least until she married again,) a League, in opposition to him, sworn by three the most puissant Princes of Christendom: The Pope animating all this against him, under the odious name of a Schismatick; and lastly, himself far stricken in years, begins to think how best he might come off. And, to this, he had but a Winter's space; for the War was to begin the next Spring. He negotiates therefore with the Pope first. To this End he offers satisfaction for his Obstinacy; next, he stipulates to give way to the accomplishing the Pope's Designs in Bononia, and elsewhere; to renounce the Council of Pisa, and accept that of Lateran, promising withal to remand the Cardinal Bernardino, (whom as the Pope desired to have, so he graciously pardoned.) Lastly, whereas great Inconveniences might follow, not only to his Holiness, but all Christendom, if, by these Intestine Wars a passage were made open for Selyme the Turk to invade it, (who had lately taken eighteen strong Places near Presburg in Hungary,) he promiseth his assistance against them. All which being taken by the Pope into serious consideration, makes him relent; and, in sequence thereof, not only recommends Peace and Unity to all Christian Princes, and particularly to our King, but, shortly after enters into a League against the Turk; for this purpose using those potent Ministers of his the Church-men, who were in favour with their several Princes. Louis the twelfth also draws Maximilian off, partly by representing the danger above-mention'd in Hungary, which (next Ladislaus) most concern'd him; and partly by according the demands he made about divers pretences in Burgogne; and lastly urges some Discontents remaining in Maximilian's Mind, ever since Henry VIII. and himself met last, (though in effect they were little more than Puntiglios, ordinarily hapning on the Interview of great Princes.) And for Ferdinand he was easily taken off, so that he might enjoy Navarre, and for the rest keep his Authority in Italy. To which therefore Louis the twelfth condescended, proroguing the * last years Truce with him for twelve Months longer. Lastly, because Henry VIII. was (without all these) able alone to find him work, he offers his Friendship, and Alliance in matching with his Sister the Princess Mary, thought then one of the fairest Ladies of her time. To strengthen this Proposition also, he advertises our King, that Charles Prince of Castile (afterwards Charles V.) was treating of a Marriage with Anne Daughter of Ladislaus King of Hungary; and were it in earnest, that he intended to match with his Sister the Princess Mary, that yet (being but fourteen Years old in February next) he was not ripe enough for her; concealing in the mean time that himself was as much too old.) He privately also acquainted the King how Ferdinand did but deceive him; as one, that would at all times be drawn to his Party, when he might enjoy Navarre. Together with which, it is probable he did reveal the aforefaid secret Truce made by the Spanish Secretary Quintana, betwixt himself and Ferdinand for one Year more. An Article whereof was, that, during the said Truce, Louis XII. should not molest Milan. He told him, besides, that Maximilian's Designs were on the Venetians, and not on France. And that the Levies in Flanders for the Wars propos'd against France the next Year, were and should be retarded by the Princess Marguerite, purposely, because her Father had other Designs: All which was represented to the King by private and confident Messengers, who under colour of treating for the delivery of Louis Duc de Longueville, and the rest who were Prisoners of War, negotiated this great Affair. Our King hereupon disdain-ing to be twice deceived by his Father-in-law Ferdinand, and detesting withal the Ingratitude and Levity of Maximilian, agreed a League with Louis XII. upon the seventh of August 1514. for the term of their joint lives and one Year after. The effect was, That all former Offences should be remitted and abolish'd, Traffick restor'd, and all Impositions on Strangers since fifty two Years last past, extinguish'd. That no Letters of Merque should be granted, but against the principal Delinquents, and that only in case Justice were denied. That no Robbers by Land, or Pirates by Sea should be maintain'd on either side. That Rebels and Fugitives should not be entertain'd, but render'd (within twenty days after Requisition) to their Sovereigns. That they should be Friends to the Friends, and Enemies to the Enemies of each other. That (for mutual defence of their present Estates) Louis XII. should furnish at the requisition of Henry VIII. one thousand two hundred Lances by Land, and five thousand Men at Sea, with convenient Shipping. And Henry VIII. ten thousand Archers

But if either of the two Kings shall require Aid of the other for the recovery of his Pretensions, then Louis shall lend King Henry six hundred Lances only, and King Henry him but five thousand Archers for Land-Service; the Sea Forces retaining the numbers above-mention'd. All this to be at the cost of the Demandant. Yet, if either of the said Princes shall be invaded, only for the cause of this Confederacy, then the other shall aid him at his own Charge. If War be made by common Consent, neither Prince may make Peace severally. That the English Merchants should have their ancient Privileges at Bourdeaux restor'd. That this Treaty should be publish'd and ratifi'd by the Pope, (by whom it was chiefly procur'd) with a Clause of Excommunication on the Infraction. Among the Allies of each Prince, the Scots also were comprehended herein, upon Condition, that after Septemb. 15. they should make no Incurfion on the English by publick Authority; and if any were otherwise made, that satisfaction should be speedily given. Besides this, the French Writers confess there was a Treaty apart, by which Louis promised to pay Henry VIII. a Million of Crowns, the said Henry rendering him an Obligation, by which Charles Duke of Orleans, Father of the said Louis, and other Princes of France were bound to pay the said Sum. For, whereas Charles VIII. Predecessor to Louis XII. by a Treaty at Estaples 1492, bound himself and his Heirs to pay King Henry VII. and his Heirs the Sum of 745000 Crowns; and, after the death of the said Charles, Louis XII. bound himself and his Heirs to pay so much as remain'd thereof, and this Bond was twice made by the said Louis XII. first to Henry VII. 1498, and after to Henry VIII. 1510. And whereas (besides this Bond) the aforesaid Charles had bound himself to the Lady Marguerite Dutcheff of Sommerfet, Anno 1444, to pay her a certain Sum of Money, which was not yet discharged. Therefore, as also for confirming the Amity betwixt Louis and Henry, the said Louis did now bind himself and Heirs in a Bond of a Million of Crowns to be paid to King Henry VIII. in his Town of Calais, at several times, (viz.) November 1. next following fifty thousand Francs; and May 1. next, so much more, and so till the whole were paid. (Which Obligation I find in an Original thereof, dated Sept. 14. 1514.) All which minuted by Louis de Longueville (called by some Louis d'Orleans Duc de Longueville) during his restraint, was at last thus fully concluded. The Princess Mary also was to be consigned to him, with convenient speed; notwithstanding (saith Polydore) the King had secretly destin'd her once to another, who though he gave place, when it was so much for her Dignity, yet married her not long after. The Condition for the Marriage, betwixt the said Louis XII. and Mary the King's Sister, were these, as we find them in our Records.

That, 1. within ten Days following, Matrimony shall be contracted by both Persons by Proxies, per verba de presenti. 2. After the Contract above-said, within two Months, the King of England shall send and convey her, with Jewels and Household-stuff fitting her Estate, to Abbeville in France; where, within four days following the said Louis XII. shall solemnly marry her. 3. King Henry shall give with the Princess Mary four hundred thousand Crowns; of which Sum (in regard of the traduction of the Lady, her Apparels, Jewels, &c.) Louis will be content to accept the one half, i. e. two hundred thousand Crowns, and to pay himself the rest out of the Monies which by the late Treaty he is obliged to pay King Henry. 4. Louis shall assign to the Princess Mary a Jointure as great as any Queen of France (and namely as Queen Anne the last Queen) hath had. And this during her life she shall enjoy, wheresoever she reside. 5. If Louis die first, then the Princess Mary, during her life, shall enjoy her Dowry and Jointure, and all Jewels which the Queens of France have used to enjoy after the death of their Husbands. 6. If Louis survive the said Princess, then he shall have and enjoy her Portion, Jointure, Jewels, and Goods, according to the Custom of France.

While these things were in agitation, the King (who called to mind many that had serv'd him with much Fidelity, Courage, and Success in his late Occasions and Enterprizes) thought he could not do any thing more justly and prudently, than to bestow some condign Recompence upon them; it being such a Mystery of State as not only gives the greatest Lustre of Regal Authority, but of that Consequence, as being used well, there will be little need of Punishment. The Reward to these brave Cavaliers he had selected out for this purpose, the King thought good to invest in honour chiefly. Therefore upon the second of February, Thomas Earl of Surrey was by him created Duke of Norfolk; (a Title * before conferr'd on John his Father by Richard III. and then again extinguisht.) His eldest Son, the Lord Thomas Howard also being substituted Earl of Surrey. Together with which he had an augmentation of Arms for his Atchievement in Flodden-Field. Sir Charles Somerset also, being in Elizabeth his Wife's right, (who was Daughter and Heir to William Herbert, Earl of Huntingdon) Lord Herbert of Chesfow, Gower, and Ragland, was created Earl of Worcester. Sir Charles Brandon, Viscount Lisle was now also created Duke of Suffolk; and Sir Edward Stanley, not long after made Lord Mounteagle. Lastly, Thomas Woolsey Bishop of Tournay, was constituted Bishop of Lincoln.

The King, being at some rest now from transmarine Affairs, begins to look towards Scotland; upon which he had many Advantages. For as the two Princes, left by King James, were very young; his Sister Queen Margaret (their Mother) having the Administration of all the Affairs there; the chief and most active part of their Nobility kill'd, there wanted not many occasions to prevail himself of; whereupon also, either by gentle means or otherwise by force, he resolv'd to procure an Interest in the Government of that Kingdom. To this it conduced not a little, that those Nobles which remain'd, betwixt Envy and Ambition, were distracted among themselves. The Queen foreseeing well, that, in this ill condition of Affairs, many Inconveniences might follow, in a Country, whereof (by special Clause of a Testament made by the King before the last Expedition) she was declar'd Regent, as long as she continued unmarried, sends to the King her Brother, to crave his Advice and Assistance; beseeching him withal, that he would desist from Hostility. The King most generously answer'd, that, If the Scots would have Peace, he would keep Peace; if they would have War, he would likewise have War. Thus were all things compos'd for the present, and James V. (being not two years old) in Parliament declar'd King, in February 1514. Yet as, not long * after, she took to Husband Archibald Dowglass Earl of Angus (one both for Birth and other Perfections the eminentest she could chuse in that Country) some Innovations and Troubles ensued. For while Dowglass labour'd by his private Power to supply that Authority, which by marrying him, she seem'd to have lost; the Kingdom was broken into Factions. The favourers of Dowglass allerdg'd, there was no other way to keep Peace, but by submitting all to Queen Margaret; for, since the King of England did therefore only desist from pursuing his Victory, because the Administration of Affairs was in his Sisters hands, it were best to leave them there; to erect any other

1514. other form of Government, were to draw the English in again; and when all their forces united were not able to resist him absent, what might they attend from him present? Especially, when not only their chief strength was lost in the late Battel, but Henry should find a Party with his Sister, (both in her own Name, and in the King her Sons) would make for him. The other Faction (whereof Alexander Humes was chief) urg'd the Ancient Custom of Scotland, which in these cases, he said, did always choose some Protector or Vice-Roy. Neither did it hinder, that they had hitherto pay'd so much deference to the Vertues of the Queen, that as long as possibly there was pretext for it, by the King's Testament, they had admitted her for Regent: For now, since by Marriage of Dowglafs, she had voluntarily relinquish'd that Power; that the Country therefore should resume their wonted Right and Priviledges. For, if in the most quiet and serene times, Women had been excluded from Government, how much more now? Yet was not this the only reason that mov'd Humes. For, while he doubted lest the ancient followers of his House should by the Power of Dowglafs be now drawn from him, he left nothing unattempted that might diminish and weaken either him or the Queens Authority. Therefore he recommended every where John Stewart Duke of Albany, Cousin-German by the Father to James the Fourth; who, though then in France, was yet of great esteem at home. This again, was seconded by the Arts of the French, who could by no means suffer the good Affection of that Nation to be divided, much less drawn from them. Howbeit Louis thought not fit openly to discover himself, as fearing to offend our King, with whom he was now contracting a strait League and Affinity. Therefore he would not suffer the Duke to come into Scotland, though not long before * elected Governor; by the Queens consent as was pretended; which yet may be doubted; she protesting † to our King afterwards, it was extorted from her.) Howsoever, after the Death of Louis he was sent over, (as shall be shew'd hereafter) well furnish'd both with Men and Money, to take Possession of the chief Government of all things, during the Minority of the Prince.

While busineses were now in preparation for Peace and Allyance betwixt our King and Louis the Twelfth, it was thought fit for discharge of the King's Engagement and Honour, to send to Flanders, to discover how in those parts their affection stood towards the Match propos'd betwixt Prince Charles and the Princess Mary; and withal, to require Men for the War intended the next Spring. But Charles having already broken two Articles of the said Treaty of Marriage; one whereof was, that when he came to fourteen years of Age, he should send a Proxy into England to contract the Princess per verba de presenti; the other, that at a day appointed he should come himself to Calais to espouse her; and our Ambassadors finding for the rest nothing but delay and irresolution, the King would no longer omit to give order that his Sister should neither be slighted, nor his Affairs otherwise suffer detriment. Therefore, after a short Protestation, whereby the fault was laid on them; (without yet, that any intention was disclos'd for disposing the Princess Mary in any other place, or of making a League with Louis the Twelfth) the King proceeds more roundly in his Business. Before yet this could be effected, Pregent with his Gallies coming to Sussex by Night, and landing there, after a short stay was driven back, and in the Retreat, shot in the face with an Arrow.

Sir John Wallop hereupon being sent into Normandy, burnt divers Ships, and one and twenty Villages, landing many times in despite of the French, which seem'd the more strange, that his Soldiers exceeded not eight hundred Men. The French also appearing in some numbers near the English Pale, Sir Thomas Lovell was sent with certain Troops to Calais, for the better strengthening of the place; and the rather, that Richard de la Pole was now gathering Forces for some great Design. But before he could do any thing, the Treaty and Peace was made; among the Articles whereof, though the remanding of Richard de la Pole was propos'd, yet Louis would never consent to it, but sending him out of France gave him a yearly Pension.

Louis de Longueville having now power from his King to contract Marriage par parole de present with our King's Sister, she also sent * her Procuration to the same effect, the Ceremony whereof was solemnly held at the Celestins in Paris, Septemb. 14. News whereof was no sooner brought, but our King, together with the Queen conducting her to the Sea-side bid her farewell, and recommended her to the Duke of Norfolk's care. Shortly after which landing at Boulogne, and being met by some principal Persons deputed by the King, she was attended on, and guided towards Abbeville; in the way to which, the old King on Horseback met and saluted her, and afterwards retir'd himself privately, while she was receiv'd into Abbeville with much Pomp. Where on St. Dennis Day, Octob. 9. she was in Person marry'd to Louis the Twelfth; who, after bestowing many Jewels on her, and rich Presents to those who came along, dismiss'd all, save a few Officers and Attendants, amongst whom I find Mrs. Anne Bollen, Daughter to Sir Thomas Bollen, as one. Howbeit, occasion was given of bringing over some of our prime Nobility and Cavaliers to Paris not long after.

Francois de Valois, Duke of Angoulesme, and next Heir Male to the Crown (having in May before marry'd Claude eldest Daughter to Louis the Twelfth, by Anne who was Inheritrix of Bretagne) desir'd now, in the King's declining Age, to give some proof of his Valour. Therefore, before the English departed from Abbeville, he caus'd Jufts to be proclaim'd; which, for being so extraordinary (the Persons and Manner consider'd) I thought worth the relating. The effect thereof was, that in November ensuing, he with nine Aids, would answer all Comers that were Gentlemen of Name and Arms, on Horseback and on Foot. The Laws on Horseback were, that with sharp Spears they should run five Courses at Tilt, and five more at Random, being well arm'd and cover'd with pieces of Advantage for their best Defence. After this to fight twelve stroaks with sharp Swords. This being done, he and his Aids offer'd to fight at Barriers with the same Persons, with a Hand-spear and Sword. The Conditions were, that if any Man were unhors'd, or fel'd fighting on Foot, his Armour and Horse should be render'd to the Officer of Arms. That for this purpose an Arch Triumphant should be set forth at the Tournelles, near Rue Saint Antoine in Paris, on which four Shields should be plac'd. That he who would touch any of them, must first enter his Name and Arms. That he who touch'd the first, which was Silver, should run at Tilt, according to the Articles. Who touch'd the Golden Shield, should run at Random as above mention'd. He that touch'd the black Shield, should fight on foot with Hand-spears and Swords for the one hand; six Foynes with the Hand-Spear, and then eight stroaks to the most Advantage (if the Spear so long

This Proclamation being made, the Duke of Suffolk, and Marquiss Dorset, and his four Brethren, the Lord Pinton, Sir Edward Nevile, Sir Giles Capell, Thomas Cheney, and others, obtain'd leave of the King to be at the Challenge; which they so hasten'd, that before the end of October they came to S. Denis, where they found the Queen; the Solemnities for her Coronation, as also for her Reception at Paris, being not yet in readiness. Francis de Valois, knowing how good Men at Arms the Duke of Suffolk and Marquiss Dorset were, requested them to be two of his Aids, to which they assented. But while these things were in preparing, Mary the French Queen was upon the Fifth of November Crown'd in St. Denis, the Earl of Worcester and Dr. West (who were appointed for this purpose by our King) attending her in the Solemnity thereof, and Francis de Valois (afterwards King) holding the Crown (which was very weighty) over her Head. The day following she enter'd Paris with great Pomp, and the morrow after the Jufts began, of which the King and Queen were Spectators; the King being yet so weak that he lay on a Couch. These Jufts continu'd three days, in which three hundred and five Men at Arms were answer'd by the Defendants; among which some were so hurt, that they dy'd not long after: At Random and Tourney, the Duke of Suffolk hurt a Gentleman very dangerously, and the Marquiss Dorset did no less to another. Then the Duke overthrew a Man both Horse and Arms, and so did the Marquiss. Francis at last being hurt, desires the Duke and Marquiss to fight at Barriers; who therefore took the first place against all Comers. In the mean while, Francis intending an Affront, (as was thought) to the Duke, cauleth a German (the strongest Person in all the Court) to be arm'd secretly, and present himself at Barriers; they both did well; yet the Duke at last with the but-end of his Spear struck the German till he stagger'd, and so the Rail was let fall. The Marquiss Dorset also foil'd another French-man. Then they took some breath and return'd to fight again; when the Duke so pommell'd the German about the Head, that Blood gush'd from his Nose, which being done, the German was convey'd away secretly. Divers other brave feats were done likewise, which the reader may find elsewhere. At last our English with singular honour, return'd to their King and Master, whom they found much comforted for the birth of another Prince, though not living long after.

But the contentment of Louis the Twelfth was almost as short; who being aged, and infirm, after some eighty days possession, rather than enjoying of his Queen, dy'd January 1. 1515. leaving behind him no Issue Male; though otherwise of that esteem among his Subjects, for his care not to oppress them with Impositions longer than his necessities requir'd, that he was call'd Pere du Peuple, Father of his People. After him succeeded Francois de Valois, above mention'd, a Prince of great hope. His Age was twenty one or twenty two; wherein as well as in the most part of his Manners, there was much conformity betwixt our King and him. Particularly, they might be thought two the goodliest Personages, not of their Quality only, but of their Time. This Prince was Sacred (to use the French term) at Reymes 25 of January, 1515. taking on him, together with the name of King of France, that of Duke of Milan. To which he seem'd to have a double Title, both as he was of the House of Orleans, to which the Claim of the said Dutchy belong'd, as also being comprehended in the Investiture made by the Emperor, according to the Treaty at Cambray. And because he succeeded as well to the Right, as to the means of recovering the said Dutchy, he thought on nothing more than how to vindicate the glory his Predecessors had lost in that Attempt. His first care was how to assure himself of our King: This he procures, partly by addressing himself to Woolsey, who then prevail'd most with the King, and partly by giving great Conditions. And thus the last Treaty of Peace with Louis the Twelfth, (being to endure but till the first of January next,) was (as I find both by ours and the French Record) renew'd in the same Terms, the 5 of April following, and prorogu'd for term of their joyn't Lives, and one year after. Only better order was given for Depredations than before; it being agreed now, that no Merchant of either Nation should depart out of their Ports, without giving caution to their several Admirals, that no Wrong or Molestation should be done by Sea.

Upon the 8th of May, the French King agreed also to pay at certain days a Million of Crowns to our King; (for so the French have it,) which whether it were a new Stipulation, or that formerly agreed on by Louis the Twelfth, appears not to me; and Polydore's words are obscure, which import only pretium pro pace datum, Money paid for obtaining a Peace. The 15 of May following, the Scots enter'd into this Treaty, (for they were comprehended under a condition of keeping the Peace.) Neither did our King easily believe, that under-hand they would have made any other. Notwithstanding which, the French and they did, upon the second of January following, privately enter into a League Offensive and Defensive against England.

Together with the proposing of this Treaty (in which the Duke of Suffolk, Sir Richard Wingfield Deputy of Calais, and Doctor West, were employ'd,) our King sent a Letter to the Queen his Sister; wherein he desir'd to know, how she stood affected to her return to England, desiring her withal not to match without his Consent. She on the other side, who had privately engag'd her Affection to Charles Duke of Suffolk, made no great difficulty to discover her self to both Kings; intreating Francis to mediate this Marriage, and our King to approve it. Unto the former Francis easily agreed, (though once intending to propose a Match betwixt her and the Duke of Savoy;) but our King, for the Conservation of his Dignity, held a little off; However he had long since design'd her to Suffolk. The Queen also believing that this Formality was the greatest Impediment, did not proceed without some scruple, though protesting (as appears by an Original) that if the King would have her married in any place, save where her Mind was, she would shut her self up in some Religious-House. Thus, without any great Pomp, being secretly married, the Queen writ Letters of excuse to the King her Brother, taking the fault (if any were) on her self; and together, for the more clearing the Duke of Suffolk, profess'd that she prefix'd the space of four days to him, in which she said, unless he could obtain her Good-will, he should be out of all hope of enjoying her. Whereby, as also through the good office of Francis, who (fearing lest our King by her means should contract some greater Alliance) did further this Marriage, our King did by degrees restore them to his favour; Woolsey also not a little contributing thereunto, while

He desires the Duke of Suffolk and Marquiss Dorset to be two of his Aids.

1515. he told our King, how much better she was beflow'd on him, than on some Person of Quality in France.

Thus having prepared all things for their departure, they took their leave of the French Court;
the Queen carrying with her, of the Jewels, Plate, and Tapestry of Louis XII. to the value of two hundred thousand Crowns, as the French have it.
Among which a great Diamond, call'd le Miroir de Naples (as I find by our Records) was one; though not without much reluctance of Francis, who would fain have redeem'd it at a great Price. Order also was taken for the payment of her Jointure, being sixty thousand Crowns yearly. Whereupon the Queen and Duke with all her Train (save Mrs. Anne Bolen, who staid in the French Court) * began their Journey; to the satisfaction of Francis, as hoping by their means to confirm his so much desir'd Peace and Treaty with our King. Thus arriving at Calais the 25th of April, and from thence coming to Dover, and after to Greenwich, they were publickly married the 13th of May. Thus our King's two Sisters, after their being join'd with great Princes, did not disdain to accept inferiour Persons for their Husbands.

But that I may return to my proposed Method in this History, I shall set down the Laws enacted in the Parliament (sixth of this King) beginning February quinto; where I find one of their chief cares was, to put into better order the former Laws concerning Apparel; which yet was not so well digested, but that the Year following, even the Law it self chang'd fashion. Howso-ever, that of Archery, made before, was not only confirm'd, but made perpetual; so that, notwithstanding the use of Caleevs or Hand-guns (for Muskets were not yet known) it was thought fit to continue the Bow. Wherein I cannot but commend the Constancy, if not Wisdom of those Times; it being certain, that, when he that carries the Caleever goes unarm'd, the Arrow will have the same effect within its distance that the Bullet, and can, again, for one shot return two. Besides, as they used their Halberts, with their Bow, they could fall to execution on the Enemy with great advantage. I cannot deny yet but against the Pike they were of less force than the Caleevs: Therefore I believe the meaning of these Times was, to command it as an Exercise to the common People, and for the rest reserve it for those Occasions, where they might be of use. Howsoever, Handguns and Cross-bows were forbidden under certain Penalties, to all Men that had less than five hundred Marks per Annum. The Wages for Artificers also was settled, and the Price of Water-men. A Penalty also was impos'd on those who changed Tillage into Pasture. And very good Order taken, concerning deceit in Cloth, as being the only cause they had not so good vent abroad. The Commission of Sewers extending to the making up of the Sea-walls, &c. in England, the Marches of Calais, Guisnes, and Hames, (begun sexto Henrici sexti, and continued quarto Henrici septimi, for twenty five Years) being now upon expiration, was continued also for ten Years more. It was commanded also, that the River of Canterbury should be deepned. It was provided also, that Wooll should not be carried beyond Sea; which was to the benefit of Clothiers. No second Letters Patents also might be taken, without mentioning the first: Which was very equal, both for the King and Subject.
And because divers now, being weary with sitting so long in Parliament, did depart home without License, (they only remaining who factiously combined themselves, with intention to gain the major part of Voices, in any thing they desired to obtain) it was order'd they should lose their Wages, if they went without the leave of the Speaker, and Common House, to be entered in the Book of the Clerk of the Parliament.

During the stay of the French Dowager and her Husband, a Treaty also pass concerning the restitution of Tournay, upon a Sum of Money offer'd. Howbeit, as our King demanded in exchange thereof, the County of Guisnes, or Ardes, Francis, who desir'd not any enlarging of the English Pale, fell off, so that our King provided for defence. For which purpose, as well as diminishing his charge in keeping an excessive Garison, he rais'd a Citadel there; without that Francis thought fit either to interrupt the Design, or otherwise to offend our King; as hoping, by the means of Woolsey, (to whom, together with the unusefulness of Tournay, he represented a Cardinal's Hat) to obtain his desire. And it was the true Bait to take him; he being extremely ambitious of that Dignity, both as he thought it would secure his Greatness, and as it enabled him to serve his King and Master's Turn. Therefore he had many ways attempted it, and particularly by the intervention of Cardinal Hadrian de Castello an Italian (Bishop of Bath, and the Pope's Collector in England) not omitting together to use the help of Sylvester (Italian likewise) Bishoprick of Worcester; and the rather, that they were both at Rome, where Cardinal Bambridge also on our King's part resided: But this Cardinal dying July 14. 1514. not without suspicion of Poyson, our King having lately * given Woolsey the Bishoprick of Lincoln, he surrendred it now, and † took the Arch-Bishoprick of York; and, not satisfied herewith, aspir'd also to be Successor in the Cardinalship; wherein, because it seems, he conceiv'd that Adrian Bishop of Bath had not served him faithfully, he oppos'd him in the Col-lectorship, and put Polydore Virgil (his Sub-collector) in the Tower (from whence he came not * suddainly, nor without the Pope's mediation) he used therefore, besides his ordinary Means and Friends in Rome, the help of Francis; who, for the more obliging of him, sent first News, that, in September this Year, his Suit was granted, and the Title of Sanctæ Cæcilie trans Tiberim * conferr'd on him; for the maintaining of the Charges whereof, he had at this time in Farm at very easie Rates the Bishopricks of Bath, Worcester, and Hereford, in regard the Bishops of these Places liv'd beyond Sea; he got also successively the Bishopricks of * Bath, † Durham, and † Winchester, which he so exchang'd, as he held ever one of them with his Arch-Bishop-rick; he held also in Commendation the * Abby of St. Alban's, and many other Ecclesiastical Preferments, and had the disposing of most of the Pensions that fell void. Also, shortly after his being constituted Arch-Bishop of York, William Warham, Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, resigning to the King voluntarily the place of Lord Chancellor, and retiring himself from Court, by reason of his Age, (or perchance some Discontent) to a private Life, that Place was conferr'd on him. Thus were Dignities and Wealth heaped so fast on Woolsey, that, being in his Nature insolent, he grew at length intolerable. Neither could those excellent Parts, wherewith he was endowed, exempt him; insomuch, that not only much Arrogance, but extream Vanity was observed in him, whereas yet nothing commends Church-men so much as a pious Modesty: All Degrees of Persons, but especially theirs, being like Coins or Medals; to which, howsoever Vertue give the stamp and impresson, Humility must give the weight.

His Pride.

1515. Yet this Cardinal, contrary to all Example, is noted by Polydore to have used Silk and Gold in his outward Vestments, and even Saddles: He caused also the Cardinal's Hat to be born by some principal Person before him, on a great height, as it were an Idol to be worshipped, (Loco cuiusdam Idoli sacri;) and, when he came to the King's Chappel, would admit no place to rest it on, but the very Altar; he had besides, his Serjeant at Arms and Mace, and two Gentlemen carrying two Pillars of Silver, besides his Cross-bearer; concerning which it is observed, that he did bear the Cross of York, somewhat to the prejudice of that of Canterbury, which perchance might be some cause of Discontentment to the Arch Bishop Warham. In conclusion, all his Actions were such as argued a haughtier Spirit than could become his Place (as Polydore will have it.)

The Pope, being intente now to a War against the Turk, * requires Aid from the English Clergy, desiring our King to give his assistance therein; which they yet (in their † Synod) deprecated, alledging (by Letter to the Pope, dated November 25. 1515.) that they were exhausted through their Contribution to the War of France, at the instigation of Julius II. remonstrating further, that by a Decree of the Council of Constance, the Pope could impose no Tributes on the Church, but in case of necessity, and by a General Council.

The twelfth of this Month the Parliament sat again; wherein, among other Acts, further Order was given, for preventing Tillage to be turned into Pasture. A repeal of Licenses also to Strangers for carrying in of Gascoigne and Guyenne Wines, or Tholouse Woad was enacted. Which was much to the increase of our Shipping. A time was also prefixt, without which all Motions, Suits, Bills, Indictments or Informations popular shall be sued, either for the King or Party; and this settled a great deal of quietness. The Act concerning Labourers Wages, made the Year preceeding, was also repealed, forasmuch as concerned certain Labourers in London.

Towards the end of this Parliament, Sir Edward Poyning's desiring to be discharg'd from his Government in Tournay, and the adjoining places of Mortaigne and St. Amand, Sir William Blunt, Lord Mountjoy was substituted; who appointing Sir Sampson Norton to be his Marshal, so offended the People, that they rose in Arms: Neither would they be quieted, till the said Sir Sampson was banish'd for ever. But, if Poyning's return'd to his Counsellor's place, divers others went away from it. For, besides the Arch-Bishop Warham, Bishop Fox, offended with the Cardinal, retir'd himself; desiring this only of the King, that he would not suffer the Servant to be greater than his Master. To which the King answer'd presently, That it should be his Care, that those who were his Subjects should obey and not command. Then Thomas Duke of Norfolk craved leave to go to his Country-House. For, as the King's Coffers were much exhausted by his late Wars and Triumphs, so not finding it easie to supply those vast Expences, which (in Pageants and Devices) increased daily, he wisely withdrew himself: Charles Duke of Suffolk also, not long after, following them. For, having borrowed Money of the King for his Journey into France, and being unable (through the Cardinal's opposition) to obtain remission thereof, or otherwise to pay it presently, he retir'd into the Country; so that the Cardinal had his free scope and liberty to sway all things, under colour of doing the King Service. For, whatsoever he went about, that was his Pretence; though (for the most part) in labouring to reform, he did nothing but innovate. Hence many Clamours arose among the People; who being capable of almost nothing but their own ancient Customs, seldom indure a change, though for their bettering and advantage. Hence was it, that they thought none so true among them, as those who traduced the present Government; nor so wise, as those who suspected most, though beyond all probability. There was yet occasion enough to fear Woolsey, being observed to have that Ascendant over the King's Disposition, as he knew not how to be serious, or almost merry, without him: In either of which ways he still introduced something for his own ends; for no Man studied them more. One Example whereof I will here insert. The Cardinal, having for his first Bishoprick, that of Tournay, was not yet without an ancient Competitor, one Louis Guillart a French Man, to whom it formerly appertained: This Man, grudging to be thus dispossest, obtains from the Pope a Bull, whereby he was restor'd to that place, (as far as words could carry it,) with a Clause of Usque ad Invocationem Brachii Secularis, if denied admission, to call in the assistance of the Civil Magistrate, both in the City and without. So that the French and Flemmings seem'd equally interested thereby to procure his Conservation. Our King understanding hereof, and knowing well the dangerous Consequence, * writes to the Bishops of Bath and Worcester, his Agents then at Rome, to protest against this strange and inordinate Bull, (as he terms it in his Letter;) commanding them withal (not without some Threats) to labour that it might be recall'd, as tending not only to the raising of Sedition in that City, and Quarrels betwixt him and the confining Princes, but to the wrongful displacing of the Cardinal, who, being subrogated to the other as well in conformity to the right of his King, as upon the contumacy or negligence of the other (who had not as then done his Homage and Fealty for his Temporalities) could not now be remov'd without much scandal. Before this, the Cardinal had desired Francis to bestow on Guillart some other Bishoprick: But Francis delaying to give satisfaction herein, so incensed the Cardinal, that he became his secret Enemy afterward, (as Polydore hath it.) Hereupon he intimates to Maximilian, that, notwithstanding the * late League betwixt England and France, there was probability, the King would not suffer France to grow greater by the acquisition of Milan † (Maximilian therefore sent, in the name of Sforza Duke of Milan, one Anichetus Vis-Conte, a Milanese, to implore our King's assistance against Francis, in Men or Money: Of which also there was some hope secretly given by Woolsey.) However, our King (in so great a Cause) would resolve nothing, without communicating the business first to the ancientest and wisest of his Counsellors. Therefore recalling Warham, Fox, the Duke of Norfolk, Lovell, and divers others, he demanded their Opinion in full Counsel; where Woolsey speaking first, alledged, that Francis had already broken the Treaty, by favouring Richard de la Pole, a Fugitive and Traytor; in assisting those Scots, which oppos'd his Sister Queen Margaret; and in contriving a secret League with that Nation, to the prejudice of that into which they lately entred with England. Besides, that Francis with-held some Goods and Jewels of Queen Mary. That when all this were otherwise, yet it stood not with reason of State to suffer France to grow any greater. Lastly, he said all this might be done warily, and without effusion of English Blood, only when he would but privately assist Maximilian. This was no sooner uttered, but Thomas Bishop of Durham riseth up, and not only confirms the Cardinal's Speech, but extols it with some palpable Flat-

Neither must it seem strange, that the Churchmen concurr'd in this Vote; it being likely that (besides Cardinal Woolsey's particular animosity against Francis the First) Leo the Tenth had a hand herein, as knowing how much safer it was for Italy, that a single Duke should govern Milan, than such a Potent Prince as Francis the First; all the others at the Table yet were of another Opinion. Among whom therefore a reply was made to this effect.

The Answer to it. That to break a Treaty or League (solemnly sworn) did seem a strange Council in any, but especially in a Divine. That, for their parts, they conceiv'd the violating of publick Faith, was to call God and Man in judgment against them. They would not deny yet, but just cause of dissolving Leagues might be given. But then that the wrong'd Party ought both to protest the fault and denounce War, That, if any other Course should be allow'd among Princes, and Estates, there were no ground for upholding Truth and Justice; without which yet the Law of Nations, and even Mankind it self could not subsist. That therefore it were good to examine the grounds of the proceedings mention'd. In which though it could not be deny'd but Richard de la Pole was admitted still in France; yet, whether as Traytor to his Country, or a Person that came thither only for safety of his Life, might be question'd. That if the Spies, they had on Richard, said true, his design was only to go into Italy with Francis the First, and then there could be no danger on his part. And for the other Point, which was assisting the Scottish Faction against Queen Margaret, or contriving a secret League which might be a prejudice to the former, much might be said; yet if businesses were well examin'd, both the Treaties of Francis might consist; This latter with Scotland being provisionally only, in case we should come to a Rupture with France. They would not deny yet, but herein an advantage was taken by the French, somewhat against the Laws of Honour. But that we might make a benefit thereof. For, while Francis was in Italy, and far remote from Scotland, it was easie for his Majesty, under colour of resisting the new Faction set up by the French in Scotland, to be more than reveng'd. For, whether in his Sister's name or his own, it was not hard to reduce a divided Country to his Devotion. And that this might be thought a greater Addition to him, than Milan to the French, when yet they could obtain it; that to take any other course, was to seek causes of quarrel, without colour, either of Reason or Justice; to draw the French on himself; to interrupt his way to Scotland, which now lay open; and lastly, to make him loose credit both at Home and Abroad. The King, who knew the opposition among his Counsellors, seem'd to temper the diversity of Opinions in a middle way; yet so, as in effect, he inclin'd to the Cardinal.

The King inclines to the Cardinals Opinion. * April.

Sept. 13. Therefore he said, he would hinder the designs of Francis, without coming yet to a manifest Rupture; whereof also occasion was given. For as Francis being * Confederate with Charles, (now sixteen years old, and taking on him the Government of the Low-Countries) as also with the Venetians, had renew'd a War in Italy, and after a bloody Battel at Marignan, had compell'd Maximilian Sforza to resign his Right to Milan, and accept a Pension in France; so our King, who suspected this great Addition to Francis might be damageable to him, resolv'd secretly to assist the Emperor, with whom also the Pope and Ferdinand joyn'd, for the defence of Italy, and opposition of the Invaders. Returning for this purpose by Richard Pace (late Servant to Cardinal Bambridge, and, for the present Secretary of State) not only a huge Sum of Money; but giving him Commission to treat both with the Emperor and

League upon certain Conditions. Among which it was agreed, That, if Milan were recover'd, such a yearly Tribute or Pension should be paid our King, as this supply of Money did deserve; Woolsey not forgetting also, (after his usual manner) to capitulate for an Annual payment of ten thousand Ducats to himself. Hereupon, Pace, levying for the Emperors Service certain Regiments of Swiss, (who willingly entred this War, both as they were oblig'd to the Conservation of Sforza's Interest, and as they desir'd to revenge their loss at Marignan,) the Emperor in Person marcheth towards Milan. Neither did it hinder him, that the Pope was fallen away to Francis, and had appointed an interview at Bononia, for the accommodating of their Mutual Affairs; the Pope promising Parma and Piacenza to Francis; and he, on the other side, stipulating to recover Urbino for the Pope (as indeed follow'd the next year.) Where also an Agreement call'd the Concordat was made, which the French Writers observe as Derogatory to the Pragmatick Sanction, and the Liberties of the Gallicane Church. Being thus upon his way, Charles Duke of Bourbon, who was appointed by Francis to defend his Acquisitions in Italy, sends to his King for Relief, preparing in the mean time to defend himself the best he could. But Maximilian being now in a fair way of obtaining his desires, retires suddenly into Germany; neither could he alledge other cause of it, than a simple diffidence of the Swiss, (as Polydore hath it;) tho' Guicciardine tells another Reason; which was, that Maximilian receiving no supply of Money from England, and being not provided himself to pay them, was forc'd to desist. This encourag'd the French and Venetian to proceed in their designs of besieging Brescia, which they got; but being repuls'd at Verona, Maximilian takes heart again, and sends Matteo Cardinal of Sedun (or Sitten) into England, to negotiate for a supply of Money, and withal to excuse his late Retreat, both for his distrust of the Swiss, as also because they openly refus'd to fight against some of their Countrymen, who were under Bourbon. Besides, as he had long entertain'd our King with a hope that he would resign the Empire to him, so on this occasion (as I find by an Original from Sir Robert Wingfield, dated 17 May 1516.) he renews the Propositions; offering, besides to give him the Duchy of Milan; for the more assurance whereof, desiring our King to pass the Seas to Calais, and so to take his way through the Low-Countries, till he came to the City of Triers; where he, together with the Electors would meet, for performance of the aforesaid Resignation of the Empire; which also being done, he propos'd that an Army from thence should invade France, while our King with one thousand Horse, and one thousand Archers should pass through Germany to Coyre, and so over the Lake of Como to the State and City of Milan; where having repos'd a while, Maximilian promis'd to go along with him to Rome, to see him receive the Imperial Crown; which being done, he said, our King might choose whether he would make an honourable Peace with France, or War, for recovering his Right; which, he said, the Pope and all Christian Princes could not but like well of. And thus far Wingfield; to whose relation though our King gave as much Credit, as a Profession often made by Maximilian could Merit; yet as he consider'd withal, that there was much improbability in the offer, and the Action it self in a manner without Precedent; and, howsoever, that he should engage his Kingdom for the Affair of the Empire, (it being then so scant of Moneys, as Maximilian was nick-nam'd Pochi-Dinari.) So by his Answer in June following,

Vol. II.

1515. he wish'd Wingfield to tell Maximilian, that though he thankfully accepted those Offers, yet that he desir'd they might be kept secret until the French were driven out of Italy. For which purpose, (as well as the Reasons before set down) I find he promis'd Maximilian some more Money, executing together the former defect of Payment, with laying the fault on some Genovia Merchants. Besides, at the Cardinal of Seduns intreaty in the

Nov. 2. Emperor's Name, he entred into a strict League with Maximilian; which yet, because it lasted not, I shall not particularly mention. For Maximilian, considering how little trust he could repose in our Cardinal for the obtaining of Money, and (for the rest) being wearied with the Wars, first makes a Truce with his Adversaries, and particularly the Venetians; after which, for

To which purpose the Death of Ferdinand did serve; who departing this Life in the beginning of Anno 1516, did free himself rather than the World, from not a few Troubles, whereof he was the first Procurer and Author. This Prince (leaving to his Successors the Stile of Catholicus) was thought the most active and

No Man knew better how to serve his turn on every body, or to make their ends conduce to his. But while he escap'd not the Opinion and the Name of False, (which yet his Country Writers palliate, no otherwise than with calling it Saber-raynar) he neither comply'd with his Dignity, nor indeed the Rules of Wisdom; true Reason of State consisting of such solid Maxims, that it hath as little need of Deceit, as a sure Game at Chess of a false Draught; there is no use of it, therefore, among the wiser sort; as being only a supply of Ignorance among the ruder and worse kind of Statesmen. Besides, it appears so much worse in Publick Affairs than Private, as it is never almost hid or unreveng'd. Reputation again is still lost thereby; which yet how much it concerns Princes, none can better tell than such as imagine them without it. This is strange of him, that being of vast Possessions, enrich'd much from the Indies, prosperous in almost all his Attempts, of a frugal Disposition, and long Life; (for he attain'd sixty three) there was hardly yet found in his Coffers, enough to discharge his Interring, though not very Sumptuous; that I may say nothing of his Debts. His Will and Testament declar'd his Daughter Juana of Castile to be his Heir. Only, because of her defect of Wisdom, and her Sons young Age, He appointed the Cardinal Ximenes Archbishop of Toledo to govern, till the said Charles came to Castilla. He left also to Fernando, Brother to Charles, great Possessions and Legacies, as loving him inwardly best; both that being born at Alcala 1503, he was a Native of Spain, (which his Brother was not,) and that he gave much hope of Towardliness, and besides bore his Name. Insomuch that, could he have contriv'd it handsomly, it is thought he would have made him his Heir in Spain: Sundry Particularities whereof, concurring much with the Spanish History, being advertis'd to our King by Sir John Stile his Ambassador there; Our King and Queen (as they had before done for Louis the Twelfth) caus'd a solemn Obsequy for him to be kept in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul in London. But they mourn'd not long; the Birth of our Princess Mary following shortly after, upon the eighteenth of February 1511.

Ferdinand thus dead, Charles, who thought himself as capable of governing Castilla, as he was of the Low-Countries (which Maximilian the last year put into his hands) sends immediately to Spain, to claim the Right and Title; which also was acknowledg'd; yet so, as it was thought fit to publish it together with his Mothers; so that it ran thus, Donna Juana, and Don Carlos, Queen and King of Castilla, Leon, and Arragon, &c. Navarre (which was now incorporated to them) being not forgotten; He determin'd also in Person to go thither. For which purpose, as well as the better securing the Low-Countries in his Absence, he past several Treaties with Francis and our King; The former was concluded at Noyon, Aug. 15. where it was agreed, That within six Months following Henry d' Albret (Jean d' Albret, and Catherine his Wife being newly dead) of Spain, should be restor'd to the Kingdom of Navarre, or at least sufficient content given him otherwise; and if not, that it should be lawful for Francis to assist him. That Charles should marry Louïse Daughter of Francis, (then not a year old) who in Consideration thereof should renounce his Claim to Naples, and accept a Pension of one hundred thousand Crowns yearly. That the Venetians giving the Emperor two hundred thousand Ducats, he should deliver them Verona. Besides which, their Orders of Chevalry were sent to each other, and an Interview appointed, which yet took no more effect than the Treaty it self. The latter League was form'd at London, October 29. betwixt Joan and Charles of Castile, the Emperor Maximilian, and our King to this effect.

That the Confederates should defend one another, and bring Aid by Land at their own Costs, (being requir'd) within a Month after complaint, against the Enemy.

If the Enemy have Port-Towns, &c. then the War shall be also made by Sea, by them both, and the Fleet supply'd if it be diminish'd, &c.

That no Peace shall be made with the Enemy, or Truce, but by mutual consent.

Place also was left for other Princes whatsoever, to come into this League within eight Months, by the consent of all the Confederates.

That Leo the Tenth shall be comprehended in this League, if he will Excommunicate the Persons and States that shall molest the Confederates, and that he enter within six Months.

That the Swifs shall be admitted, if they will; so that they bind themselves to serve under the Confederates, and not under any other Prince; And, on those Conditions to have Pensions.

I must now return to the business of Scotland, The Scot. (intermitted a while, that I might not break the Affairs. context of my History,) and therein call to mind, how John Stewart Duke of Albany, having been recall'd home, was presently upon his Arrival (which was May 20. 1515.) declar'd Vice-Roy, May 20. till the King came to full Age. Neither did it hinder, that he was born in the time of his Father's Banishment; and, for the rest, such a Stranger, that he could not speak the Country Language. For as a singular Opinion of his worth went before, and the Recommendation of the French accompany'd him, so was he saluted with that universal Applause, wherewith new comers that have given hope of themselves, are usually welcom'd. The businesses of the Country were yet so strange to him, that he was inforc'd to use the directions of others. In this number, one John Hepburne did much appear. His first advice was, that he should not punish the Delinquents, both as they were many, and well ally'd; and as it would gain him strong Enemies. That he had more use of the Peoples Affections, than to alter them at his first Entrance. That therefore his chief endeavour should be, to make good his Authority, neither should he oppress any, but those who were in estate to oppose him; amongst 1516. amongst which three were most considerable, Archibald Douglass was one, who, besides that he had marry'd the Queen, was a Person much in favour with the People. Secondly, Alexander Humes, a busie, potent, and able Lord. Thirdly, Andrew Forman, whose Riches were such, as alone would suffice for a great Design. The Vice-Roy, taking this Advice into consideration, thought not fit yet to begin with Douglass, lest the Queen, for protecting him should draw the English into Scotland, which he most doubted. Besides, he was so gracious with the greatest part of the Kingdom, that he was to be undermin'd rather than assaulted. And for Forman, he thought it was nothing but his Wealth that made him envy'd. Only Humes he thought it not amiss to question; as having between vehement Suspensions, and some Proofs, not a little matter against him. Humes having some notice thereof, changes his Party, and now strives to combine with Douglass, and the Queen. Therefore he laments to them the fortune of the King, who was fallen into the hands of one, who besides that he was a stranger to his Country, might be suspected for attempting on his Person, as being next Heir to the Crown, after the King and his Brother. That this was the more probable, because his Father Alexander (as the Scottish Writers have it) had taken the like course with his eldest Brother James the Third, whom he would have dispossess'd of the Kingdom. That there was no way to avoid these Dangers, but to fly with her Son into England, (to which also our King had perswaded her privately,) and recommended the rest to his care. This Advice (whether spoken by Humes to discover the Queens Designs, and thereupon to make his Advantage with the Vice-Roy, or that he did indeed think this to be the best way for the Kings safety,) was brought beforehand to the Vice-Roy, who believing it easily, thought fit to seize on Sterling-Castle, in which the young King and his Mother were, and to put a Guard on them; yet admits some, who were of great Credit, to give by turns their Directions for the young Kings Education, and useth briefly some such Providences, as might argue all was done with a good Intention; among which the taking an Oath of Fidelity to the young King, was most remarkable. This while Humes, with his Brother William, refusing to obey a Citation to the Parliament, and being thereupon proscrib'd, fled to England; Douglass also taking the Queen with him follow'd shortly after, staying yet at Harbottle-Castle in Northumberland, by our Kings Command, till further Order was given. It appear'd not yet, whether this were an escape in them, or that the Vice-Roy were under-hand consenting to their departure, only to be freer for his Designs. Howsoever, he sent instantly to our King, to clear himself from all Sinister Practices against the Queen. He also labours with the friends of Douglass and Humes to draw them home, promising for this purpose all the good Conditions that could be requir'd. Humes takes the Invitation, and returns; Douglass also (considering the Queen was with Child, and near her Time, and therefore unable to remove any way far) makes use of this occasion to settle his Affairs at home. The Queen, in the mean while, being * brought to bed of a Daughter, (whom she call'd Margaret) by easie Journeys comes to the English Court in the next Spring 1516. Yet were not businesses in Scotland so quieted; for Alexander Humes having submitted himself (as aforesaid) to the Vice-Roy, who gave him to the custody of his Brother-in-Law, James Hamilton Earl of Arran, upon pain of Death if he suffer'd him to depart; shortly after by representing to Hamilton some nearrels of Blood on his part, which might enable him to be Vice-Roy, perswaded the Earl to escape away together with him; while the Vice-Roy being not griev'd (perchance) thus to be quit of those he suspected most, seems now to be at rest. Only he would not omit to take this Advantage against Hamilton; therefore he batter'd and took his Castle; Humes in the mean time ravaging the Country about Dunbar. The Vice-Roy hearing this, returns to his wonted Invitations of both him and Hamilton to come back. Hamilton accepts it first, and Humes after; but Humes being summon'd again to come to the Parliament, Sept. 24. thinks fit (for redeeming his former fault when he last absented himself) to appear. He perswades his Brother William also to go with him, though many of the friends oppos'd it; for as his Brother was equal with him in Power and Authority, so the keeping him back would have conduc'd perchance to the securing of both. But he, confident of good Usage, neglects the Advice, and comes with his Brother to Court; where being seiz'd on, they were committed to divers Prisons, for crimes objected against them; and particularly against Alexander, who was thought to have used some Treachery in Flodden-Battel, if not to have kill'd the King. All which though he conceiv'd either suggested maliciously against him, or at least by a long intermission to have been antiquated and forgiven, yet prevail'd not; his Head and his Brothers being struck off in October 1516. Shortly after which (as Lesleus hath it) the Kings younger Brother dying, the Duke of Albany obtain'd in Parliament to be declar'd next Heir. Which being done, he enters (in January following) into a League with Francis, and so * return'd to that Country; only that he might manifest his pretences were without any Ambition which might derogate from his Loyalty. The Queen of Scots coming to London, May 3. 1516. was much welcom'd by the King, the Queen, and her Sister Queen Mary, who all enjoy'd therein a happiness rare for Princes in that kind, which was to see one another after they had been once dispos'd of abroad; the King for the more honour of her coming, commanded a Jufts, in which Sir William Kingstone was, both himself and Horse, overthrown by him. This year also those who manag'd any Money for the King in the Wars, or otherwise, were by the Cardinals command call'd in question. Among whom some by Bribery, and some by Cunning escap'd; others being condemn'd in great Sums; so that the Cardinal might be said to have in him so much of a good Servant, as he willingly suffer'd none other to deceive his Master. To accompany this severity also, he caus'd Perjury to be rigorously punish'd; wherein I can never enough commend him; all other Treacheries extending for the most part, but to the depriving of Life, Possessions, or good Name; but this such a one, as without much labour may take away all together. Some Courts also were erected in the favour of poor People, against the oppression of the Great; which at the beginning were much frequented; but at last, the People receiving many delays and unsatisfactions in their Suits, every one left them, and went to the Common-Law: As fearing, under this pretence, an Innovation. I must not deny unto the Cardinal yet, the attribute of Just, in all Affairs of publick Judicature; whereof, (if we may believe Authors) he was ever apparently studious. Therefore, where Disorders were committed, he severely punish'd, unless the Parties found means to make their private Peace.

1517. I will conclude this year with a Passage out of our Records. Leo, continuing still the Council of Lateran, among other Reformati- ons, propos'd that of the Calendar, inviting (for this purpose) our King, to send some of our most learn'd Divines and Astronomers thither; but as it appears not what answer our King return'd to this Breve, dated July 10. 1516, so neither should I have inserted any thing hereof, but that it seems they were not sufficiently satisfy'd concerning the Principles from which the Calculation should be deduc'd.

1517. About this time a Riot and Sedition in England hapned in this manner. Some Citizens and Apprentices of London of the poorer sort, being offended that all their chief Customers were won from them by the diligence and industry of Strangers, and (for the rest) pretending to have receiv'd from them divers Contempts, Affronts and Injuries, found some occasions, and took others, to make an Insurrection against them; and the rather, that the Seditious Sermons of one Doctor Bele, by the Instigation of John Lincolne a Broker, had not a little incited them: Who taking Texts (as near as he could find in the Scriptures) to this purpose, traduced the fence thereof even to encouraging the People to a Commotion. The beginning of this yet was not so witty as the last, neither ended it so well. For two Apprentices playing only at Buckers in the Street, late on April 30. May-Eve, contrary to the Lord Mayors Command, (who upon notice taken of the Citizens intent, was charg'd by the King's Council to require, under great Penalties, all Housholders to keep themselves and their Servants within doors from nine over-night, till seven of the Clock the next Morning) an Alderman came to arrest one of them; but the said Apprentice thinking therein that an Ancient Custom for taking liberty at that time more than any other, was infring'd, cry'd Clubs. Hereupon, they came forth in so great Numbers, that the Alderman fled. The Apprentices being encourag'd herewith, and for the rest finding themselves in a greater Multitude, than to do nothing, break open some Prisons, and took out divers Persons, committed thither for abusing and hurting of Strangers. Neither could the Mayor or Sheriffs then present, hinder this; nor Sir Thomas Moore, (late Judge of the Sheriffs Court in London, but now of the Kings Council,) though much respected by them, as being a Native of that City. The Prisoners being now set loose, advise the Multitude to run to the House of one Meutas a Picard, much hated by them: Where they kill'd some, chas'd the rest, and rifled his Goods. Hence they went again to other Strangers Houses, which they spoil'd in like manner. The Cardinal hearing this, and being not much more in the Peoples favour than the Strangers, fortifies his House with Men and Ordnance. But the Lieutenant of the Tower proceeding otherwise, discharg'd some of the great Pieces among them. Howbeit, this made them not so much desist, as that having reveng'd themselves as far as the offence taken seem'd to require, they thought good about three in the

May 1. Morning to scatter and go home. But in their way, they were apprehended by the City-Officers first, and afterwards by some followers of the Earls of Shrewsbury and Surrey, who hearing of this Disorder, and taking the Inns-of-Court Men with them, clear'd the Streets of this unruly Company. The beginning of the Riot was hereupon examin'd, and Doctor Bele and John Lincolne sent to the Tower. About three days after the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Surrey his Son, and divers others, with about 1300 arm'd Men came into the City, and joyning with the Lord Mayor, proceeded legally against the chief Offenders; to the terror of the Citizens, who were the more affraid, that the Duke of Norfolk upon the killing of a Priest of his in Cheape, was reported to have said (as our Historians have it) in some Passion, I pray God I may once have the Citizens in my Danger. This (though perchance a Calumny, forg'd against the Duke) wrought so, that they thought themselves over-rigorously dealt with, in that the Statute Secundo Henry the 5. Chap. 6. (which makes breakers of Truce, and safe-Conducts guilty of High Treason) was extended against them, tho' repeal'd afterward, 20 Henrici Sexti. Howsoever, much mercy was shew'd; for, of two hundred seventy eight Persons which were Prisoners, Lincoln only, who was thought the most Seditious, and three or four more were Hang'd, Drawn, and Quarter'd; the rest, who were about ten, suffer'd nothing extraordinary in their Death, but that for the more example they were hang'd on Gibbets erected in the Streets. All the others were thus pardon'd; the Recorder of London, May 11. and divers Aldermen coming in Black to Court, and desiring most humbly to be heard, the King, after some Admonition and Check, as if the better sort had conniv'd at this Riot, refers the rest to the Cardinal, then Lord Chancellor. In Conclusion, the King sitting in Westminster, and being attended with his principal Nobility and Officers, and the Lord Mayor; all the Prisoners in white Shirts, and Halters about their Necks (into which Habit divers also, (not yet discover'd) put themselves, to be capable of the King's Pardon) did, upon their Knees, crave Mercy. Which the King graciously accorded, permitting also the Gibbets, which much scandaliz'd the Citizens, to be taken down.

Shortly after, the Sweating Sickness (call'd for the propriety by which it seiz'd on the English Nation chiefly, Sudor Anglicus;) did much infect the Kingdom, being of that Malignity, as within the space of three hours it kill'd. This caus'd the King to leave London, and adjourning three Terms 1517, to remove Trinity Term, 1518. to Oxford, where yet it continu'd but one day, and was adjourn'd again to Westminster. Nevertheless divers Knights, Gentlemen and Officers in the Kings Court dy'd thereof; as the Lord Clinton, Lord Grey of Wilton, and others of Quality, the vulgar sort so commonly perishing, as in some Towns it took away half the People, in others the third part.

Let us look now a while on foreign Business. Maximilian continuing the foremention'd Treaties with our King, concerning divers publick Affairs, and particularly that of rendring the Empire, was desir'd by King Henry, to give him a meeting in the Low-Countries. But Maximilian returning Answer, That to excuse that labour he would come over into England, King Henry sent the Earl of Worcester, and Doctor Cuthbert Tonsall to him, * lately then come into Flanders. * Jan. But as Maximilian was a Prince of great Dissimulation, they observ'd in him, that while on the one side he entertain'd our King with the offer of the Empire, &c. on the other he continu'd his Treaty (begun in December last) with the French. Besides, his Grand-Child Charles refus'd to confirm the late League with our King. So that our Agents thought fit to represent to his Grace how little was to be expected; because the Emperor vary'd so much in his Offers; sometimes saying, he would resign the Empire to Henry the Eighth, and himself remain King of the Romans; which Honour his Posterity should inherit. Sometimes, that he would resign the Empire to Charles of Castile, and make Henry King of the

But as Doctor Tunstal advertis'd the King, that the Emperor must be Elect out of the German Nation: That King Henry in accepting the Empire, must confess England to be under the Empire; Lastly, that he must be first King of the Romans, when yet the Emperor had declar'd he meant to hold that Title still: So our King rejected these Propositions, as Vain, and Artificial only to draw Money from him; and our Agents return'd having only obtain'd, at last, an Oath from Charles and Queen Foane, his Mother, for performance of the late Treaty at London, with some small Alterations. Maximilian also, about the same time * departed out of Flanders, having † first concluded a League at Cambray betwixt himself, Francis, and his Grand-child Charles, by which they confirm'd the League at † Noyon, and * Bruxells, resolv'd on a War against the Turk; (as it was now projected in the Council of Late-ran;) and appointed an interview for all three in April or May following. Place also was left for the Pope to enter as Protector thereof, and for King Henry. This being advertis'd to our King, made him think how to defend Tournay, and therefore caus'd a Citadel to be built there; not neglecting together to prevail himself of the Pope's Mediation for a General Peace. Which, as it was willingly embrac'd, so our King was intreated to send him two hundred thousand Ducats (on security) for that War, which yet it was thought the Pope would employ for some Affairs in Italy. Who also sent a Croisade and Indulgences into Germany, England, and many other places: The Conditions of which were, That, whosoever perform'd certain Religious Rites, and paid certain Sums of Money, should have their Sins forgiven. Neither was there, in the use of these Indulgences, that distinction of Persons or Sins made, which from so grave a Pastor might be expected, so that (promiscuously) all Men, who would come to the price, (as some Authors have it) were not only promis'd everlasting bliss, but made capable of delivering the Souls of others out of Purgatory. When those Indulgences first came forth, no divine Worship in the West parts of Europe, but what the Church of Rome prescrib'd, was publickly known. For though some opposers of the Papal Authority had appear'd long since, yet wanting those supporters who might establish and uphold their Doctrine, it quickly fail'd. Some of their impressions yet were deriv'd to Posterity; though in so obscure and perplex'd a manner, that they serv'd rather to shew Errors, than rectifie them; forming (for the rest) no eminent and visible Body, or at least no other than such as quickly disappear'd. So that all those, who for the present dissented inwardly from any Opinion commonly taught, kept yet the unity of the Church. Of which kind though (I doubt not) there were many, yet by distinguishing in private only the good Doctrines from the ill, they both conserv'd their Consciences, avoided Schism, and maintain'd towards God, and among themselves, an Uniformity; being therein not unaptly compar'd to Sheep, and other Creatures, who in Pastures; where both wholesom, and hurtful Herbs grow, choose yet only the better sort. While thus, they might not only reach to Antiquity in all times, but universality in all places; since not the Men (who may err) but the Doctrine giveth the true denomination unto the Church. It will be enough therefore that there was always a Catholick, and a visible Doctrine in the more important parts thereof. And thus were all Controversies (save those which the subtilties of the Schoolmen brought forth) declin'd. Neither did Men think themselves bound to study the Intricacies and Sophisms of Authors, in matters impertinent to Salvation; but were contented with a single faith in God, the comfort of a good Life, and hope of a better upon true Repentance; taking the rest for the most part upon the faith of the Church. By which means as Peace was generally conserv'd, so it was not doubted by those who search'd into the Primitive times, but that together divers new Doctrines (if not Errors) were crept into the Church Discipline. Among which some, yet, might have been more excusable, had not they not been so severely commanded, that the common sort understood them for little less than necessary Articles of Faith. While thus they were held in much subjection, as being not able sufficiently to distinguish the true and essential Parts from those that were added only for Convenience or Ornament. But as Learning now (the benefit of Printing) became publick, so almost all Men, either through Reading or Conversation, were Literate. Infomuch, that they durst look into the Principles of Religion, and take upon them to discuss the parts thereof. Among these, none was more famous than one Martin Luther, an Hermit Fryer about thirty two years old, living about this time at Wittenberg upon the Elbe, within the Dominions of Frederick Duke of Saxony. This Man, having observ'd divers things, not mention'd in the Belief, call'd Symbolum Apostolorum, to be introduc'd lately, examines all; beginning first with the Indulgences that came out this year; though so modestly, as he advertis'd only his Superior the Arch-Bishop of Miyentz, of some abuse therein, and pray'd Reformation; not omitting together, as he was of an acute, but vehement Wit, to set forth ninety five Conclusions, and preach publickly against them; (which yet he submitted to the Pope by Letter dated in June 1518.) Maximilian also, foreseeing whether these Divisions might tend, (and the rather, that he found them favour'd not only by Frederick Duke of Saxony, but divers other great Personages) wrote to the Pope, desiring him to moderate things so, as all cause might be taken away, not only of Disputations, but concerning impertinent Points of Religion. But as the Pope, about those times, had, (betwixt publick Affairs and private Liberties) so exhausted the Ecclesiastical Revenue, as it was necessary to supply the wants thereof by extraordinary means, he pursu'd his Design, using therein much the help of Lorenzo Pucci Cardinal Sanctorum the Fourth; who, finding the Schism of the Council of Pisa so far extinguish'd, as the Roman Church needed not fear to reassume her former Authority, confirm'd the Pope therein. So that, though for not above four hundred years, they had taken on them this and divers Authorities, not known before, he perswaded their Continuance, left any thing of that kind should seem invalid, or usurp'd; Especially, where the pretence was, if not the same, yet of a like Condition. Whereupon looking further into Records, and finding that Urban the Second, had not only given Indulgences to those, who went Personally to the War of the Holy Land; but that his Successors had bestowed them on such, who being not able to go, would maintain a Soldier there; And lastly, having discover'd that they were granted even against those that were disobedient to the Roman Church, and also to those who gave Money for building or repairing Churches in Rome, &c. He neither question'd their Right, nor Leo contradicted it; both as he had many needy Kinsmen and Favorites, and as it maintain'd his Authority.

The Pope persists in the point of Indulgences.

1517. *thority. Whereupon, a War against the Turks being projected, he sent forth these Indulgences, granting besides, the liberty of eating Eggs and White-meats on Fasting-days, of choosing their Confessor, and some such Habilities. Had this yet been all, less scandal had follow'd. But without regard to the end for which they were given, He, by way of Anticipation, bestow'd on several Persons the Money to be levy'd; assigning, among others, to Magdalen his Sister, and Wife to Francesco Cibo (Natural Son to Pope Innocent the Eighth) all that quarter from Saxony to the Sea side. And the rather, that in Contemplation of this Marriage, himself had been made Cardinal at fourteen years old, 1489, and therein given a beginning to the Ecclesiastical Greatness of the House of Medici. Besides, he was indebted to Cibo for his Entertainment at Geneva, at what time he was forc'd to fly the Persecution of Alexander the Sixth. They again committing this business to Arembaldo a Bishop, but a covetous Person, much Rapine was us'd: The Indulgences (as is said) being generally granted to such as gave most for them. And as this caus'd much Offence, so again the Fryars Hermits, (by whom they were ordinarily dispenc'd) were not a little troubl'd, that the Dominicans had now charge thereof. All which, together with the sinful and inordinate life of certain Commissioners deputed under Arembaldo, for those Levies, together with the so notorious a Sale of twenty Cardinalships (as Sandaval himself dissembles it not) Anno 1517. being notified, occasion'd these following Revolutions, which take up a great part of this History. For, as these Indulgences (upon further examination,) were found to be no elder than is above-mention'd, nor much confirm'd but by a Bull of Clement VI. 1350. (who abridg'd Jubilees from every hundredth year to the fiftieth) nor anciently practis'd at all, but for relaxation of Pennances, or Ecclesiastical Discipline (without that they were said to deliver from any thing towards God) many exceptions were taken against them; so that, though to the Merits of such Saints as did works of Supererogation (being a Treasure which might be consumed) they had added the Merits of Christ, by way of supply; yet Luther and others after him, vexed all this again, with that success which shall be told hereafter. Neither did there want such as opposed them in England, amongst whom, one who was zealous of God's Honour and the publick Good, observing that not only Sins towards God, were pardoned for Money, but Offences towards the Law compounded for at no great Rates (as shall be told more particularly in its place, where it will appear to what excess this Abuse grew) spake after this manner to some of the principal Clergy. That Punishments might have been left to God, but that they serve to deter others. But who would be afraid now, when he knows at what he may put away his Crimes? Of what use would our Threatnings for Sins be, if they grow so contemptible as a little Sum of Money would discharge them, is not this to make Heaven venal, doth not this reflect so much on Christian Faith, that it makes a new Price for Sin? Believe me, my Lords, to make our Faults cheap, is to multiply them, and to take away not only that reverence is due to Vertue, but to dissolve those Bonds which knit and hold together both Civil and Religious Worship. For when Men see what they are to pay for their Faults, what will they care for other Redemption? I would I could say we were not already fallen under some disesteem, when by our enjoying of easie Fasting, Prayer, and some little Alms, Men find they suffer no more than what they would gladly endure to sin again; for who is the leaner or poorer for our Penances? Salvation mercenary, or propose everlasting Happiness on those terms, that it may be obtain'd for Money, which we find so seldom yet without deceit or mischief. Let Mens Sins rather lie against them still than open such easie ways to remit them: And take this Advice in good part, since it so much concerns us all. What effect yet this Advice took will appear hereafter.

The Dissentions of Italy being for the present compos'd, Francis first thought himself at leisure, now to resent our King's assisting of Maximilian. But (saith Polydore) because he consider'd as well, that he should get nothing that way, and that withal he was inform'd this business cost our King so much, that the loss thereof might be taken for a reasonable Revenge; (for I find in our Records, that in one Year it cost our King five hundred thousand or six hundred thousand Ducats,) he dissembled the matter. Therefore converting Malice into Guile, his only labour was how to corrupt the Cardinal; whom at length, between Bribes and Flatteries, he so dextously won, that he durst commit his Designs to him. These yet were such, as the Cardinal would not abruptly disclose to the King. Therefore he said not much at a time of them, nor without making the King first some Present; which yet (saith Polydore) was but part of that which Francis gave him; so that while the King consider'd the workmanship or rarity of the Gift, he would convey his meaning, and give those Impressions he most desir'd should remain in the King's mind. At these opportunities, he made no difficulty to say, That Francis sought to him by Letters earnestly (concealing in the mean while his large Bribes) and that all this did reflect on his Majesty, whom that King did address himself to, by his Mediation. That others perchance would suppress and hide these things, as being enough to breed suspicion, but that he would ever proceed clearly and openly with his Majesty. According to which liberty he would take the boldness to advise, That, since the French King did sue to his Majesty in so submissive a way, as to begin at his Servants, that he could not but think he was in earnest: And for Maximilian (as being often disoblig'd) little help, or indeed trust could be expected. Our King also considering that so-much hereof was true, that if he could not make friendship with Francis, it were not amiss yet to avoid War, embraces the motion. Of which Woolsey makes his advantage, and brings again another Message from Francis, to such effect, that our King said openly, that he saw well now Woolsey would govern them both. The French King, having obtain'd this Interest in the Cardinal, besides new Gifts, sends him divers Letters, terming him therein Dominus and Pater, and his Advices Oracles, till at last he thought he might open unto him his Design of having Tournay re-deliver'd for a certain Sum of Money. Woolsey promiseth his assistance, and hereupon brings the business to the King, and from thence, by his Command, to the Council: Where he openly declares, what vast Sums it had cost the King to win Therouene and Tournay; in the former of which yet he had got nothing but the gratifying of an unthankful Person, which was Maximilian; in the other little else but a number of useless and suspected Subjects; who, that they might be kept in Order and Obedience, would cost more than they were worth. The charge of the Garrison alone being above twelve thousand Pound yearly; besides that of Convoies and Ammunition. That, after all this Expence, yet we could hold it no longer than it pleas'd either of the two Princes, between whose Dominions it stood; since being so remote from the English Pale, it was improbable that from thence we could succour it; so that it were better to let it go fairly, as for a Sum of Money, or the like, than to strive to hold it under so weak and dangerous a Title, as the sufferance of his Enemies;

1518. one of which, being Francis, he thought by the restitution thereof might be oblig'd to be his Friend, and the Affront he might receive through the taking it by force, avoided. Neither could Maximilian take it ill in point of Justice, if we restor'd to Francis a Town formerly in his possession. This being done, that it were most expedient for all Christendom to join in League with one another, and against the Turk, who lately had made himself formidable. These Reasons were valid enough, had they not come from so false a ground as the corruption of the Cardinal; (which Polydore continually inculcates:) therefore they were embrac'd by all, but especially the Bishop of Durham, now Lord Privy-Seal; only it was requir'd, how much that Money was, and of what kind those Conditions were? Whereupon it was declar'd, that if it pleas'd the King to hear the Ambassadors of Francis, he had already demanded leave for them to come over, which also he had reason to endeavour; for as I find by our Records, he and Nicolas de Villeroy the French Resident, had in a manner concluded the business in private already. This being granted, Guillaume Gouffier Seigneur de Bonivet and Admiral of France, and Estienne de Poncher Bishop of Paris* came, with an unruly number for an Ambassade, (their Train being twelve hundred) unto Greenwich; the French yet, betwixt Pride and Diffimulation, thought fit not to begin at the Business they most desir'd to effect. Therefore their first Overture was a Proposition for a League in general betwixt all Christian Princes against the Turk, projected by the Pope the Year before. That the Authors hereof should be both their Majesties. That the Pope, Emperor, and King of Spain should be admitted hereunto, as principal Contractors, (if they desired it) within a certain time, and their Allies and Confederates as comprehended only. This being taken into consideration, upon the second of October 1518. a League was concluded; which, for being singular in its kind, and an excellent Precedent for Peace to the future Ages, I shall more at large recite, both out of our own and the French Records; and the rather that it seems to have been the Rule by which our King framed his Actions many Years after, as will appear in this History.

That perfect Friendship and Amity should continue for ever betwixt them, and their Successors, by Land and Sea; (wherein likewise all their Subjects and Allies were to be comprised.) That they should be the Friends of the Friends, and the Enemies of the Enemies of each other; inasmuch, that, if any of the said Confederates, or other being a stranger to them, should invade any of the said Confederates present Dominions, they should give the said Assailant an Admonition to desist and make reparation; which if he did not, within the space of a Month accept, they should declare themselves his Enemies, and two Months after, both by Sea and Land, make War against him, at an equal charge; allowing for this purpose free passage through each others Dominions, paying only for what was taken. That if Civil Wars did arise in any of their said Countries, none of the Confederates should meddle, unless the said Civil Wars were kindled and maintain'd by some Foreign Prince. That no one of the Confederates should suffer their Subjects to bear Arms against the other, or should levy any Forces of Strangers, to be employ'd against the said Confederates, upon pain of being held a Violator of the said League; which notwithstanding should hold firm among the rest. That none of the said Confederates should take the Vassal or Subject of the other into protection, without the consent of the King, to whom formerly he owed Obedience: That all Rebels, Traytors, or suspected of High-Treason, and Fugitives should not be receiv'd, entertain'd or favour'd, in any of the Dominions of the said Confederates; but that, after twenty days warning and requisition, they should be remanded. That the Pope should have notice of this League; upon condition yet, that if he accepted these Articles within four Months after, he should be a principal Contractor in this League, and name his Allies also. That all the Princes before-named should, within the space of four Months, be receiv'd as principal Contractors, if they desire it, otherwise not, without declaration and request to the said two Kings. That any other King, Potentate, or chief Lord, might upon his suit be admitted to have the benefit of this Confederation, but not as a principal Contractor. Lastly, That, howsoever other Princes should observe or accept the said Treaty, that yet it should remain inviolable betwixt them two.

Leo X. hereupon, though more desirous of a General Confederacy against the Turk, accepted this League, as an Introduction thereunto upon the last of December following, naming together some lesser Allies whom he desired might be compris'd; the Venetians having been nominated already both by Henry and Francis; upon mature deliberation also, Charles King of Spain enter'd into it, and the rather that Maximilian the Emperor, conceiv'd that all Christian Princes might the sooner be dispos'd thereby to war against the Turk. Though as he died shortly after, the League seem'd restrain'd chiefly to Henry, Francis, and Charles, and particularly to the first Contractors, though not with such confidence and fervency as it first began. To reinforce this Treaty also, (which was but an Introduction to another) Francis did propose a Match betwixt the Dauphin his Son, and the Princess Mary, which accordingly was* concluded two Days after, upon these Conditions.

That our King should give with his Daughter 333000 Crowns, and Francis as great a Joynture as any King of that Country ever gave. That within four Months the Sponsals should be made by the two Kings in their Childrens name. That if the Dauphin died before this Marriage, the next Son of Francis should take the Princess on the same Conditions. And if the Princess died first, the King's next Daughter (if he had any) should be given. For further Testimony of this desired Alliance, our King condescended also to restore Tournay, Mortaigne, and St. Amand, and the Territories adjacent, upon the payment of six hundred thousand Crowns, at certain terms. For which Payment, as also performing of the Marriage, sufficient Hostages should be deliver'd to the said Francis. That yet out of this Sum the said Francis might detain 333000 Crowns, for the aforesaid Dowry of the said Princess Mary, in case she did not inherit the Crown of England. That the said French King should pardon, and take into his favour all the Inhabitants of the said City of Tournay, and Places adjacent, reserving to them all ancient Privileges; and that King Henry should thereupon release the Oath of Obedience they had made him. That whereas the Citizens of Tournay did yet owe to King Henry twenty three thousand Livres, which now the French King had stipulated to pay, he should substitute the French King to receive it of them again. That King Henry might carry from Tournay all the Artillery, Munition, and Instruments of War, either Offensive, or Defensive, Victuals, &c. That in case the Marriage intended should take no effect by the default of Francis, that then Tournay should be deliver'd back again to King Henry or his Heirs, together with the Profits receiv'd in the mean while, without any deduction for reparation of the said Place. And that the Inhabitants thereof should be discharged from all Superiority or Oath of Obedience made or acknowledg'd to the said French King: Upon condition that the said King Henry should restore the said French King the Sum of six hundred thousand Crowns, or so much as he should receive thereof. But if the Impediment for Marriage should happen on the part of King Henry, that then, upon payment of the intire Sum of six hundred thousand Crowns, Tournay should

And herein our Records and du Gillet do so concur, as the chief Difference seems to be only about the Sum of 500000 Crowns, which our Records say was the Penalty on either side, for non-performance of the Marriage. There was also at the same time a Treaty concerning the Admiralties in both Kingdoms, having relation to one made the Year precedent July 16. and that of April 5. 1515. By which it was agreed, That all Suits, upon occasion of depredation by Sea, might from the ordinary Judge be removed to London before the Admiral and Vice-Admiral, or their Deputies, and the Master of the Rolls of England; and at Rouen before the Admiral and Vice-Admiral of France, their Lieutenants, and the first President of the Parliament in Normandy; who, upon appeal of the Parties on either side, were bound to give a definitive Sentence within the space of one Year; which, in case of necessity, might be executed by strong hand, or main force. The said Appeals yet might be brought before the King's Council on either side, there to be determin'd definitively within the space of six Months, &c. All things being thus settled for future quietness, the Princess Mary was promised and * betrothed to the Dauphin in St. Paul's in London. And the Earl of Worcester, with Nicolas Wyl now Bishop of Ely, and a Train equal to that of Bonivet, were sent to require performance from Francis, who thereupon * took his Oath, gave eight Hostages for payment on the Rendition of Tournay, and contracted the Sponsals in the name of his Son. In sequence whereof, Feb. 8. following the Earl of Worcester delivered Tournay, though not unwillingly, since it was the King's pleasure, yet with so much scruple (having been by the name of Lord Herbert at the taking thereof) as he would not suffer the Marschal de Chastillon to enter it with Banner display'd, but rolled up, it being (as he said) voluntarily yielded, and not gotten by Conquest. Our Writers add, that by Francis four hundred thousand Crowns were allowed our King, for the building of the Citadel; but because neither the French nor our Records (from whom I have taken the effect of these Treaties) mention it, I leave it to the discretion of the Reader. Only I must not forget what I find concerning the Cardinal's satisfaction in this particular, who had twelve thousand Livres Tournais yearly, for relinquishing the Bishoprick of Tournay. As for the other chief Counsellors, Polydore saith, a certain Sum of Money should be distributed among them by the French King, ita ut consuevisset facere olim ejus Majores; as had been customary amongst his Ancestors.

Thus was Tournay restor'd again to the French, however divers concurrent Articles were not perform'd afterwards, as will appear.

Howbeit, it was agreed betwixt them, that John Duke of Albany should not be permitted to return to Scotland any more; it being not thought fit by our King, that one who was next in succession to James his Nephew, should have charge over him. Moreover, it was agreed that this young King should be comprehended in the League. This particular being resolv'd a good while since, though not fully signed till now, was the cause that Queen Margaret * return'd to Scotland, where her Husband met her at Barwick; yet so, as there was not thenceforth that intire Love formerly observ'd betwixt them. Our Ambassadors being still in France, the Bishop of Ely went to see the Queen at Amboise, from whence he certified our King, that he saw the Dauphin (now almost a Year old) and imbraced and kiss'd him. Four days after the above-mention'd Treaty, being the eighth of October 1518. another was concluded for an interview betwixt the Kings, accompanied with their Queens, and Madam Louise the Mother of Francis, and their Household Officers. The time appointed was the last of July 1519, at Sandfield in Picardy, or some other Neutral place, according as their Deputies on either side should advise; which upon the first of April following were to meet together for this purpose.

While Affairs past thus with France and Scotland, the Pope sent Laurentius Campejus Cardinal as Legate, hither; to procure a general League among Christian Princes (or at least a quinquennial Truce) for a War against the Turk. Besides, he gave him Authority to demand a Tenth from our Clergy, as also a Commission (specified in a Bull) wherein Cardinal Woolsey and himself had Legatine power to visit Monasteries. This Legate (called by Polydore, Inter Jurisconsultos Jureconsultissimus; the most a Lawyer of all the Lawyers) coming to Calais was desired by our Cardinal to stay there, as our * Historians write, till he had procured from Rome that Woolsey might be join'd in the aforesaid Commission with him; but, as I find in our Records and Polydore, until he had obtain'd from the Pope, that Hadrian de Castello, the Cardinal (now in Prison for a Conspiracy against the Pope) might be devested from the Bishoprick of Bath, and the Dignity conferred on him; of which also he had the greater hope, that the Pope (as I find by our Records) had condemn'd him for the said Conspiracy. Besides, it was the care of our Cardinal, to suffer none to have access to our King, whom he had not first oblig'd. Therefore our Cardinal presented him, together with a promise to assist him for the Bishoprick of Salisbury when it should fall, some red Cloth to apparel his Train, which otherwise were but poorly cloath'd. To suit this also the * night before his coming to London, he sent him twelve Mules, with empty Coffers fairly covered; some of which yet were overturn'd and broken in his passage through the City, to the great shame of Campejus; who finding at last his demand for a Tenth rejected by our Clergy, advertises the Pope, and proceeds to the other point of visiting Monasteries. But our cunning Cardinal thinking himself able enough to discharge this Office alone, (while Campejus staid in England) dispatches John Clarke Doctor of Law to the Pope, both to give account of this business, and to obtain the whole Power for himself. This Clarke coming to Rome, negotiated by our King's commandment, so well on the Cardinal's behalf, that he obtained from the Pope a * Bull, whereby (Campejus being now revoked.) he was made Legat a Latere, and enabled to visit not only Monasteries, but all the Clergy of England, and dispence with Church-Laws for one Year next ensuing the date thereof: Which though it gave him great Power, ministred much Offence; as abridging the Bishops Power, and scandalizing the whole Clergy, who were so defam'd by the Cardinal's Information, that they were termed Dati in reprobum sensum, given up to a reprobate sense, and the like, in the original Bull among our Records, which I should have insert'd in to contextu intire, but that it is too long and infamous to the Hierarchy, and all religious Persons. And now (saith Polydore) the Cardinal's Pride did so prodigiously increase, that on solemn Feast Days, he would say Mass after the manner of the Pope himself, not only Bishops and Abbots serving him therein, but even Dukes and Earls giving him Water and the Towel. Besides, not contented with the Cross of York to be carried before him, he added another of his Legacy, which two of the tallest Priests that could be found, carried on great Horses before him.

Cardinal Woolsey's Power.

His prodigious Pride.

1518. Infomuch (as Polydore saith) it grew to a Jest, as if one Cross did not suffice for the expiation of his Sins. All this yet was but a kind of prelude to that which follow'd. For, erecting a particular Court of Jurisdiction, which he call'd the Legats Court, and placing in it as Judge one John Allen Doctor of Law, thought to be a perjur'd wicked Person, all manner of Rapines and Extortions were committed there. For making enquiry into the life of every Body, no offence escap'd Censure and Punishment, unless privately they gave Money; of which they found two Commodities: One that it did cost less, the other that it exempted them from shame. Thus as the Rules of Conscience are in many cases of a greater extent, than those of the Law, so he found means to search even into their secretest corners. Besides, under this colour he arrogated power to call in question the Executors of Wills, and the like. He summon'd also all Religious Persons of what sort soever before him; who, casting themselves at his feet, were grievously chidden, and terrifi'd with Expulsion, till they had compounded. Besides, all Spiritual Livings that fell were conferr'd on his Creatures. The Archbishop of Canterbury understanding how all Orders were thus ransack'd by the Cardinal, goes to the King, and acquaints him with it. The King replies, that he should not have heard hereof but by him; adding, that no Man is so blind any where, as in his own House; Therefore, I pray you, said he, Father, go to Woolsey, and tell him, if any thing be amiss, that he amend it. This grave Person hereupon admonishes him, and afterwards particularly told him, that in meddling with the last Wills and Testament of the dead, he assum'd a Power, not so much as claim'd by the Pope himself, and for disposing some Benefices in the gift of the Nobility, and other great Persons, he thought he usurp'd too much upon them. All the use Woolsey made thereof was to hate the Archbishop, with whom he was formerly offended; only because (as Polydore hath it) he styl'd himself in the Subscription of his Letter Gulielmus Frater Cantuariensis, your Brother William Cant. Yet lest the Archbishop should do him ill Offices, he temper'd his Speech for the time. But shortly after his Agent John Allen being accus'd by one John London a Priest, it appear'd sufficiently that all the former Allegations against Woolsey were true; which made our King rebuke the Cardinal so sharply, that after that time, he became, if not better, yet more wary than before: at this time also certain abuses about Sanctuaries were taken away by the King's Authority in sequence of a Bull granted to that purpose by Julius the Second 1504. June 19. to King Henry the Seventh.

1517. Let us turn our Eyes on foreign Busineses, now somewhat intermitted. Charles intending a journey into Spain, the French King offer'd him the convenience of passing through France, and Hostages for security, together with the Keys of the Cities he should go thorough; but Charles (as our Ambassadors write) refus'd, saying, if he landed any where it should be in England. According to which Resolution, taking Ship, he came to Spain Aug. 25. 1517. as Sandoval hath it, (our Records say he set not to Sea till Sept. 8.) where he found things much discompos'd, through the severity of the Cardinal Ximenes. Besides, there wanted not suspicion that many would have set up his Brother Ferdinand against him, whom therefore he shortly after sent to Flanders. Howsoever Ximenes dy'd, not without probability that he was poyson'd, though by whom is uncertain. Charles his first Art was calling a Cortes or Parliament in Castilla and Leon, which pass'd not without trouble; there being no little contention whether the People should first swear Obedience to Charles, or he the observance of their ancient Laws, Liberties, and Priviledges, which yet at last was so temper'd, as they came near in time together; though, for conserving the Royal Dignity, some particular Persons were induc'd to swear first. He also caus'd Jufts and Tourneys to be held according to the manner of that Age: Into which Sandoval saith, sixty Cavaliers enter'd, their Lances pointed with Diamonds, who also encountred so roughly, that most of them were overthrownd and fore hurt, and twelve Horses kill'd; though yet this was little in regard of a Jufts that follow'd, at which seven of the Actors were kill'd outright; wherein nevertheless Charles, though very young, appear'd, breaking three Lances in four Carriers. After this, establishing some Laws, and obtaining some Money from his People, he went to Aragon, where he call'd a Cortes likewise; and shortly after, (hearing, that since the death of Horruce Barbarossa (who from a low fortune and birth, made himself first a formidable Pirat, then * King of Argier) Hariadin Barbarossa his Brother, succeeded in that Kingdom; and in the exercise of Piracy,) sent Don Hugo de Moncada Vice-roy of Sicily to Argier, with as ill success as their Expeditions thither have commonly prov'd. Not long after which, news was brought him of the death of Louise of France, whom by the Treaty of Noyon he should have marry'd, and of the sickness of Maximilian; who, now growing old and infirm, determin'd to make one of his Grand-children Emperor: Assembling for this purpose a Diet at Augsburgh, and proposing particularly Ferdinand; as believing the Electors would sooner choose him, than greaten any other Prince with that Accession. But as he alone could not dispose this business, so both Francis and Charles were earnest in it. Our King also not omitting to discover how Germany stood affected to him; and the rather, that the Pope, as I find by our Records, did encourage him thereunto. Maximilians death upon a dysentery January 12. 1519, ensuing this while, Richard Pace and Death. was * sent to Germany by our King; who, in * May 20. his † Dispatches certifi'd with what Ambition † June 20. Francis and Charles aspir'd to this Dignity; saying nevertheless, that the Electors of Mayentz, Colem. K. Henry, and Triers stood so affected, that if our King had put in sooner, and before they were engag'd, he thought his Majesty might have carry'd it, since the Popes Nuncio there affirm'd still he had Commission from his Holiness to assist him; as being desirous it were bestow'd on any rather than either Charles or Francis, but especially on Charles. Though at last, finding that betwixt Money given, and Forces rais'd by Charles, he would prevail, his Holiness thought fit to comply, and give his assent: and the rather, that the Duke of Saxony, whom the Electors once nominated, refus'd it. Whereupon June 28, 1519. Charles was publicly chosen at Francfort; News whereof being brought to Barcelona, at first rejoyc'd, but afterwards troubled him; as considering what a burden he had undertaken, especially in a time when the Turk made his approaches against Christendom. Yet, were not these all his Cares; for, as his Clergy in Spain was so offended at the demand of a tenth of their Revenue towards a War against Infidels, that there was Cessatio a Sandoval. Divinis, no Divine Service, (as Sandoval hath it) for above four Months in all the Kingdom; and as the People again began a dangerous Inturrection for the conservation of their Liberties (which endur'd some years following, with more method than in such popular Commotions are ordinarily ordinarily found) so he had much to do at home. Besides the People in Austria began another no less dangerous in those parts, and of little less Continuance. Again, Francis, who was now in good correspondence with our King, press'd the restitution of Navarre, according to the Treaty of Noyon, and rais'd him troubles in Naples and Sicily. All which important Affairs yet were pretermitted, only to comply with the Ceremony (for it was no more) of receiving the Imperial Crown, so secure was he of all things but his Title; only in the midst of these Afflictions, the happy news of the Discovery, and begun Conquest of Mexico, and Nueva Espana arriv'd; which though worthy a particular Relation, I shall not insert, lest I should too much increase the bulk of this History. Though for giving a taste thereunto, I shall not omit to tell my Reader, that Hernando Cortes, undertaker thereof, going with about four hundred Spanish Foot, and fifteen Horse, and seven little Field-Pieces, into many populous, but diversly affected Kingdoms, did so dexterously behave himself, that, playing the part sometimes of an Ambassador, and sometimes of a Soldier, he prevail'd himself of all. And, in conclusion, notwithstanding the opposition both of his Country-men and Enemies, laid a foundation of a greater Dominion than any Man before him did. Before yet I come to the Actions of the New Emperor, I shall exhibit the Description of Maximilian I have collected out of several Authors.

This Maximilian, being King of the Romans, and call'd Emperor, though never Crown'd by that Title, gave much occasion of discourse concerning the reason thereof; some saying, he declin'd the charge and hazard of going into Italy for receiving the Imperial Crown at the Popes hands; others believing, that according to his often profession, he meant first to be Emperor of Constantinople, which he said was his most lawful Title. As for his Education, he was a Prince brought up in much Ignorance, yet studious to repair that defect by Conversation with the more learned fort. His bounty was observ'd such, that it extended even to the disabling him in the pursuit of his Designs; wherein he made a Royal virtue Criminal. He had treated with the Princes of his time, with so ill success, that he knew not in what posture to keep himself; being in the same danger for the most part, whether his faith were broken or theirs. This made him devout even to Superstition. For his Enterprises in the War, as they were many, so they ended differently, he getting sometimes more by a bad Peace, than a just War. His spare time he employ'd in Poetry, writing the History of his Life in Dutch Verse, which Book by Pedro Mexia is call'd Tuur denck, and another call'd Puerto de la Honra. One of his chiefest happinesses was, that his Posterity came to enjoy some of the greatest and best parts of Europe. He was of the Order of the Garter, and his Obsequy was solemnly kept in St. Pauls, by our King and the Knights of that Fellowship.

I must remember now, that at the conclusion of the Treaty with France, October 8. 1518. it was agreed betwixt both Princes, that there should be an Interview in July 1519, which yet took not effect, because of the death of Maximilian, and the occasions ensuing formerly mentioned; therefore it was put off till 1520; both Kings in the mean while agreeing not to cut off their Beards, till they saw each other. Francis having also now a second Son, desir'd our King to give him his Name; which our King accepted kindly, calling him Henry, (afterwards King, and second of that name.) Neither did he omit any thing, which might argue his respect. Therefore he solicited our Cardinal (whom he call'd his Father and Cousin) still with Gifts, sends Presents to the Princess Mary, and leaves nothing unattempted which might secure him on that side, knowing well how puissant an Enemy he had provok'd. Charles on the other side, considering how much it concern'd him to keep the Cardinal at his Devotion, countermines Francis in his own way. On which occasion I shall observe, that, as since the discoveries of the Indies, Coin hath been much more plentiful, so greater matters have been done in these later times by Bribes, than by the Sword; those who have Money (that is to say, a Seed which will spring any thing in corrupt Minds) finding means, either in the Authors or the Actors in businesses, to dispose them to their ends, or at least to make advantage of the intelligence they receive from them. Francis suspecting what might follow hereupon, provides betimes to keep the Scots his friends; therefore though it was his motion formerly to comprise the young King and that Nation in general within his League with England, yet now he strives as much to withdraw them: Therefore when our King sent to require their Oath thereunto, they refus'd; so that all that business ended in a Truce only for one year. And here I must not omit to relate the Cardinal's extream Ambition; who having a design to make himself Pope, did ever comply with those, who he thought might be his best Assistants. Therefore now that Charles was grown the more Potent, and that, besides it was manifest, that, to which Party soever our King inclin'd, he would turn the Ballance, he hop'd by favouring Charles to obtain his desire. Neither wanted he continual Presents on his part equal to, if not exceeding the others; so that now he rejected the assistance of Francis, though offering him the Voices of fourteen Cardinals (as I find by our Records) and applies himself to Charles; Nevertheless the design for the Interview with Francis continu'd; which being minuted by our Ambassador Sir Thomas Bolen, was continu'd by his Successor in France Sir Richard Wingfield; among whose Dispatches (extant in our Records) I find this passage in a Letter to the King, March 16. I have presented to the French King the Sword, for the nimble handling whereof, he hath nor knoweth no fear, but thought it not maniable: And call'd the Admiral to him, and caus'd him to feel the weight thereof, who shew'd him that he had seen your Grace weild one more weighty. But for such promise as he had made your Highness, he might not discover it; saving that it was by means of a Gantlet. The French King desires one of those Gantlets, and he will send your Grace such a pair of Cuirasses, as your Grace hath not seen, the secret whereof is for the easie bearing of such weight, as rests upon the Cuirasses, which is commonly born by the Shoulders, and in this Cuirass the Shoulder bears no burden. All which I have set down, to awaken the industry of these times in such Inventions. I will come now to the order of the Interview, remitted both by our King and Francis unto the Cardinal's direction. Who accordingly, upon the 12th of March 1520, declar'd this Order. That, in regard his King was to pass the Seas, to his Danger and Cost, and should leave his Kingdom, only to do Francis Honour: Therefore that the Interview should not be in a Neutral place, but that King Henry, his Queen, and the Queen Dowager of France should come to Guines, and the French King, his Queen, and Madam Louise his Mother to Ardres, before the end of May next; and then that, before 4 of June following, King Henry should go half a League towards Ardres, without passing yet the limits of Guines or the English Pale, and 1520. and there, in some open place, near the Confines of the French, (which should be declar'd by Deputies on either side) the said French King parting from Ardres the same day, and hour, and coming to the said place (where no Tent was to be pitch'd) should meet the said King Henry within his own Territories, and there should salute one another, and speak together on Horseback, as long as they pleas'd. This being done, that the French King should return to Ardres, and King Henry to Guisnes. The next day that the said Kings should meet in some Neutral place, to be nominated by their Deputies; where, after Salutations on both sides, King Henry should go to Ardres to see and dine with the Queen of France, and his Mother, and the French King to Guisnes, to see and dine with the Queen of England, and Dowager of France. That the said Interview should be celebrated with Tournneys and Juits, and Exercises of Arms, as well on Foot, as on Horseback, in some place chosen by the said Deputies, betwixt Guisnes and Ardres; which should be ditch'd, fortified, and guarded by an equal number of Persons to be appointed by the said Kings. And that, during the said Exercises of Arms, the Queen's and their Train might familiarly converse together, in the Evening still returning to their several Lodgings of Ardres and Guisnes. That the honour and precedence, should be given to them still, who came to see the other. That the number of the Persons and Horses permitted to be at this Interview, should be sign'd in certain Rolls by the said Kings, and should not be increas'd without mutual Consent. That two Gentlemen with an equal number of followers should watch continually upon the Highways, as well for surety of the said King's Persons, as for the safer conducting the Victuals. And that these every night should give account, to their several Kings and Councillors, of their Charge. That the Soldiers of the Garrisons of Boulogne and Calais should not come near, without express license of both Kings. I find also that it was agreed, that the number of strokes at Tournney should be determin'd by the Ladies; who therefore were requir'd to come thither from all places, that could furnish Beauty, and worth enough to deserve so much Honour. This being concluded, the Earl of Worcester, on our Kings part, and Monsieur de Chastillon on the part of Francis, laid out the ground for these Triumphs, betwixt Guisnes and Ardres, but within the English Pale. While these Magnificences were preparing, much discourse pass'd betwixt both Princes, and the Ambassadors resident in either Court, concerning the Ancient forms us'd at great Solemnities. Among which it appears, in a dispatch of Wingfield's, that Francis told him, how he had heard that our Edward, (I think he meant Edward the Third,) was us'd at such times to have his meat carry'd up by Cavaliers on Horse-back; But to let these things pass, and come to our History, I find Francis purpos'd still his Point, and is so confident now of the Cardinals favour, that he durst make an overture to him, for restoring Calais, and all the other Towns in the English Pale, for a certain Sum of Money. Neither was it ill entertain'd by the Cardinal; though the difficulty of effecting it did somewhat deter him. For as the narrow Seas have been (time out of mind) under the Jurisdiction of the English, and that our Ships, in making and keeping the passage over, were a kind of Bridge, so it could not but seem strange, to every Man well-affected to his Country, that any Motion should be made, whereby we might loose the further end thereof, and therein deprive our selves of a Landing-place. Therefore the Cardinal did not think fit to propose the business at once, nor without discovering first, how it would take with the general sort. For this purpose, then, he would cast out these words in his ordinary Speech, and at his Table; whensoever there was question of foreign Business.

The Order of it.

April. To be within the English Pale.

The French K. treats with Woolsey about the rendition of Calais, &c.

What have we to do with this Calais, that lies in the Continent, and costs us more than it is worth? I would we were honestly rid of it. ¶ The time now drew near, when, according to the Agreement, the two Kings were to meet betwixt Guisnes and Ardres. This also was seconded much by the Cardinal, who between Pride and Vanity, desir'd to see these two together; whom he was generally thought to govern. He knew also his Presents would not be little; therefore he perswaded our King to build some such House near Guisnes, as might be worthy the Reception of two so great Princes. To perform this, two thousand Artificers were appointed. The Model whereof is still extant in Greenwich, among those many rare Pictures, which the most vertuous Prince, King Charles my good King and Master hath. The Cardinal also summons the prime Nobility to attend the King this Journey, with that splendor which might become Persons of their Dignity. Some of the more thrifty sort yet, and especially the Duke of Buckingham repin'd hereat, laying the fault of this expence on the Cardinal chiefly, who hearing thereof, for this as well as some other causes, hereafter mention'd, resolv'd his ruine.

Charles the Emperor hearing now of these preparations for the Interview, thought fit personally to treat with our King, concerning the breaking it off, as well as all other friendship with Francis. For those Ambassadors whom he had sent before to the English Court for this purpose, had fail'd, our King alledging to them for all other Reasons, his Promise given. Neither could they deny, but the engagement was deep; for a King of Arms had been in the English Court on the part of Francis, with a Proclamation, declaring that, in June next, the two Kings, Henry and Francis, with fourteen Aids, would, in a Camp betwixt Ardres and Guisnes, answer all Comers that were Gentlemen, at Tilt, Tournney, and Barriers. The like Proclamation was made by Clarenceaux in the French Court. And yet these Defies stopt not there, for they were sent by our King to the Low-Countries, Burgundy, Germany, and by Francis into Spain, and Italy. And now our principal Noblemen had made themselves ready to attend the King. Among whom, none was so gorgeous as the Duke of Buckingham; who, finding the King yet not ready to set forth, went before to see some Lands he had in Kent. But his Tenants exclaiming there against one Charles Knevet his Steward or Surveyor, for exacting on them, the Duke discharg'd him. This piece of Justice yet prov'd afterwards the cause of his Overthrow, as shall be declar'd in his place, so fatal was it to that House of the Staffords to suffer by their Servants. Our King finding now the time of meeting to grow near, comes to Canterbury May 25, intending there to pass his Whitsonide. This while Charles the Emperor had so laid his journey from Spain, that the day following, himself accompany'd with divers, not only Lords but fair Ladies comes unexpectedly to Dover. Our Cardinal hearing this, posted away presently, to assure him of his welcome. Our King also the next day after, very early, came to Dover Castle, where the Emperor was lodg'd, who met him on the Stairs, where being saluted by our King, and afterwards conducted to his Chamber, Charles continues his Design to break this Interview, as well, as all other Correspondence with Francis: for both Charles and Francis had great designs at that time; Francis desir'd to hold the Territory of Milan, and to recover Naples, (which the French having * once got under Charles the Eighth, did again so suddenly † loose, that it seem'd no place there was strong enough, either to hold them out or keep them in) besides, he purpos'd to re-establish Henry d'Albret in the Kingdom of Navarre, according to the Treaty of Noyon. Again, the Duke of Geldres, being taken under his Protection, he could do no less than defend him against Charles, who laboured to bring that Province into subjection: But especially, the right he conceived to have in the Dutchy of Burgundy, he desired to conserve, against the pretences of Charles; who, on the other side, endeavour'd to oppose him in all these Places; and was, besides, offended that Francis, declining an Accord made before in * Paris, had extorted from him new Conditions in the Treaty at † Noyon. Therefore, knowing no Prince could so much help or hinder him in these Affairs, as our King, he offers more advantageous Conditions than Francis did. And to make this the more acceptable yet, he had largely both presented the Cardinal, and promis'd (if ever occasion happen'd) to make him Pope. And that he might the better in Gifts exceed his Competitor Francis, a great part of the Spoils of Mexico had been brought him. In the first part our King excus'd himself, as being far engag'd in honour to meet Francis; but for the latter, he bid him be confident, as soon as this Interview was past. From thence then, our King invited him to Canterbury, where he gladly saw his Aunt Queen Katherine; the Queen Dowager of France also (once proposed for his Wife) seem'd very considerable, as being for her Beauty much celebrated by the English and French Writers. And, if we may believe Polydore, his Passion in seeing of her was sad, as he could not be persuaded to dance, and not that Spanish gravity, which, in his Age, and amongst such Company, might well have been laid aside. Therefore, having pass'd over the Whitsontide Holy-Days in those Sports and Entertainments, which our King gave him, he * departs to Sandwich, whence † taking Ship he arriv'd in his native Country of Flanders, while our King the same day pass'd to Dover; and thence * with all his Train and Company to Calais. The 4th of June, the King, two Queens, and all the rest, who were assign'd in his Roll or List, remov'd to his Princely Lodging near Guines, being a Square of Timber, whereof every side contain'd three hundred twenty eight Foot, with a Savage before it, carrying a Bow and Arrows, and the words Cui adhæreo præest; he governs with whom I side: The parts of which great Building, having been artificially framed in England, were now put together, and afterwards taken asunder, and brought home. This, again, was most sumptuously furnish'd, especially the Chappel; from which a private Gallery reached to the strong Castle of Guines. The House for Francis (near Ardes) was a Building rather great than costly, as being erected with such Materials, as could be gotten in haste; his first Intention being to lodge in a rich Pavilion of Cloth of Gold, until the Wind threw it down. Before yet these Kings met together, the Cardinal went to see Francis, and treat with him concerning some particulars, about the Marriage betwixt the Dauphin and Princess Mary: The substance whereof was, (as I find by the French Records) That after the Million of Crowns (agreed on in May 1515.) were satisfied, Francis should pay at Calais one hundred thousand Livres Tournois yearly to our King, until the Marriage were solemnized in the face of the Church; and so, during the life of the said Henry; after which if the Dauphin should in Right of his Wife, be King of England, to her and her Heirs. But if the Marriage were not accomplished, then the said payment should cease. As for the Differences betwixt England 1520. and Scotland, That Madam, the King's Mother, and the Cardinal of Tork should determine them: All which were concluded the 6th of June 1520. June 6. The day following the Interview began. The The Interview. Signal of departing was a warning Piece, to be shot, when either of the Kings were ready. This being given, they both issued forth royally attended. There was some stay yet, upon a report, that the Numbers exceeded the Lists agreed on. Francis stopp'd first, and our King afterwards; it being told him by the Lord Abergavenny, the French were twice as many. But the Earl of Shrewsbury affirming, the French were more afraid of the English, than the English of them, they went on, our King (being thought the goodliest Prince of his time) appearing somewhat before the rest. The French King beholding the demeanour of the English a while, rode himself also before his Train, the Duke of Bourbon bearing a naked Sword before him, and his Admiral and Master of the Horse following him. Our King observing this, caus'd the Marquis Dorset, who bare the Sword of Estate, to draw it, and go on likewise. At last coming near, and the Trumpets sounding on both sides, they both alighted in the Valley of Arden, and saluted each other, passing from thence Arm in Arm to a Tent of Cloth of Gold erected there (the first Agreement concerning these Points, being it seems so much alter'd.) Where, Compliments being pass'd on both sides, they took leave, and return'd to their several Lodgings. Upon the 9th both Kings came to view the Camp, or June 9. Place of Exercise, being 300 Yards long and 106 broad, well ditch'd and fenc'd, save at the entries; having on the side Scaffolds erected for the Beholders. There were also set up two artificial Trees (the one a Hawthorne for Henry our King, the other a Frambousier or Rasp-bush for Francis) with the Arms of the two Kings and their several Aids, on which also the Articles of Jufts, Tourney and Barriers were fastned. The Aiders on the English side were the Duke of Suffolk, the Marquis Dorset, Sir William Kingston, Sir Richard Jerningham, Sir Giles Capel, Mr. Nicholas Carewe, and Mr. Anthony Knevet. On the French Party were Monsieur le Duc de Vendosme, Mr. de Saint Pol, Mr. de Montmorancy, Mr. de Bryon, Mr. de Saint Mesme, Maister de Brucall, and Maister Tabanes. To encounter these again, divers noble Persons, and good Cavaliers came from Foreign Countries; who, presenting their Arms to the Herald, were thereupon admitted to the Exercise, being appointed upon Monday the 11th. when June 11. the Queens on both sides and Ladies coming to the place, the Kings armed themselves, with their Aids, who did wear suitable Liveries on either side. I will not here particularly set down the courses of these Champions, since Hall, who seems to have been an Eye-witness, relates them at large. And less shall I recount their Devices, approaching much to the Rebus of Picardie; according (perchance) to the manner of that time. Let it suffice that, among all, none did better (if so well) as the two Kings, and especially ours; who disabled Monsieur de Grandeville at the second Course to run any more that Day. Monsieur de Montmorancy held him yet better to it, yet so, as to get no advantage. This Exercise continued four Days together: The next Day, the French King came early to Guines, with a small Train; our King also (after giving him his bien-venu) departing with the like Equipage to Ardes; so that they pass'd that Day with feasting and dancing with the Queens, and other Ladies on either side. Only I observe our King's manner was more genteel than that of Francis: For, 1520. For, coming disguis'd in Masking Clothes, he not only prevented Treachery against his Person, when any was intended, but avoided contestation for Precedence in his return home, that night, when he met Francis by the way. On Sunday * they repos'd, for the honour of that Day; and on Monday for foul Weather. On Tuesday they continued their Courses with a like honour: On Wednesday, being the twentieth, the Tourney began; where with Swords was a rude Chamailis; yet the Kings and their Aids beat the Counter-party to a disarming: Where our King, particularly, got that honour, that a brave French noble Man with whom he fought, presented him his Horse as a gage of his being overcome. The next Day our King in Tourney likewise broke the Poldron of Monsi. de Fluranges, and made him depart the Camp. But this Sport was so rough, that four of the Aids being hurt, others were substituted in their places. The 22d. the Barriers began; and, after it, the casting of Hand-spears or Darts, with the Target, and fighting with the two-handed Sword. At which Exercise likewise much Commendations was given to either King. For celebrating these Magnificences also, the Cardinal solemnly sung an high Mass, being attended in the most Pontifical manner. At the close whereof, he dispensed the Treasure of the Roman Church (being the Indulgences granted by Leo X.) unto the two Kings, who that Day din'd together by themselves, their Queens eating together also in an other Room: This being done, they both turn'd to Barriers, where our King, with a few strokes, disarm'd his Adversary. The next Day our King, with his Sister Queen Mary, went in Masking Apparel to see the French Queen at Ardres, Francis likewise going to the English Queen. At the return they alighted, and after many Compliments, Embraces, and rich Presents to each other, bid Adieu the twenty fourth of June. Polydore observes yet, that there was some abruptness in the farewell; and saith Francis told our King, that our Nation did not well comply with the French in their mutual Visits. But our King putting this off discreetly, their discourse passed no further. And perchance the occasion of this Mal-entendu, was, that the French gave forth, Calais should be deliver'd up for Money. The next Day the King and all his Train departed to Calais, giving license unto many there to return unto England. Upon the 10th of July, the Emperor being at Graveling, (with his Aunt the Lady Margaret) our King (at their Request) admits another Interview. To this purpose going towards Graveling, the Emperor met him on the way, and conducted him thither, giving for the rest to the English all that good Entertainment so little a Place could afford. The next Day, the Emperor and his Aunt the Lady Margaret went with our King to Calais, where much Maskings, and Magnificences passing, Business yet were not forgot. For our King (together with Monsieur de-la-Roche, employ'd for Francis) read and offer'd to Charles (now Emperor) the Tripartite League, sign'd betwixt them formerly; requiring him to enter thereunto by the name of Emperor (as I conceive it.) But the Emperor having formerly sign'd the League by the name of Charles, and besides desiring more the accomplishing of his Designs in Italy, and else-where, than to confirm that Agreement, so deferr'd or avoided this Proposition; that I find not what effect it presently took. But it is probable he was not willing to engage our King any further in the affairs, betwixt himself and Francis, as thinking that he was alone too strong for his adversary. He would also have gone out of Town that night, being, the third after his coming; but our King using a courteous kind of violence to make him stay, the rumour went among the Emperor's Servants, that he was detain'd; but the next day clear'd this: for the Emperor, being conducted some part of his way towards Graveling, was courteously bid farewell, and presented with a brave Courser richly trapped. The French King hearing of these kind passages, and remembring particularly that Charles, by his first agreement had constituted our King, Arbiter of all emergent differences, took this Interview extremely ill; and the rather that he heard some muttering of a Match propos'd by the Lady Margaret, betwixt the Emperor and the Princess Mary, though a Child. Which yet was a mistake, it being not treated of seriously (as the Spanish writers have it) till near two Years after; and not before the French had both broken the common League, and given new provocations by their practices in Scotland. Our King having now no more to do at Calais, took the first fair wind, and, with all his Train, came safely into England.

I shall return now to the business of Luther, whom Leo cited to Rome, 1518, giving * order also to Cardinal Cajetan his Legat in Germany, to oppose his Doctrine, not omitting Letters to this purpose, both to Fredericke Duke of Saxony, and to the Superior of the Augustines in Germany: Whereupon Cajetan, in divers Conferences at the Diet of Augsburg, labours to convert him, but in vain. At last Luther, being threatned by Cajetan in the Pope's name, he appeals to him, in the form usual in these Cases, tantum a Pontifice minus edocto ad eundem rectius edocendum; from the Pope under misinformation, to the same Pope better informed; but desires, withal, he might answer for himself in Germany, and that caution might be given for his safety; since what was controverted by him, did not appear as yet to be positively defin'd any way by the Church. Leo, this while, to make good his Authority * grants new Indulgences, which no Man should reject unless he would be excommunicate, &c. Luther finding, thus, no hope of alteration, and besides that he was branded with the name of Heretick, * appeals from Leo to a General Council; yet writes to the Pope, (1519) a very submissive Letter, wherein he protests, That he was never intended to fall away from the Church. That all he said, was chiefly intended against those who abused the Power of Indulgences; concerning which therefore he would speak no more, so that his Adversaries were likewise silenced; briefly, that he would omit nothing, which might concern Peace in Religion.

Maximilian dying about this time, Luther had some respite. Mens Eyes being turned more on him, who was to succeed Maximilian, than any other Argument. Besides, he seem'd now unwilling any longer to dispute the Pope's Authority, to which his Adversaries enviously reduced all the controverted Points. Yet as Ulricus Zuinglius appeared about this time at Zurich, to consent with Luther in many things, and that a Letter of Erasmus also, dated 1519, did much encourage him, so he began to recover force. That of Erasmus (extant l. 6. Epistol.) telling him, he had some Favourers in the Low-Countries, but many in England, and among them divers principal Persons; that yet he should do well to use Modesty and Discretion; Christ having thereby both instituted his Doctrine, and his Apostle Paul destroyed the Jewish Law, only by referring the Doctrine and Precepts contained therein unto Allegorie. That he should do well to speak against those rather who abused the Papal Authority, than against the Pope himself. In conclusion, that he should take heed of doing any thing out of Anger, Hate, or Vain-glory.

An Interview between Charles V. and King Henry. July 11.

1520. Philip Melancthon also, a Learned, Pious, and Charitable Man, did many ways second Luther. Concerning all whom, and many more famous Scholars, who liv'd at that time, it may be observ'd, that had they agreed among themselves, and not ambitiously affected Singularity in some one Point or other, they might have found more followers of their Doctrine, and consequently have oblig'd the Pope either to cut off some points as superfluous, or to have recommended them with more indifferency to the People. However, all these Persons concurring with Luther in great part, gave him that Courage, that whereas at first he disputed chiefly concerning Purgatory, true Penitency, (or Penance) the Office or Duty of Charity, and Indulgencies and Pardons, he began now to question the Popes Authority, Images in Churches, the Celibate of Priests, and some other points tending hereunto. As this yet got him great fame, so it procur'd him many Enemies; before whom, that he might give an account of his Doctrine, he comes to Conference at Lipsick, 1519. accompany'd with Philip Melancthon, where John Eccius oppos'd him, desiring to begin his Disputation at the Popes Authority; but Luther, conceiving this was to make him odious, labours to decline the Question; for the rest, thinking fit only to send unto the Pope; to whom, about the beginning of 1520, he writes to this effect. That, though he appeal'd from him heretofore to a General Council, it was not with an ill mind, as having in his continual Prayers solicited the Almighty for him. That he could not deny himself to be sharp and censorious enough, when offence was given; yet that he ever thought well of his Holiness in particular, only it griev'd him that he liv'd in so wicked a Court as that of his at Rome, which he said was now become another Babylon or Sodom; that he being amidst such People, as a Lamb amongst Wolves, it were pitty he should any longer reside there. That it were better for him therefore to leave all, and descend to some simple Parsonage or Living, or otherwise to maintain himself with what he had gotten already, than to hazard himself to such Pestilencies and Infections; That, in this Advice, he did but imitate Bernard, who did deplore the estate of Eugenius, when Rome was far purer than at this day. In conclusion, he recommends to him his late Book entituled, De libertate Christiana. But whatsoever Luthers advice was, I cannot believe him so simple, as to suppose his words had either the Power or Spells to call the Pope from his Seat, or that tendernefs of Conscience to live among wicked Persons, was enough to make him forsake, together with his charge, all his Dignities and Honours; therefore I believe he meant this, as the Pope himself understood it, only for a Pasquil, or Satyr; which made him also assemble the Cardinals, and consult with them herein, who all condemn'd Luther; yet not so, but it was wish'd by some, a Reformation of divers abuses had either preceded Luthers Admonition, or at least accompany'd it at that time, when in humble and modest terms he submitted himself to the Church. That their arrogating supreme power in temporal things, had made divers Princes disaffect their Government, who yet embrac'd their Doctrine. That, therefore, it was not safe to suffer them to have an Author for deserting the Church, who had already sought occasions for it, in the late Council of Pisa, and elsewhere; Neither was it a good Argument, to say that Luther was a dangerous Person; since, the more hurt he could do, the less he was to be forc'd to extremities; as having betwixt his Wit and Favourers, enough to trouble all things: Briefly, that, to avoid his venomous Doctrine, the best way was not to urge him to cast it forth, but rather (if it could be done handsomly) to quiet him by bestowing some Ecclesiastical Pre-ferment. But so haughty were the major part of the Spirits in this Assembly, that rejecting this Politick Advice, they condemn'd Luthers Books to the Fire; but Luther growing hereupon but more fierce, was at length Excommunicated, and his Books burnt. He, on the other side, striving to revenge this, at Wittenburg in a full Assembly of Scholars burns * the Book call'd Jus Pontificum; warning Men besides to take heed of the Papal Government, and Doctrines, appealing again to a Council. Charles, understanding these Passages, was much troubled, as foreseeing the following Dissentions. Nevertheless, he temper'd business so, as he held the Pope thereby in some suspense; therefore he would not precipitate his sentence against Luther, or so much as censure him, till he were publicly heard. For which purpose, (after his being * Crown'd solemnly at Aix.) He assembled a Dyet at Worms, whether he call'd Luther, giving him a safe Conduct also, to go and return. Whereupon Luther * came in his Fryers Habit, but refusing to retract his Opinions, he and his favourers were † pro-scrib'd by Decree or Edict. Howbeit, as this did rather punish than convince him; our King (being at leisure now from Wars, and for the rest delighting much in Learning) thought he could not give better proof either of his Zeal or Education, than to write against Luther. To this also he was exasperated, that Luther had oftentimes spoken contemptuously of the learned Thomas of Aquine, who yet was so much in request with the King, and especially the Cardinal, that (as Polydore hath it) he was therefore call'd Thomisticus. Our King hereupon compiles a Book, wherein he strenuously opposes Luther in the point of Indulgences, number of Sacraments, the Papal Authority, and other particulars, to be seen in that his work, entituled De sept. Sacramentis; a principal Copy whereof, richly bound, being sent to Leo, I remember my self to have seen in the Vatican Library. The manner of delivery whereof (as I find it in our * Record) was thus; Doctor John Clarke Dean of Windsor our Kings Ambassador, appearing in full Consistory, the Pope, knowing the glorious Present he brought, first gave him his Foot, and then his Cheeks to kiss; then receiving the Book, he promis'd to do as much for Approbation thereof to all Christian Princes (which our King much desir'd) as ever was done for Saint Augustin's or Saint Hierom's Works; assuring him withal, that the next Consistory he would bestow a publick Title on our King: Which having been * heretofore privately debated among the Cardinals, and those of Protector or Defender of the Roman Church, or of the Apostolical Chair; or Apostolical, or Orthodox King. LEO Bishop, Servant of the Servants of God, to our most dearly beloved Son in Christ, Henry King of England, Defender of the Faith, Health and Apostolical Benediction. We, by Divine permission, the chief Overseer for the Government of the Universal Church, though unsufficient for so great a Work, do pour forth the cogitations of our Heart, that the Catholick Faith, without which no Man can attain to Salvation, may receive continual Increase, and that those good Laws and Constitutions decreed, by the wisdom and learning of such as are in Authority, especially the faithful in Christ, for restraining the attempts of all that labour to oppress the same, or by wicked lies and fictions seek to pervert and obscure it, may prosper with perpetual Increase, we do bestow our pains and utmost endeavour in our Office and Ministry. And like as the Roman Bishops our Predecessors were wont to shew especial favour to the Catholick Princes (according as the quality of matters and times requir'd) especially to them that in troublesome times, when the madness and perfidious dealings of Schismatics and Hereticks most of all abound, did abide constant and immovable not only in the soundness of Faith, and pure Devotion to the holy Roman Church, but also as the most Legitimate Sons and valiant Champions of the same, oppos'd themselves both with Mind and Body against the furious madness of Schismatics and Hereticks. So also do we desire to extol your Majesty with worthy and immortal Praises, for your high and immortal deserts and labour toward us and this Holy See, wherein by God's permission we sit, to grant unto it those things for which it ought to watch, and drive away the Wolves from the Lord's Flock, and to cut off with the Material Sword, rotten Members which infect the Mystical Body of Christ, and to confirm the hearts of the faithful in soundness of Belief. Now whereas of late our beloved Son John Clerk, your Majesties Orator with us, being in our Consistory before our venerable Brethren of the Holy Roman Church, the Cardinals and 1521. and many other Prelates of the same, exhibited a Book unto us to be examined and allowed of us, which Book your Majesty, (who doth all things with diligence, and nothing amiss) enflamed with Charity and Zeal to the Catholick Faith, and with ardent devotion towards us and this Holy See, hath composed, as a most worthy and sovereign antidote against the errors of divers Hereticks, often condemned by this Holy See, and of late stirred up and brought in by Martin Luther: And your said Orator hath also largely declared unto us, that your Majesty is ready and purposeth, like as you have confuted the notorious Errors of the said Martin, by true Reason and invincible Authority of Sacred Scripture and ancient Fathers; so you will punish to the uttermost of your Power all those of your whole Kingdom, that shall presume to follow or defend them: And we have diligently and exactly perused and viewed the admirable Doctrine of your said Book, watered with the Dew of heavenly Grace, and do heartily thank Almighty God, from whom every good and perfect Gift doth come, who hath vouchsafed to inspire your noble Mind, inclined to every good thing, and to endue you with so great Grace from Heaven, as to write those things, whereby you are able to defend his holy Faith, against such a new Innovator of damned Errors: And also invite by your Example all other Christian Kings and Princes to be willing to favour and to further, with all their best Aids, the Orthodox Faith, and Evangelical Truth, whencesoever it be brought into danger or doubt. And we think it also meet, that they who have undertaken such godly Labours for us, should meet their due and just Commendations: And we are desirous that not only the things themselves which your Majesty hath written, being both of most sound Doctrine, and no less Eloquence, should be extolled and magnified with candid Commendations, and allowed and confirmed by our Authority; but also that your Majesty should be graced with such an Honour, and such a Title, as that both for our time and ever hereafter, all Men may perceive how grateful and acceptable this Gift of your Majesty's hath been unto us, especially offered unto us at this time. We who be the true Successors of Peter, whom Christ at his Ascension into Heaven left his Vicar on Earth, and to whom he committed the care of his Flock: We, I say, who sit in this holy See, from which all Dignities and Titles do flow, upon mature deliberation had with our said Brethren about these things, have by the general Agreement and Consent of them decreed to bestow upon your Majesty this Title, namely, The Defender of the Faith. And accordingly by these Presents do inscribe you with such a Title; commanding all faithful Christians that they name your Majesty with this Title; and when they write to you, that after the word King, they adjoyn Defender of the Faith. And truly, we diligently considering and weighing your singular Merits, were not able to bethink us of a Name more worthy and convenient for your Majesty, than the excellency and dignity of this Title; which so often as you shall hear and read, so often you may call to mind this your singular Virtue and great Desert: Nor may you by this Title puff up your self with Pride; but according to your wonted Prudence become more humble, and be more valiant and constant in the Faith of Christ, and in Devotion to this holy See, by which you have been exalted, rejoicing in the Lord the Giver of all good things, leaving this as a perpetual and immortal Monument of your glory to your Children, shewing them the way unto the like; that if they shall desire to be graced also with such a Title, they must labour to do such Works, and to follow the excellent Steps of your Majesty, whom, accordingly as you have well deserved of us, and of this said See, together with your Wife and all your Children that shall be born of you or of them, We bestow on you our Benediction with a large and liberal Hand, in the name of him from whom the Power of granting this Blessing is given unto us, praying and beseeching that Almighty One, who saith, By me

Kings reign and Princes rule, and in whose hand 1521. are the Hearts of Kings, that he will confirm your Majesty in your holy Purpose, and encrease your Devotion, and by your worthy Endeavours for the sacred Faith, so to illustrate your Renown, and make you glorious through all the World; that this our Testimony which we have given of you, adorning you with so excellent a Title, may never be judged by any to be false or vain. Lastly, we desire God, that after this Life ended he would make you Partakers of his eternal Glory.

Ego Leo X. Catholicae Ecclesiae Episcopus S. &c.

Such was the covetousness of the richer sort at this time in England, that they converted many large Corn-fields into Pasture; hereof ensued a general decay not only of Houses, but of Persons, which should do their King and Country service. Besides, Sheep, Cattel, and Clothes being thus within the hands of a few, the price was much inhaunted. To remedy this mischief, the King caused the ancient Statutes, provided on that behalf, to be looked into. And accordingly directed his Commission to the Justices of Peace, to restore all the Tillage ground that had been enclosed any time within fifty years last past, and to cause the Houses anciently upon them to be re-edified; yet (as Polydore hath it) divers by compounding secretly with the Cardinal, exempted themselves.

About this time Edward Stafford Duke of Buckingham, eminent for his high Blood, and large Revenue, drew on himself a dangerous suspicion; which though it was again fomented by the Cardinal, who disaffected him for some speeches he had cast forth, yet, could not have overthrown him, but that some indiscretion of his own concurred. Besides, he suffered much through the ill offices of Charles Knevet, formerly mentioned; who yet durst not appear, till he saw the Duke not only discountenanced, but weakened in his Friends and Allies. And of these I find two principally; One, Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland, whose Daughter the Duke had married; the other Thomas Earl of Surrey, who had married the Dukes Daughter. Against Northumberland, cause was taken for claiming certain Wards; which, after close commitment, yet, he was forced to relinquish. Against Surrey the Cardinal proceeded otherwise: For, though he hated him for drawing his Dagger at him on some occasion; yet as the Earl was more wary than to give new Offence, he thought fit to send him away upon some honourable Employment for which he found this Overture.

Gerald Fitz-Gerald, Earl of Kildare, made Deputy in Ireland to Henry Duke of York, (now King, who at * four Years old was by his Father made Lieutenant of that Country) having done divers good Services against the Rebels, was made † Knight of the Garter, and enjoy'd that Place till his death; when his Son Gerald being substitute therein, so behaved himself, as he likewise got much Credit: Though, as he had the House of Ormond his Enemy, and particularly Sir Pierce Butler Earl of Ossory, secret ill offices were done him; nor did it avail, that he had given his Sister in Marriage to the said Butler, and help'd him to recover the Earldom of Ormond, detained wrongfully since the death of James, by a Bastard of that Family; For it was impossible to oblige him; especially, where he found so advantageous an occasion to dissent. For as he watch'd over the Earl of Desmond, his perpetual Though Polydore saith, he came voluntarily into England to match with some English Lady, and there behaved himself so unrespectfully to the Cardinal, that he was cast into Prison. But whatsoever the cause was, his charge was bestowed on the Earl of Surrey, who going to Ireland in April 1520, reduced the Earl of Desmond and others to obedience.

The Duke of Buckingham being thus exposed and unfriended, the Cardinal treats secretly with Knevet, concerning him; who thereupon discovers his late Masters life; Confessing that the Duke, by way of discourse, was accustomed to say, how he meant so to use the matter, that, if King Henry died without Issue, he would attain the Crown, and that he would punish the Cardinal. Besides, that he had spoken hereof unto George Nevill Lord Abergavenny, who married the said Dukes Daughter. By what means yet the Duke intended particularly to effect these Designs, I do not find exactly set down by Charles Knevet. Neither do the Authors, who write hereof relate his Pedegree. Only our Heralds say, he was descended from Anne Plantagenet, Daughter of Thomas of Woodstock, Son to King Edward the Third. How far this yet might entitle him to the Crown in case King Henry should have no issue, I have neither leisure nor disposition to examine. I shall only therefore, for satisfaction of the Reader, select some principal points out of his Indictment; leaving the Reader, for the rest, unto the search of the Record: In which, the points that in my opinion made most against the Duke, were; First, That at * several times he had sent to one Hopkins, a Monk, in the Priory of Henton, to be informed by him, concerning the matters he imagined; and that the Monk should return answer, The Duke should have all; and therefore should labour to procure the love of the People. 2. That the Duke † afterwards should go in person to the said Hopkins, who confirmed the said prediction, adding, that he knew it by Revelation. Whereupon the said Duke should give him several Rewards. 3. That he should * speak to Ralph Nevill, Earl of Westmorland; (his Son-in-law) that, if ought but good come to the King, the Duke of Buckingham should be next in blood to the Crown, the King having as yet no issue. That, to comply herewith, he did many things which argued Ambition, and desire to make himself popular. That he † said to one Gilbert, his Chancellor, that whatsoever was done by the Kings Father, was done by wrong; murmuring withal against the present Government. 4. And to the said Charles Knevet, that if he had been committed to the Tower, (whereof he was in danger upon occasion of one Sir William Bulmer) he would have so wrought, that the principal doers thereof should not have cause of great rejoicing. For he would have plaid the part which his Father intended to have put in practice against King Richard the Third at Salisbury, who made earnest suit to come into the presence of the said King; which suit if he might have obtained, he having a Knife secretly about him, would have thrust it into the body of King Richard, as he had made semblance to kneel down before him. And that, in speaking these words, he maliciously laid hands on his Dagger; swearing, that, if he were so evil us'd, he would do his best to accomplish his intended purpose. 5. That * being in speech with Sir George Nevill Knight, Lord Abergavenny, he said, that if the King died, he would have the Rule of the Realm, in spite of whosoever said the contrary; swearing, that if the Lord Abergavenny reveal'd this he would fight with him. This I conceive to be the substance of the most special Articles in the Evidence; which the Courteous Reader yet may do well to consider more at large, as they are extant on Record. How far yet these particulars were proved, and in what sort, my Authors deliver not. Only I find (out of our Records) that the Duke of Buckingham being committed to the Tower, April 16. did under his own hand declare to Sir Thomas Lovell, Constable of the Tower, the passages betwixt him and Hopkins, in this manner: That is to say, that the Summer before our King made War in France, Hopkins sent for him; but, not being able to go, he commanded one Delacour, his Chaplain, to repair thither; howbeit, that Hopkins said nought to him; yet that himself came the next * Lent; where, in Shrift the said Monk told him, that our King should win great honour in his journey to France; and that if the King of Scots came to England then, he should never go home again. And that, when he asked Hopkins how he knew this, he said ex deo habeo: It is reveal'd to me of God. And that Hopkins demanding afterward, what Children the King had had, He told the number; and that Hopkins should say thereupon, I pray God his issue continue; for that he feared God was not contented, because he made no restitution according to his Father's Will, charging the Duke further to advise the King's Council to make restitution. Further, That he told his Chancellor those words, and at his return out of France, came to Hopkins again, and said, he had told him true: Also, that (another time) he came to Hopkins, together with his Son Stafford, and the Earl of Westmorland; and that Hopkins asked who he was, and thereupon should say, that some of his Blood or Name should prove Great Men. And that, after this, Hopkins should send to the Duke, to pray him, according to his Promise, to help their House (being at Henton in Somersetshire) to make their Conduit; the ten Pounds, formerly given by him, being spent. And more than this he confess'd not. Notwithstanding which, when the Indictment was openly read, the Duke said it was false, untrue, conspir'd, and forg'd, to bring him to his death; alledging (as he was an eloquent Person) many Reasons to falsifie the Indictment: The King's Attorney on the other side, producing the Examinations, Confessions, and Proofs of Witnesses. The Duke hereupon desired the Witnesses, which were Knevet, Gilbert, Delacour, and Hopkins, to be brought forth. These confirming their Depositions, the Duke was tried by his Peers, (being a Duke, a Marquis, seven Earls, and twelve Barons) before the Duke of Norfolk, who was for the time made Lord High Steward of England. They condemning him, the Duke of Norfolk deliver'd his Sentence, not without Tears: To which he reply'd, My Lord of Norfolk, you have said as a Traytor should be said unto, but I was never one. But, my Lords, I nothing malign for what you have done to me; but the eternal God forgive you my death, and I do. I shall never sue to the King for Life: Howbeit, he is a gracious Prince, and more Grace may come from him, than I desire. And so I desire you, my Lords, and all my Fellows, to pray for me. Whereupon he was brought back to the Tower. Where all the favour he received was a Message from the King, declaring his Sentence was mitigated so far, that, instead of receiving the death of a Traytor, he should have only his Head * cut off. Thus ended the Duke of Buckingham, much lamented by the People, (who libell'd the Cardinal for it, calling him Carnificis filium, Son of a Butcher,) as being thought rather Criminal through folly and rash words, than any intention declar'd by Overt Act against the King's Person; and therefore not incapable of his Mercy; which also it was thought would not have been

But since at his Arraignment, he did, as it were, disclaim his Life, he would not obtrude it; and therefore only caus'd a Letter of comfort to be written to the Dutchess, and Lord Stafford. Yet the Tragedy ended not so; for though George Lord Abergavenny, after a few Months Imprisonment, was, through the Kings favour, deliver'd; yet Hopkins, after a serious Repentance that he had been an Author of so much mischief, dy'd of grief. And here I must observe that together with this Duke, that great place of High-Constable of England remains extinguish'd, unless some extraordinary occasion revive it.

I shall return here to speak of Charles the Fifth, who having, as is said, kept a Diet at Wormes, did now levy Forces. And the rather, that he heard War was intended against him by Soliman; who, being a Martial Prince, and Crown'd the very same day at Constantinople, that Charles was at Abo, seem'd to have somewhat of the same Ascendant; however they differ'd in their Interests. Besides, it was observ'd, that as Charles the Fifth was the eleventh Emperor from Albericus, in whose time the House of the Ottomans began; so Sueliman (or Soliman) was the eleventh Prince of his Race. Howsoever, on their occasion much of their Subjects blood was spilt, and more would have been, had not Francis turn'd the Arms of Charles upon himself. The causes of Dissention betwixt Charles and Francis, were, first, that Claude eldest Daughter of Louis the Twelfth, and Anne of Bretagne having by a solemn * Treaty been accorded to Charles, Francis yet † obtain'd her, and thereby eluded his hopes of Bretagne. Secondly, their mutual ambition for the Empire. Thirdly, ill Offices done by their Courtiers betwixt them. Fourthly, but chiefly, the incompatibility of their demands for their ancient Right; whereof I find these most urg'd. Homage for Flanders, and Artois, requir'd by Francis, as being held anciently of the Crown of France; which Charles yet refus'd, saying, that, since that Estate was devolv'd to an Emperor, it was in a higher Dignity, than could be submitted to any Inferior. But to this again Francis reply'd, that it derogated from no body to give what was due. Besides, that the Title of a King was greater and more August than that of an Emperor; both as the power is more absolute in it self, and that it depends not on the Election of others; for which purpose a passage was alledg'd out of Matth. Paris, when the Empire having been offer'd to Robert, Brother of Saint Louis, the Council of State refus'd it, for this reason; saying further, it was enough that Robert was Brother to so great a King. For which cause also, the French observe, that none ever aspir'd to it of the Line of the Capet's, but Francis. Again, they differ'd about Milan, of which Louis the Twelfth having gotten the * Investiture, Francis did in pursuit of his Right, expel Maximilian Sforza; whose Brother and Successor yet was protected by Charles, and reinplac'd. Moreover the Dutchy of Burgundy was question'd by Charles. For though Louis the Eleventh had united it to his Crown, and that, for Title thereunto, it was alledg'd, that John King of France had given it to his younger Son Philip, to hold to him and his Heirs Males only; and that Charles last Duke of Burgundy, having but one only Daughter, it therefore reverted; yet Charles understanding the business otherwise, claim'd it by a long succession of his Ancestors in Burgundy. These so many pretences on either side engag'd the two Princes into perpetual Wars, which began this year. For Francis, insisting still upon the Treaty of Noyon, prepar'd to recover Navarre; and to this he thought the Commu- 1521. nidades or Insurrections in Spain (began 1519, and continued still) would conduce. For as the People held their Junta or Assembly for redress of their Grievances, he conceiv'd some might be drawn to his Party. But he was deceiv'd; for they mutined not for his sake, but their own, as appear'd; pretending for their chief grievances only, that their King liv'd in foreign parts, and transported their Money for his occasions there, and bestow'd divers great Places in Spain on Strangers. So that, though they continu'd their demands with much insolency and boldness, they persisted nevertheless in their love to their Prince and Country, without admitting a Treaty with Francis. All which yet could not preserve them. For, though they proceeded with more Sobriety and Correspondence, than hath been observ'd in any popular Insurrections, (as Sandoval relates it at large) they were divided at last, and overthrown by the name of Rebels; their Actions being so bad and dangerous, as their Intentions could not excuse them. Howsoever, Francis thought fit to make use of this occasion, and therefore, before their defeat, he levy'd Forces; and, not long after, sent Andre de Foix, Seigneur de Asperant, and Brother of the famous Lautrech, to Navarre. Where a War began, that, in divers places, lasted 38 years following (as Sandoval observes it) and cost the lives of above five hundred thousand Men; the French speak of a far greater number. Their first Progress was happy; for, in less than 15 days, they took Navarre. But as they would go farther to Catalonia, and besiege Logronno (or Groyne,) the Spanish Commanders, attended now with many of the Comunidades, gave Battel and overthrew them, taking de Foix Prisoner; whereupon also Navarre was regain'd in less time than it was lost, and Pamplona thenceforth better fortify'd. But not on this part only did the French shew their Mal-Talent, but discover'd it on this occasion also towards another Coast. The Prince of Chimay contesting in Law with the Seigneur d'Aymeries concerning a Castle or Town in the Forest of Ardennes, and County of Luxemburg, call'd Hierge, gain'd his cause by the judgment of the Peers of the Dutchy of Bouillon, who determin'd businesses in chief; and accordingly enjoy'd possession thereof, for many years. Howbeit Aymeries (being not contented herewith) appeal'd to the Chancellor of Brabant, and prevail'd so far, that the Heirs of Chimay were summon'd to give accompt of their Title unto the Emperor. But, because the Sovereignty of Robert de la Mark Duc de Bouillon was most concern'd herein, they, for their best refuge, made complaint to him; he again addresseth himself to the Emperor, and remonstrates his Right: yet, finding the cause of Aymeries likely to prevail, secretly treats with Francis, for Assistance and Protection. Being assur'd hereof, he (though a small Prince) sends a publick defiance to Charles, being then at the Diet in Wormes. The Emperor, judging quickly from whence this audaciousness proceeded, prepares for War. Neither wanted he a seeming occasion. For though he ever suspected that Robert de la Mark, (as one who had serv'd heretofore the French in Italy, had his chief dependance on Francis) yet now being inform'd that Fleuranges (Son unto the said Robert de la Mark) having rais'd in France about three thousand Foot and four hundred Horse, (all Voluntiers) had besieg'd Vireton, a little place in Luxemburg, appertaining to the Emperor; he nothing doubted, but that the French had assisted him herein. Howbeit, Francis, considering it was not convenient to begin a War so near home, and

1521. and besides, being advis'd by our King to keep the Peace, signifies his dislike to Fleuranges, who thereupon * dismiss'd his Forces. Notwithstanding which, Charles commands Henry Count of Nassau to go with an Army against Robert de la Mark, not omitting withal to dispatch an Ambassador to Francis, with Instructions, to protest, that Francis had first broken the Treaty of 1518, by aiding Robert de la Mark. He sent word to our King also of this proceeding. Who taking the matter into Consideration, pronounc'd sentence against Francis, as the first Infractor of their Tripartite League: Which being maturely ponder'd by Francis, (who knew well, how much it concern'd him not to provoke our King, who (by an expresse Article of the said Treaty) was to fall on the first that contraven'd) made him afterwards excuse the matter, and undertake that Robert should desist from Hostility. This was not yet so accepted by Charles, as to delay the sending of his Army, under Henry of Nassau (and not Francisco Sicilino as Jovius hath it) to seize on the Dominions of Robert, who accordingly took divers places. But Robert going to the Emperor hereupon, obtain'd a Truce for six Weeks, Henry of Nassau in the mean time putting Garrisons in the places he had won. The Emperor yet, not dismissing his Forces, but proceeding hostilely, our King takes notice hereof, and offers Woolsey, as his Lieutenant, to compose their Differences. For Francis had now arm'd; as finding that, under colour of private Quarrels, Tournaisis was invaded; howbeit, Woolsey was not thought by Francis a competent Judge; both as some jealousies had past formerly betwixt our King and him (as is above related) and that he knew Woolsey depended wholly upon Charles for the Papacy. Therefore he not only declin'd (as much as he could) the Arbitrement of Woolsey, but shortly after dispatch'd the Duke of Albany into Scotland. Howsoever, Woolsey came 2 August 1521. to Calais, and treated of an Accommodation; not neglecting together to write of Charles, to make no Peace with Francis during the Treaty. And I doubt not but our King did gladly arbitrate this business; both as it argued his Authority, and gave him means to choose his friend, when otherwise he could not reconcile them. Upon the part of Francis came the Chancellor of France (Antoine du Prat) John de Selve, and Monsieur de Palisse Marechal of France, with four hundred Horse. The Emperor not failing on his part likewise to send proper Agents, being Mercurinus Conde de Gattinara his Chancellor, and Monsieur de Bergbes, and others. The Pope had likewise a particular and conceal'd Nuntio there, being Hieronymo de Ghinnucciis Bishop of Ascoli; though, as he pretended to be without Authority, his business it seem'd was for the present rather to espy and observe the proceedings there, than to advance the Peace, as did appear afterwards. Many things were represented to the Cardinal on both sides. The Emperor demanded, among other things, Restitution of the Duchy of Burgundy, and abolition of the homage he ow'd to the Crown of France for the Low-Countries. Francis again not only refus'd this, but requir'd that Navarre might be restor'd to Henry Son of King John; and a Pension of one hundred thousand Ducats paid him for the Kingdom of Naples, according to the former Contract at Noyon. But to this again Charles his Minority was alledg'd as an excuse; though a weak one in Princes; they being not consider'd under the notion of their Age but Dignity. Furthermore, Charles ground his Title to Naples by his Mother Queen Joan, Daughter and Heir of Ferdinand, so that to have paid this Money would have weaken'd his Claim; and for Navarre, it was too commodious for him to leave it; especially when he thought Francis did no less in with-holding Burgundy. Howsoever, that Francis himself had first broken the said Treaty of Noyon, by protecting the Duke of Gueldres, an Ancient Enemy of the House of Flanders. And for the abolition of Homage, the French Chancellor on the other side, particularly said, it was not the work of a Treaty, but a Petition, and therefore not to be handled at this time, when there was question of right only. Besides this, the Duchy of Milan bred no little contest among them. In conclusion, their demands were so obstinate, and minds so averse from Peace on either side, that the Cardinal could or would do no good. Hereunto, also, did concur a close and private Convention betwixt Leo and Charles, mediated by the Nuntio; and a confidence that Charles had, (by the Cardinal's means) that, in case of Rupture our King would incline to him, as having more pretence to his ancient Dominions of France, than to any thing in the Low-Countries. Again, Charles renew'd his promise to give him his best assistance to be elected Pope, when Leo should dye; which prevail'd more than any other gift. Although (to use Polydore's words) speaking of both Princes, at this time, Uterque ejus favorem certatim largitionibus quaeritabat, Both sought to obtain his favour by Presents. This hope of the Papacy therefore comforted our Cardinal, now it was likely he should lose one of his Customers. ¶ The King of Hungary at this time, finding that Solyman (who inherited his Father's Malice) did much gain upon Christendom (as having lately gotten Belgrade in Hungary) and knowing there was no way to defend himself, without an Union betwixt Christian Princes, sends an Ambassador, so opportunely, as to find our Cardinal at Calais, treating of this Universal Peace. But such was the animosity of these two great Princes, that the pious consideration of repelling the Turk could not prevail with them. So that the Cardinal, by this time, finding small hope of Reconciliation, advertis'd our King thereof, and crav'd his Resolution; unto which he much prepar'd him by giving intelligence of what had past. To gain this space also, he told the French, he would go in Person to Bruges, and Negotiate by word of mouth with the Emperor. Our Cardinal departing hereupon, the Emperor met him by the way, (a mile out of Town,) accompanying this Honour with all other Demonstrations of Affection to him and our Nation. After thirteen days Treaty, and agreement what was to be done in case of Rupture, (which our Cardinal perceiv'd now could not be avoided,) he returns to Calais, where the French Ambassadors impatiently attended him, he doth not yet discover his despair of Success to them, and much less discloseth his private Treaty with the Emperor, but mediates still a Peace, yet so, as to promise less hope of it than before, since matters were come to such extremities on both sides. For not only le Seigneur de Liques, a Subject of the Emperors, upon private quarrel with the Cardinal of Bourbon, had now surpris'd Amand and Mortagne in Picardy, and the Bourgonians Ardres, (which they raz'd,) but the Count of Nassau taken Mouzon, and besieg'd Mezières; which yet Anne de Montmorency, and Pierre de Terrail, commonly call'd le Chevalier Bayard, defended, until Francis coming with a great Army, the Imperialists retir'd, and Mouzon was retaken, while the Emperor, who was at Valenciennes kept himself more covert than was expected; since Francis proceed- ed still: Though as he discontented Charles Duke of Bourbon, who in the quality of Constable de France, thought thought to have the leading of the Avantguard (rather than the Duke de Alanzon, Brother-in-Law to the King) an Error was committed which cost him dear, as shall be told in its place. Notwithstanding which, Woolsey, that he might leave nothing unattempted, sends to the Emperor, the Lord of Saint Johns, and Sir Tho. Bolen, and to the French King (lying then with a great Army near Cambray) the Earl of Worcester, and Bishop of Eli; by whom he obtain'd that the Emperor should raise the Siege of Tournay, before which his Forces now were, and that he should recall his Army in the Milanese, and that Francis should likewise retire his, and the rest should be referr'd to our King. But the taking of Feuentarabie by Boissier intervening, Francis refus'd to render it, and so the Treaty brake off. Whereupon our Cardinal (who now had heard from our King) gives a kind of sentence, in the business. The effect hereof was, that the French King being guilty of the first breach, our King was bound by the Common Treaty to assist the Emperor; to which also he was the more dispos'd that the secret practices of the French in Scotland had disoblig'd him, some hopes of Accommodation yet were represented, in case the Emperor and Francis might be reconcil'd; but small appearance hereof being given, the Cardinal concluded a Treaty with the Emperor and Pope against the French, the Pope entering it on condition that the Emperor should restore to him Parma and Piacenza, and aid him, afterwards, against the Duke of Ferrara. The effect of the Treaty was this.

Nov. 22.
A Treaty between the Emperor, the King of England and the Pope.
Nov. 24.

Because the Expedition against the Turk cannot be undertaken, until the Pride and Injury of the French be suppress'd; therefore between the Pope, Emperor, and King of England, by their several Ambassadors, these following Articles are concluded.

I. This Treaty shall not derogate from any former, and it shall extend not only to the present possessions of the Contractants, but their future Acquisitions.

II. That, when the Emperor shall pass over into Spain to provide himself of Men and Money, and order his People (which shall be the next Spring) the King of England (upon a month's warning) shall give him a Convoy of Ships through the Channel, with at least three thousand fighting-men, with Artillery, &c. together with leave to land at Dover, or Sandwich; and after honourable Entertainment, shall conduct him himself to Falmouth, or some other such place. In regard whereof, if the King of England shall have occasion to pass over to France, the Emperor shall do the like for him, till the charge be equal on both sides.

III. The Contractants shall declare themselves Enemies to the French in March 1523, and by May shall be in Arms, (viz.) The Pope in Italy, with a strong Army; without Italy, Censuris Ecclesiasticis. Secondly, the Emperor with ten thousand Horse, and thirty thousand Foot, or more, on the Confines of Spain; at which time the Low-Countries and other Dominions of the Emperor, shall declare themselves Enemies to the French, and Commerce cease. Thirdly, the King of England shall pass the Sea, with ten thousand Horse, and thirty thousand Foot or more, to invade France on the Coasts next to him. And he hath liberty given to hire Horse-men out of Germany, and Foot (if he will) of the Emperor's Subjects. And, if the King of England, upon a Battle to be fought, shall stand in need of aid, the Emperor's Lieutenant, being inform'd of it, shall (if it be possible) help him.

IV. That, before the Month of March abovesaid, the King of England, and the Emperor shall by Sea infest the French, each with three thousand fighting-men, and other Provisions proportionable; joyning their Forces upon occasion, and not recalling their Fleets, but by common consent; which if they chance to be impair'd by Fight, or foul Weather, they are to repair within a Month. Neither shall one make any Appointment, or Treaty, or Truce, with the common Enemy, but by the consent of the other.

V. That, if, by the end of this present November, there be no Peace made, between the Pope, Emperor and King of France, or that the French King shall a fresh begin the War: Then the King of England shall, at the coming of the Emperor into England, declare himself Enemy to the French, and within a Month after certify it to the French King. In which case the Fleet prepar'd by the King of England, for the Convoy of the Emperor, after his landing in Spain, shall, together with the Emperor's Fleet, turn themselves against the French, so infesting him by Sea. Also by land each Prince shall have Forces against all Invasion both of the French, and other Princes; wherein they shall aid one another.

VI. To facilitate these designs, as soon as ever the War shall be begun against the French, the Pope shall send out his Censures against him, subjecting all his Dominions to the Interdict; and calling the Secular Arm against him, shall warn the Emperor (as the Protector and Advocate of the Church) and also the King of England to war against him, as Enemy of the Church.

VII. That the Emperor and King of England take on them the Protection of the Pope, and Family of Medicis, against all whatsoever. And, on the other side, that the Pope undertake the Protection of them with their Confederates. So that it be not permitted that one of them shall name for his Confederates the Enemy of the other.

VIII. The Swifs are nam'd Confederates on all sides, and are to be dispos'd either to enter this League, or hold themselves Neutral.

IX. That the Emperor and King of England shall in their Dominions, as they have begun, proceed against those, qui de fide Catholica male sentire videntur, who differ in their Opinions from the Catholick Faith; or that seek to wrong the Authority of the Apostolick See. And that, in the Lands and Possessions which the Emperor, and King of England shall gain from the French, the Pope shall enjoy all Priviledges, Rights, and Authority, due to the See Apostolick.

X. That, after the War with the French they shall invade the Turk.

XI. They shall not treat from this time apart with any Prince in prejudice of this League.

XII. That, notwithstanding the Emperor hath agreed Marriage with the King of France's Daughter; and the Dauphin with the King of England's, yet, for the publick good of Christendom, the Emperor may marry the Princess Mary; to which end the Pope shall dispence; seeing they are Cousin-Germans, their Mothers being two Sisters.

XIII. That this Convention shall be kept most secret, until it be publish'd by common consent.

XIV. That the Contractors are to give their Letters Patents in confirmation of this Treaty, within three Months.

XV. That this Agreement shall not derogate from any Treaty that hath been between the King of England and the Emperor; so they be not contrary to this Treaty.

Thus was War resolv'd against France, to begin at the appointed time. In the mean while, fishing in the narrow Seas, and use of English Ports was allow'd the French till February following. While these great affairs were in agitation, our Chroniclers observe, that the Great Seal of England being with the Cardinal at Calais, many English repair'd to him to receive their Dispatches, and at home the constituting of Sheriffs was suspended, &c. which I remember the rather, that it was afterwards urg'd against him. And now all foreign businesses being done, the Cardinal Woolsey's returns to England. Where, to magnifie his State.

Which the Imperialists under Ferdinand d'Avalos Mar-Quis of Pescara understanding, requir'd the Popes assistance; who, in conformity to his League, sent Forces, whereof Prospero Colonna was chief. His first action was the besieging of Parma, which Lescun defended, until his Brother Lautrech com-

But Lautrech afterwards remaining idle for some few days, sixteen hundred of the Swiss being not well paid; and for the rest gain'd by the Cardinal de Medicis to the contrary Par-

When the Ven- etians, fearing the Storm might fall on them- selves, desir'd Lautrech to depart; who being al- so forsaken of his four thousand Swiss, got into the Castle of Cremona, and sent his King word of the ill Success. Which the Pope also hearing, and being assur'd together that Sforza should be re- stor'd to Milan, was so overjoy'd, that he * dy'd thereof: (so can every Passion in his turn kill) though some suspected he might die of Poy- son.

I will conclude this year with the invention of Muskets; which Bellay saith were first us'd in this War.
 The Cardinal of York finding occasion now fair, sends Doctor Richard Pace, Dean of St. Paul's, to Rome, to essay if by any means it were possi- ble to make him Pope. He writes also to Charles, remembring him first of his promise; next it was represented how unjust it would be in him, openly to have a Pope of his own nominating; there being so many businesses of his to be de- termin'd in the Consistory; that the particular utility which would redound to him thereby, ought not to be lay'd in ballance against the u- niversal dishonour that both he and the whole Christian Church would suffer in such a factious and scandalous Election: especially, when his bu- siness might be done in a more decent and safe way. For if the Papacy were conferr'd on him, his Imperial Majesty might be confident he should find the same faithfulness he had experience of in the last Treaty. Since therefore this was the best expedient for giving himself Reputation, and securing his Affairs, that he should not fail herein. For as it was the place of Henry the Eighth to be Arbiter of Christendom, it would be his to be the chief Instrument thereof. For which purpose also, he should be ready ever to dispose King Henry to hold good Correspondence with his Imperial Majesty. Neither must he think that being Pope, he would alter this Lan- guage; it being manifest, that the keeping up of the Authority of Charles in Italy, was the on- ly way to conserve peace in it, which our King desir'd. Some of these Reasons also Pace was de- sir'd to scatter amongst the Cardinals at Rome, to whom he was charg'd to represent how much occasion of Calumny, the Lutherans and other Enemies of their Religion would find, if an un- fitting choice were made at this time. That this must follow if any belonging either to Charles or Francis were elected; besides that it would make their differences irreconcilable. Or when otherwise the Papacy fell into the hands of one who could not uphold and maintain the Au- thority of the See, as an Italian or some other not strongly supported Person; that then it must become a prey to the strongest. That the sole way to remedy these Inconveniencies was to choose him, who had a King able and well affected to maintain Religion and Peace in these dangerous times. Our Cardinal also did not for- get Francis; to whom, if not favour, yet at least indifferency was promis'd, in case he were Pope; and that this was more than he could hope for any other way. But before Pace could come to Rome, Adrian Cardinal of Tortosa, heretofore Tu- tor to Charles, and for the present residing in Spain, (where he had the quality of Governador de Castilla) was * chosen Pope, though not with such an universal consent; but that (as I find by our Records) our Cardinal had sometimes nine, and sometimes twelve, and sometimes nineteen Voices. Guiccardine seems much to wonder at this Election, scurrilously terming him not only Pontifice Barbaro, because he was a Fleming, but alledging divers other incapacities in him for that place. But the wiser sort did not think so; Charles having given those testimonies of his good affection to the Peace of Italy (especially by his generous restoring of Milan to Francisco Sforza) that they nothing doubted but he would prove their best Patron and Help for the expulsion of all Strangers. Howsoever, that Adrian, being of a moderate and calm Disposition, would prove no Incendiary. Pace, though he heard by the way that Adrian was chosen, yet holds on his Journey, as having second Instructions to coun- tenance his Employment, when the first succeed- ed not; therefore, departing from Rome to Ve- nice about July this year, he mediated a Peace be- twixt Charles and the Venetians, (who had hi- therto held with the French; remonstrating to them the many Reasons which they had to join with the Emperor and King of England against Francis, who had first broken the common Peace made 1518, wherein the said State of Venice was compris'd, and thereby bound to fall on the In- fractor thereof, &c. But the Venetians being en- gag'd to Francis, took time only to advise there- of.

Adrian being thus chosen, Julio Cardinal de Me- dicis, who aspir'd to the Papacy, was highly dis- contented; insomuch that forsaking the Imperi- al Party, he joyn'd himself with three thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse, to the French. Francisco Matia also, who (upon Leo's Death) had recover'd Urbino, adhering to them; so that, with the addition of sixteen thousand Swiss new- ly levy'd, and some Troops Lautrech the Mar- schal de Foix brought, the French had a considera- ble Army, with which he besieg'd Pavia. But Prospero Colonna coming with the Imperial Forces to relieve it, Lautrech raising the Siege offer'd Battel; which yet the Imperialists would not accept. This while Montmorency having taken Novara, return'd; so that the French now pursu- ing their Point, the Imperialists were forc'd to get 1522. get themselves within a strong Retrenchment at Bicocca. And here either side attended their Advantage, the French hoping to drive the Imperialists away by Famine, and they again, that the Swiss for want of pay would desert the French. That of the Swiss succeeded first; for demanding either to have their Pay, or leave to depart, or at least order to fight, the French, who wanted Money, chose this latter, as the less inconvenience, and so gave * on. But being repuls'd with great loss, the next day the Swiss return'd, and the rest of the Army retir'd towards Lodi and Cremona, and lastly to the Venetian Territories; while the Imperialists, making use of their Victory, got both these places, the Castle of Cremona only excepted, which held out for the space of one whole year, though the Castle of Milan yielded presently. Lautrech thus finding all things desperate, retires to France, laying the fault upon his not receiving pay for his Soldiers; which yet, the French say, was not for want of order from the King, but through the covetousness of his Mother Louise, or the default of some Officers. And now the Imperialists, losing no time, march'd to Genoia; in which were two Factions, those of the Family of the Fieschi, Adorni, and Spinola, being Imperialists, and those of the Fregosi and Doria, French. That of the Fregosi govern'd now. Howsoever the Imperialists * enter'd and sack'd that rich City; which yet they quitted, when they had depos'd the Fregosi, and set up the Adorni. Francisco Sforza was restor'd also to that of Milan, the Emperor not reserving to himself so much as one place in that Country. And so Colonna concluded the War for this year of 1522. Nevertheless the Treaties with the Venetians proceeded, which at last took effect, as shall be more particularly related.

The proceedings betwixt our King and Charles were not kept so secret, but that they became sufficiently known to Francis, who would not yet instantly take notice of them, as being more unprovided than suddenly to bring matters to extremity. Therefore he continu'd a while his smooth Letters to the Cardinal. At last, betwixt impatience, and the order he hop'd to give in Scotland and Ireland, to find our King enough to do, he began to declare himself. Therefore, his Subjects having made some Depredations on the English Merchants, and satisfaction thereupon being requir'd, he delay'd if not deny'd Reparation. These particular Offences were accompany'd with a main breach of Treaty, as our King conceiv'd. For the Duke of Albany, who should have continu'd in France, was now after five years absence, return'd to his charge of Scotland, as shall be told more largely hereafter. Our English foreseeing thus a storm likely to ensue, retire themselves betimes from France; the Merchants withdrawing their Goods from the Port-Towns, and the Scholars their Persons and Studies from Paris. Anne Boleyn also (who is said by the French * Writers to have liv'd in that Court ever since she † came over with our Kings Sister until this time) quitted it now, and return'd to England; where she did partake afterwards more good and ill fortune than she could reasonably imagine. Our King also writ to Francis sharply, telling him that howsoever he excus'd himself for sending over the Duke of Albany; yet that he knew well, nothing was done therein without his Direction; and that it was the manner of his Country, aliud clam moliri, aliud specie simulationis ostentare, to lock one way and row another, (as Polydore hath it,) reproaching him also with breach of his Oath. Francis much mov'd with this rough Expostulation, objecteth to King Henry the secret Treaty at Bruges with the Emperor 1521, requiring King Henry to declare himself. Besides, he caus'd all the English Mens Goods that remain'd to be seiz'd on, through his Kingdom, and especially those at Bordeaux; which seem'd so much the unjust, that divers of our Merchants had not only bought Wines there with ready Money, but paid Custom for it. Our King hearing this, confin'd the French Ambassador to his House, seizeth on all other French and Scots here, and commits the better Persons for a time, or until they had paid a pecuniary Mult, the poorer sort being exempt yet upon ten Days imprisonment. The Vice-Admiral Sir William Fitz-Williams (being in January last recall'd from his Ambassage in France, and Sir Thomas Cheney sent in his place) also was commanded to Sea with a strong Fleet, to secure our Merchants and take what French he could. Moreover, because the French denied the rest of the Money due, and detain'd the French Queens Dower, our King caus'd the French Hostages to be kept under an honourable, yet somewhat stricter Guard, than before, without using further Rigour. And, whereas Francis had desir'd him to declare himself, King Henry sent over Clarenceaux his Herald, in the end of March, with his Declaration; whereby it was shew'd, that because Francis was the Infractor of the common Peace, the King of England must take the Emperor's part against him. Upon this, Ambassadors were recall'd on both sides, and War expected. Howbeit, as the Lord Brook, Sir Edward Poynings, Sir John Peachy, and Sir Edward Belknap, all brave Captains, did about this time, (not of Poison given at * Ardes (when the Interview was) as some would have it; but of a Pestilential Air, as Hall relates;) so our King left those whose Service he now most needed.

And because King Henry meant to put to Sea a Royal Fleet, the Earl of Surrey (as being Admiral of England) was recall'd from his Charge in Ireland; where having, among other Services, repress'd the Irruptions of the O-Neale's and O-Carrol's, he so govern'd the Land, that he both did his Prince an acceptable Service, and gain'd the love of the civil People of that Country, leaving (after a Parliament he held there from June 1521, to the end of March 1522,) Pierce Butler Lord Deputy, who yet kept not long possession of this Honour, as shall be shew'd in its due place.

The Cardinal about this time, whether for ostentation of his Power, or redeeming the Peoples favour, caus'd the Preachers at St. Paul's Cross in London to publish, that all those who would eat White-meats that Lent ensuing, should without paying any thing, be exempt from Punishment and Sin. But the People unwilling to be caught by those Baits, so contemptuously rejected this offer, that the Cardinal might easily judge how ungracious he was with them. But as the manner of the most subtle sort of Favourites hath been not to study so much good as great Actions, as hoping thereby to amuse and entertain their Princes; so this Cardinal, by the perpetual variation (he seem'd to cause) in the Affairs of Christendom, held not only the Minds of the People in attention and suspense, but made his Counsels more considerable to the King, than if he had pursued any one way. The last change, whereof he was Author, had its chief Overture at Bruges, where, among other things, the Emperor resolv'd to repair to England to speak with our King more particularly, concerning the general Affairs of Christendom, and to treat of a March betwixt himself and the Princess Mary, Daughter to our King. And finally (which our King took for a singular honour) to be install'd personally 1522. Finally of the Order of the Garter at Windsor, while himself sat there as Chief. For after his

 * retaining Maximilian the Emperor in pay, the next great testimony of respect this World could give him (he thought) was, that so brave and great an Emperor as Charles, should, in so busie and difficult Times undertake a Voyage, to be admitted into that most noble Fellowship. Into which also Ferdinand his Brother, afterwards Emperor, was elected the last St. George's Day, (viz.) April 23. 1522, and had the Order and Habits sent him to Noremberg, where, being the Emperor's Lieutenant, he held a Diet that Year. And now, for the more magnificent reception of the Emperor, the Marquis Dorset was sent to Calais, and the Cardinal to Dover; whither, upon the 26th of May, 1522, (being about the time his Forces enter'd and sack'd Genoa) the Emperor arriv'd. The Cardinal first assur'd him of his welcome; which our King following * presently afterwards, confirm'd. From hence the King conducted him to † Greenwich, where the Queen (his Aunt) with much Joy attended him. June 6. Hence again the King, riding in great pomp through London, conducted him to his Lodging in Black-Fryers: His Train being plac'd in the † new beautified Palace at Bridewell. To relate the Jufts and other Solemnities on this occasion, or to tell how often Dukes, Earls, and Lords gave Water to the Cardinal at an high Mass in Paul's, (where the Princes were on Whit Sunday) is not my intention. Only for the rarity I cannot omit that on June 19. the Emperor wearing the Robes of the Order, and sitting in his Stall at Windsor, accompani'd the other Knights in all his Ceremonies and Rites usual at that time: Which being done, both he and our King receiv'd the Sacrament together, and swore upon the Holy Evangelists to observe the League concluded betwixt them, which was to this effect, as appears by an Original, subscrib'd and seal'd by Charles.

Record. The Treaty of Windsor. 1518. Whereas there was lately War begun betwixt us Charles, and the King of France, and (by Virtue of a League concluded between us and King Henry, and the said King of France) both we and Francis, by our Letters, required Aid of the said King Henry, one against the other; and the said King of England in the beginning of this War, to compose these Differences, sent to Calais the most Reverend Father in God Thomas Cardinal of York, as his Lieutenant, before whom when many Disputes had been on both sides, who first began the War, and it was found that the fault was in the French King, and that he first began with us, not in Luxemburgh only; by Robert de la March, suborn'd by him, but by his Captains also in Navarre, and hir'd Foreign Soldiers which were not his Subjects to break the publick Peace, contrary to the Treaty of London; wherefore, when the most Reverend Father aforesaid could not effect at Calais either Peace or Truce under any honourable Conditions, the said King of England understanding, as well by the relation of the said most Reverend Father, as by the Letter of Francis King of France, written to his Orators and Captains (which were shew'd to the said King of England) that the said Francis had broken both the Treaty of London, and all other Treaties and Agreements of Affinity concluded between them; not only by sending the Duke of Albany into Scotland (which was against his Oath given) but also denying the King of England his Pensions, and violating his Subjects against the League: The said King of England hath resolved hereupon to lend us Aid against him, according as he is bound by the Treaty of London. And therefore upon Treaty of a perpetual and stricter Confederacy between us and the said King Henry, as also of a Marriage with the Princess Mary, (we being on both sides free from all Agreement made heretofore in this kind with the French) have concluded both League and Alliance in manner following:

I. The said Emperor shall not contract any Marriage with any Woman, while the said Princess Mary is under Age, but shall tarry for her, and when she is ripe marry her; as soon as she is twelve Years old, he shall send a Proxy to contract with her a Marriage per verba de presenti, and she shall send a Proxy to him to the same purpose.

II. The King of England during this time shall not give her to any else.

III. As soon as this League is publish'd, both Princes shall (at common costs) send Orators to the Pope, and obtain of him a Dispensation sufficient for the performance of the said Marriage in its due time; notwithstanding that they are in the second degree of Consanguinity and Affinity; so that the Issue may be legitimate.

IV. The Princess shall be transported at the King of England's charge, with all Equipage and Furniture fitting her Dignity, within four Months next following the Contract per verba de presenti aforesaid. And she shall be transported to Bruges, if Charles be in the Low-Countries; if in Spain, then to the Town of Bilboa; whom within four Days next ensuing, Charles shall marry publickly in the face of the Church; and, till that time, she shall remain in the hands of the Commissioners of King Henry, who transport her.

V. Her Dowry, which King Henry shall give with her, shall be 400000 Crowns; whereof shall be paid the first half the Day of Marriage, or within eight Days after; and the other half within a Year following, Charles giving Acquittances. Yet, if the said Princess (for want of Issue Male left by King Henry) shall succeed in the Kingdom of England, then nothing shall be paid for Dowry with her; and whatsoever shall have been paid, shall be restored to the Executors of the King of England. It is also agreed, that out of the second payment of the latter Moneys (as above-said) of the Dowry, the King of England may deduct all Monies which are due to him, and formerly borrowed of him by the said now Emperor or his Grand-Father Maximilian, if they shall not be paid before. And the said King of England shall restore to the said Emperor the Deeds of Obligation, and the Pledges for the same. But if the King of England have a Son, then the whole Dowry (above-assign'd) shall be paid, and shall be increas'd to a Million of Crowns, by the addition of 600000; which 600000 shall be paid (after the 400000 are paid) yearly by 200000 Crowns per Annum. For her Jointure, the Emperor shall assign her in Lands and Cities 50000 Crowns of yearly Rent clear; and particularly for a part thereof, such Towns as the late Lady Margaret of England had for Jointure in the Low-Countries, the rest in Spain, to enjoy as long as she lives. If she die before the Emperor her Husband without Children, then all her Jewels, &c. shall remain to the Emperor.

VI. The Emperor binds himself, his Heirs, and his Dominions, unto the King of England, his Heirs and Successors, under the pain of 400000 Crowns, that this Treaty of Marriage shall not be hindred on his part. In like manner the King of England binds himself.

That this Matrimony may be more firm and certain, a Treaty of League is renew'd.

I. That all former Treaties shall remain in force.

II. They shall be Confederate strictly for the conservation of all their Dignities, Titles, Rights, &c. howsoever, and by whomsoever impeached: To have the same Friends and Enemies, 1522. mies, &c. And, when one is invaded, the other shall aid him totis viribus, as he would defend himself.

III. And because the King of England hath entertained the Emperor, and given him leave to pass through his Country into Spain, to provide the better for recovery of his Rights against Francis, and hath transported him over into England by a Fleet of 3000 Men; therefore, in requital, the Emperor, when King Henry shall pass over to Calais, or any other Port, in expedition against the French, will provide and lend him at his own cost a number of Ships or Vessels to transport his Soldiers, Horse, and Munition, till the Charge equal the Costs which King Henry bestow'd on the Emperor in this kind.

IV. To recover such Lands as the French King detains from both, each Prince, before the end of May 1524. or sooner, shall levy Armies thus; viz. the Emperor in Person with ten thousand Horse, and thirty thousand Foot or more, with competent Ammunition, shall invade France on the Coast of Spain. And, at the same time, all the Dominions of the Emperor shall declare and wage War against Francis. Also, the King of England by the same time (May 1524.) shall pass the Sea in Person, and, with ten thousand Horse and thirty thousand Foot, or more, and Ammunition, &c. shall fall on France, on what part he shall see most convenient. And because the King of England hath not of his own so many Horse, the Emperor will provide him Horse (so he pay them) and Foot (if he need.) If the King of England be coming to Battel with the Enemy, and fend to the Emperor's Forces, being near at hand, to assist him, they shall come and aid him, unless there be a just Impediment.

V. War shall be made by Sea, (viz.) the Emperor in his Navy shall furnish three thousand fighting Men; the King of England so many likewise to infect Francis's Dominions severally, or jointly. They shall not revoke or diminish their Fleet without consent, but reinforce it, if impaired.

VI. Neither shall desist from Hostility without consent of the other.

VII. Each shall give the other free passage through his Country.

VIII. The King of England shall maintain and keep two thousand Soldiers in the Borders of Calais, and the Emperor as many in Artois, which shall make Inroads into France, and repel the Invasions of the French, either singly or jointly.

IX. Because the French use much the German Soldiers, therefore each Prince, to divert them from the French, shall entertain as many German Foot as he can; and within two Months next following, the Emperor shall renew and publish the Imperial Edicts, whereby all Germans are (under pain of being accounted Rebels, and confiscation of their Goods) forbidden to serve under the French. And the Duke of Lorraine shall be admonish'd not to suffer any Germans to pass through his Country to aid the King of France; if he do, then these two Princes will account him their Enemy.

X. If either of the two, recover from France Places belonging to the other, he shall, upon requisition, restore them, within a Month: And, to prevent Ambiguities and Quarrels, each Prince before May 1524. shall declare his Pretences.

XI. Also, if either Prince have an intention to recover any other Rights, against other with-holders; as if the King of England will subject Scotland unto the Kingdom of England, or reduce Ireland to due Obedience; or the Emperor recover Gueldres or Frise, or punish any Rebel; or, if either the Scots trouble and invade England, or the Gueldres the Dominions of Charles; 1522. each shall give Aid to other.

XII. To confirm this Treaty; It is agreed, there shall be mutual Intelligence between the two Princes, and all things done by common Consent; so that neither shall Treat with Francis or any other Prince, without the knowledge and consent of the other, to the prejudice of this Treaty. And, if any former Treaty made, be prejudicial to this, they shall be counted of less value and force than this.

XIII. Both Princes, appearing before the Cardinal of York as Judge, in what place he shall chuse, shall voluntarily submit to his Jurisdiction as Legate, and confessing themselves to be bound to observe this Treaty, shall require the said Legate to pronounce the Sentence of Excommunication against them, if they violate the Articles thereof.

XIV. If the Princess Mary die, and so this Marriage take no effect, and it happen that the King of England have a Son, and the Emperor by some other Wife have a Daughter, vel e Converso; then Affinity shall be contracted by means of those two.

XV. This Treaty, till it take its effect, and be put in execution, shall be kept secret from the French.

It was agreed also, that this Treaty shall be signified to the Pope Adrian VI. and he be intreated to enter into it, and held as a principal Contrahent, if he accept it within three Months. The Venetians, if they will accept this Treaty 1518. within three Months, so, as (according as they ought by the Treaty of London) they will forsake the French, and declare themselves against him, shall be comprehended. The Swiss shall have this Treaty signified to them, and be pra-ctised to renounce the French, or, at least, to be Neutral. None shall be comprised in this Treaty, which is Enemy to either of the two principal Contrahents: For the rest, each may name his Friends.

The same day that this Treaty was sworn, Charles gave his Oath also to another Agreement, call'd June 19. the Indemnity; which was an Obligation, whereby he bound himself to save King Henry harmless for all the Sums of Money and Pensions, which were or should be due to King Henry from Francis, (upon former Agreements betwixt them) and now were or should be with-held by the said Francis, upon denunciation of War against him.

This was sworn in the presence of, Thomas Cardinalis Eborac. Legate and Chancellor of England. Mercurinus Comes Gattinaciae. Baro Ozane & Terrugie. Petrus de Moca Episcopus Palentin. Johannes Aleman. Thomas Bishop of Duresme. Lord Privy-Seal. Cuthbert Tonsall Doctor of both Laws, elect Bishop of London, Vice-Chancellor of England.

Lastly, Charles wanting Money for his present Occasions, our King supplied him abundantly, upon assurance given him of repayment. Charles having dispatch'd his Affairs here, and commanded his Fleet, consisting of 180 Sail, to meet him at Southampton is * accompani'd by our King to * June 22. Winchester. Before, yet, they departed, it was resolv'd betwixt them, to make use of some Venetian Gallies (then riding in our Ports) upon pretence of conveying the Emperor to Spain. Which proceeding yet, lest it should be thought abrupt, and prejudicial to our League with that State, was by Instructions from hence to Pace (his Majesty's Ambassador resident there) excused in great part, by alledging, that if they would make good the Confederacy enter'd into, 1518, 1522. 1518, they must not take it ill, that their Gallies were imploy'd against the French, as the first Violaters and Disturbers of the publick Peace. And when they would not join, it was but a just Punishment for their falling off. Which yet was not to be understood in that Rigour, but they should be restor'd in due time; as in effect I find they were shortly after. This being done, Charles having taken * leave of our King, goes to Southampton, and attends a Wind and the Convoy of our Admiral, who for better complying with the common Cause, according to the League 1518, was likewise constituted his; the Patent whereof for the rareness as well as honour of the Person, I have caus'd to be set down.

CHARLES.

J. ALEMAND.

CHARLES V. by the Divine Favour and Clemency elected, most August Emperor of the Romans; King of Germany, Spain, both Sicilies, Jerusalem, Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, &c. Arch-Duke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy, Brabant, Earl of Habsperg, Flanders, Tirol, &c. Since it is so that the most serene and powerful Prince Henry the Eighth, King of England and France, our most dear Brother, Uncle and Confederate, according to the Tenor of the League enter'd into with us, hath most justly proclaimed War against Francis King of France, for his breach and violation of the Treaty concluded with either of us; joining herein with us who have been invaded by the said King of France: and to carry this on more effectually, hath among other warlike Preparations fitted out a Fleet, which he hath put under the Command of the most Illustrious Thomas Earl of Surry, our most dear Cousin, Knight of the most Noble Order of the Garter, Lord High Admiral of England, Wales, Ireland, Normandy, Gasconne and Aquitain: We likewise with the same reason have decreed to infect and invade the said common Enemy the King of France with our Forces at Sea, by joining our Fleet with that of our aforesaid most serene Uncle, both in consideration of the Valour, Skill and Courage, and other singular Vertues of the said Admiral, whereby he is rendered capable not only of this but even of a greater Trust, as also because whatsoever is undertaken by Confederate Forces and united Arms may be better executed by being under the Conduct of one Captain-General than many: Therefore we judged it not unfit likewise to place the charge of our Fleet, and the conduct of this War by Sea under the Command of the said Admiral of England. By these therefore our Letters Patents We grant and give to the said most Illustrious Thomas Earl of Surry, Lord High Admiral and Captain-General of the Navy of the aforesaid King our most serene Uncle, the same Authority, full and plenary Power over Our Royal Navy, the Captains, Soldiers and Seamen thereof, of what Degree, Title or Rank soever, which the said Admiral hath in the King his Master's Fleet: Both in promoting the Officers, in conferring the Honour of Knighthood on Persons of Merit, in punishing Malefactors, in giving out fitting Orders, judging and trying all Causes, as also in executing and appointing all and every thing under his Command, according to the Authority by the aforesaid King to him granted, and as the singular Skill and Prudence of him, as Captain-General and Commander in Chief of the Fleet, shall on all Occasions judge needful or expedient

1522. to be done. To this end hereby strictly commanding and enjoining all our Flags, Captains, Lieutenants, Barons, Noble-Men, Officers, Masters, Pilots, Seamen and all our Soldiers, both Horse and Foot, that either now are or shall be in our Fleet; that they pay all Obedience, Duty and Respect to the said Earl their Admiral and Captain-General, or to any Person by him lawfully deputed, in all things as is fitting, as they shall at their Peril answer the contrary. In witness whereof We have subscribed this our Commission with our own Hand, and thereto affixed our Seal.

Given in London, June 8. 1522. in the third Year of our Reign over the Romans, and seventh over the rest of our Dominions.

By the Emperor

CHARLES.

J. ALEMAND.

June 11. The Earl, having accepted hereof by our King's consent, did, upon June 13. land his Men in Normandy near Cherbourg, and after having destroyed the adjoining Country, (sparing only Religious Houses) he return'd to Portland; whence setting sail again, he lands, July 1. at a place near Morlais in Bretagne, and with seven thousand Men marcheth thither; where our Master-Gunner having discharg'd a Piece so fortunately, that he broke the Wicket, some of our Men enter'd in the Smoak and open'd the Gate; whereupon the rest following, the Town was quickly sack'd, and burnt, and a rich Booty carry'd to our Navy. After which the Earl commanded sixteen or seventeen French Ships (he found on that Coast) to be burnt: And so, leaving his Vice-Admiral to scowre the Seas, he made certain Knights for their good Service, and return'd to Southampton, whence he conducted the Emperor to Spain, who taking Ship July 6. arrived July 16. at Saint-André. ¶ The English Garrison, this while, in Calais and Guisnes, and the French in Ardres and Boulogne were not idle, but took many occasions of invading each others Frontiers, among which one, related by Hall and Hollinshead, seems so memorable, that I have thought fit to insert it. Three hundred French Horse lying in Ambuscade near Guisnes, and sending some Horse before to draw out the English: A little Band of eight Archers issued forth, and maintain'd a Skirmish; at last twelve Demy-Lances (which Hall saith were all Welch-men) came to their rescue; the French perceiving this, issue forth with all their Horse; but our Demy-Lances charg'd them with that Courage, that, killing and hurting divers, they open'd their way to the Town: ¶ These so many occasions of making War, enforc'd the King to make use of his Subjects Affections; whereof that he might take the better notice, he caus'd a general Muster or Description to be made (this Summer) of all his Kingdom, commanding (as Stow hath it) out of a * Warrant directed to a Constable of a Hundred) that they should certify the Names of all above sixteen Years old; and that they should repair to a certain place assign'd, with their Arms, and declare what their Names are, and to whom they belong, and who is Lord of every Town or Hamlet, and who be Stewards, as also who be Parsons of the Town, and what their Benefice is worth, and who be Owners of every parcel of Land within the said Precincts, and what is the yearly value of every Man's Land, as also the Stock on the Lands, and who is Owner thereof; also, what Strangers dwell there, and of what Occupation they are; also the value and substance of every Person being above sixteen Years old, as well Spiritual as Temporal; also, what Pensions go thence to Religious or Spiritual Men. Which being certified again, the King (as Polydore saith) rejoyc'd, as finding his Kingdom so Wealthy: Howbeit, as he was not ready yet for a Parliament, he * borrow'd of the Citizens of London twenty thousand Pound, and sent Privy-Seals to divers other rich Persons of the Kingdom; in sequence whereof, he demanded a Loan (as I take it) of the tenth of the Temporality, according to the true value of their Estates, to be employ'd in the Wars, and a fourth of the Spirituality. But as this caus'd much grudging, so the Londoners (particularly) * alledg'd so many Reasons why they could not, upon Oath, give account of their Goods, and Wealth, especially as long as so much of their Stock was in other Mens Hands, that the Cardinal at last accepted their valuation of themselves, upon their simple Honesties. All which extraordinary ways of furnishing the present Necessities yet ended in a Parliament the next Year, as shall be told in its place. The King having thus yet gotten some Money, denounc'd open War to Francis, unless he made Peace with the Pope and Emperor. In sequence thereof commanding the Earl of Surrey (and not the Duke of Suffolk, as the French have it) after his attempts by Sea, to go over to Calais, and with convenient Forces to join with Horence d'Egmond, Count de Bure, General of the Emperor's Troops. These meeting together betwixt Ardres (lately demolish'd) and St. Omar, spoil'd and burnt all the Villages in their way till they came to Hesdin, in which Odoart Seigneur de Biez, with a strong Garison, commanded. But Autumn being now far come on, and the Weather very unreasonable, they could only take the Town, the Castle being stronger, than that it was thought fit to attempt it. They march'd therefore towards Dourlans, which they took, and burnt, with all the adjoining Villages. The Season continuing still very foul, and our Men falling generally sick, the Army separated, and the rather, that the two Generals could not agree about their Designs. Before yet the Earl of Surrey departed, he burnt Marquise, and some other places near the English Pale; which being done, he came home, and gave our King account of his Journey. Whereupon also Sir Thomas Bolen, and Richard Sampson Doctor of Law were sent to Charles in Spain, to advise what further was to be done.

The Duke of Albany, whom we left in France, was now recall'd by more than one Voice. For he was not only sent for by the vote of the Nobility and People of Scotland, but Queen Margaret her self invited him. Besides, it is probable, that Francis did not unwillingly connive at his departure, as hoping he would find our King enough to do at home. The cause why the State desir'd his return was, that their King was so young, and some of their Affairs were compos'd. But Queen Margaret had also her Reason: For being offended with the Earl of Angus for forsaking her at Harbottle 1516, and scandaliz'd much at the love he now bore to a certain Scotch Lady, she had endeavour'd, by the Duke of Albany's means, to procure a Divorce at Rome, alledging, among other Causes, that she heard, her Husband James the Fourth was living three years after Floddenfield, and therefore not dead when she marry'd him, (so much did that report prevail.) But because our King again oppos'd this, (as I find by our Records, whence I have the whole passage) nothing was presently done, though afterwards, new Motives appearing, she was divorc'd from him, as will appear in its place. The Duke, being now generally * welcom'd, banish'd the Earl of Angus with his Brother George into France, and caus'd his

1522. sent Clarenceaux Herald, to require and command The King the Duke to avoid the Realm, and if he would sends Cl- not, to desie him. And that he might have at Arms just cause to use this Language, he was to al-into Scot- ledge unto the Duke, that he had broken an land to de- expresse Article of the Treaty in coming over;
fie the neither could he pretend to have any Commis-Duke of sion from Francis; who in a Letter to our King, Albany in had disavow'd this Action so far, as he profess'd full Parli- to be neither privy nor consenting to his Jour-ament. ney. Besides, that there was danger of his aspiring to the Crown, and that the Divorce he pro-cur'd for Queen Margaret, was not without design to obtain her for himself. And this is the substance of that wherewith Clarenceaux was to charge him (as I gather out of several Collections;) howsoever, our Records tell us, that the Duke of Albany reply'd, that, since his Recall came from the Nobility and States of the Land, he would retain it against all Kings. As for his being suspected of Ambition to the Crown, he answer'd, that he had rather enjoy his Means in France, than pretend to that Regality. And for Queen Margaret, he said he had indeed negotiated a Divorce in Rome, but with no intention to marry her himself, when he could; as having a Wife of his own. Letters also were sent by our King to the Parliament, whereby he perswad'd them to reject the Duke. But they answer'd that they would defend him against all.
Lastly I find, by an Original of Queen Marga- ret, that our King writ to her also; for she there expostulates sharply with him, for believing those reports concerning the Duke of Albany and her; defending nevertheless the said Duke's being in Scotland; adding, that, if he had not been an unkind Brother, she should not have needed to provide for her self, by the Duke of Albany's assistance.

Feb. Our King finding this took no effect, in Fe- bruary sent the Lord Dacres, Warden of the West-Marches, into Scotland, with about five hundred Men, to Proclaim that the Scots should come in to the King's Peace by the first of March following, or to stand to their Perils, which the Duke of Albany suspecting would prove a War, had provided by this time a great Army in the Borders; unwilling yet to do more than to shew his power to offend. For, besides that many of the better sort judg'd wisely, that if matters succeeded ill, they might be call'd in question, when their King came to full Age: they were not ignorant, how puissant an Enemy they pro-vok'd; especially, at a time, when their Confe-derates the French had so much to do elsewhere.
Therefore, although the Lord Dacres made some Inroads into Scotland, and burnt divers Villages,

* July 30. joyning himself with the Earl of Shrewsbury, Constituted Lieutenant General for the North Parts; and that the Duke of Albany himself was advanc'd so far as Carlisle, yet he retir'd; the intercession of Queen Margaret prevailing for a Conference to be had betwixt the Duke and the Lord Dacres, wherein, all for the present was quieted, whereof the Lord Dacres was glad, as being somewhat surpris'd at that time. This

* Sept. 11. Conference yet brought forth a * Truce only, for a few Days, upon condition that the Scots should send Ambassadors into England, to desire a Peace. But when they requir'd the French might be comprehended, King Henry would not consent, howbeit, the Truce was prorogu'd: Whereupon the Governor, as finding the Scotch Nobility unwilling to invade England on those Octob. Terms, in October departs to France, to crave aid of Francis, the event whereof we shall see the next year.

But while these Christian Princes were in War thus one against the other, the Turk who had now long experience what harm the Knights of Saint John of Jerusalem had done him in the Archipelago, thought fit to invade the Isle of Rhodes, (their chief Strength and Fortrefs at that time.) Hereunto concurr'd a request which Se- lim upon his Death-bed made unto his Son Soly- man, wherein he not only exhorted him to revenge the Affront his Grandfather Mahomet suf-fer'd, when he was repuls'd thence, but even as a pious and devout Act recommended this Enterprise to him. Such mischiefs hath Religion, (which should be a new bond of Peace) authoriz'd unto Mankind, in more than one Age or Country. It was not yet without much danger that Solyman made this Attempt. For as he brought near two hundred thousand Men into a little and barren Island, so, if ever his Shipping had through firing or ill weather been cast away or destroy'd, he must have perish'd there before the Town could be forc'd. But such was the disunion of the Christian Princes, that they lost their fair occasion; thus, upon Saint John Baptist's * day (the more to despight the Knights) this great Army enter'd the Island, (the Turk himself following in Person a Month after) and continuing the Siege till Christmas, upon which day Solyman with great pomp enter'd Rhodes, being yielded upon composition by Philip de Villi- ers a French-man, Great Master of that Religion.
Shortly after which, he, together with those Knights that remain'd, sail'd towards Rome, and other parts of Italy, where comfortless and errant they continu'd, till by the intercession of Clement the Seventh (sometimes Knight of that Order) and the favour of Charles, they * obtain'd Malta, where they now reside.

In November this year, a Diet being held at Noremberg, Adrian sends to the Princes of Germany, requiring them passionately to suppress Luther, according to the Decree at Worms; confessing nevertheless many abuses in Ecclesiastical Government, inso much, that he doubted not to give Cheregat his Nuncio Instructions to say, In hac sancta sede aliquot jam Annis multa abominanda fuisse, In these later years many abominable things had crept into the Church, which he therefore promis'd, by degrees to redress. But the message pleas'd neither side: The Cardinals at Rome disliking Adri- an's free Declaration; and the Princes there, as little approving the slow and indirect Courses taken for reforming the many Enormities then us'd in the Roman Church, as may appear by their Centum Gravamina; the particulars of which hundred Grievances, I have thought fit to insert, not with desire to affront any, but only that, pursuing my Intentions, the Reader may find briefly a true History of the times.

The Substance of the Centum Gravamina, offer'd to Pope Adrian by the *German*s, was to this effect:

I. That the Church hath both commanded and forbidden divers things the Scripture did not:
As certain Obstacles of Marriage, Differences of Meat, &c. all yet to be redeem'd for Money.

II. That People, who otherwise might justly Marry, were yet forbidden it at certain times, when yet both Ecclesiastics and Layics took then their Carnal Liberty. Nevertheless that for Money this restraint might be dispenc'd with.

III. That Indulgences (call'd there Imposturae) and pardon for Sins, not only past but future, did cause all Impiety and Wickedness, while Men believ'd, Modò tinniat dextra, while they brought

Articles in the Roman Church.

IV. That the Money for Indulgences, &c. was not employ'd the way it was promis'd, that is to say against the Turk, but towards their Friends and Kindreds Expence and Luxury.

V. That yet the Pope, Bishops, and other principal Persons of the Clergy reserv'd some cases to themselves, which none other can dispence with, and that this again cost them much.

VI. That the pardon of Sins for future times, brought in all mischief, as Perjury, Homicide, Adultery, and the like.

VII. That certain Preachers (call'd Stationarii) went up and down the Country, preaching the Lives of some holy Men or Saints, as Valentine, Habert, &c. promising the simple People, that if they vow'd themselves to those Saints, and pay'd such an yearly Tribute, they should be free from such Diseases, as they nam'd.

VIII. That the Fratres Mendicantes, call'd Terminarii, consum'd the Alms that the poor should have.

IX. That, at the instance of Ecclesiastical Persons, divers Layics were cited to Rome, to answer concerning businesses not belonging to that Court, as namely matters of Inheritance, Gages, and Pawns, &c.

X. That even Layics, upon their Oath that they cannot hope for Justice in Germany before their ordinary Judge, might bring their Cause to Rome, though otherwise it were prov'd that Justice were done, and the Party perjurd.

XI. That certain Judges call'd Conservatores, which were appointed by the Pope to determine the Causes of certain Ecclesiastics, did under colour thereof trouble all other places of Judicature, and derogate from the Temporal Authority, Excommunicating all that would not obey them.

XII. That certain Delegates and Commissaries of the Pope were often appointed to determine the secular Causes of any Person whatsoever, and to denounce Excommunication if they disobey'd.

XIII. That the Pope, by exempting certain Monasteries from the jurisdiction of their Bishops and Ordinaries, went about to draw an immediate dependance upon the Church of Rome, to the diminution of the Imperial Power.

XIV. That the right of Patronage belonging to divers Lay and Ecclesiastical Persons was (under colour of prevention) usurp'd by the Pope and his Legats, when Benefices were vacant, and that they did confer them usually upon Courtiers and their Favourites.

XV. That these Men either dying at Rome, or in their way thither, their Offices and Benefices were confer'd usually by the Pope, to the detriment of the true Patrons.

XVI. That divers undue means were practis'd to prove Men amply benefic'd to be Courtiers, and dependants on Cardinals.

XVII. The great Benefices or Ecclesiastical Promotions could not be confer'd on able Persons, unless Pensions were first given out of them to the Courtiers and Officers of the Pope.

XVIII. That, under pretences of making Benefices litigious, the said Courtiers and Officers drew thence great Pensions; and if the ordinary Statutes of Chancery serv'd not, they form'd and reform'd them as they pleas'd; also the Incumbent dying during this pretended Controversy, the said Pretenders invaded the Benefice, to the wrong of the Patron.

XIX. That the Collation of Deaneries, and other Ecclesiastical Promotions was often taken from the right Patrons by the Pope, especially if the former possessors were Courtiers.

XX. That in granting Benefices they us'd many Arts to get Money, under the names of Reservations, Permutations, Surrogations, &c. to the damage of the Patron.

XXI. That Courtiers often having Benefices in Germany confer'd on them, farm'd them out to Strangers who cannot speak the Language.

XXII. That Archbishops and Bishops were bound by their Chapters to bestow the best vacant Benefices, with Cure or without it, among themselves only, to the frustrating of many able Persons.

XXIII. That the Houses belonging to such Benefices were suffer'd to fall, and the People untaught, and the Statutes of Founders not observ'd.

XXIV. That divers Abbeyes, and Religious Houses, being deliver'd in commendam to Cardinals, and Bishops, did not feed now above five or six Persons, whereas heretofore they nourish'd forty or fifty.

XXV. That, whereas there were divers Collegiate Churches in Germany, into which none but Princes, Earls, Barons, or at least Gentlemen ought to be admitted; that now Courtiers, though inferior Persons, were receiv'd into them for Money.

XXVI. That, whereas in the bestowing of Benefices divers ancient Privileges and Immunities belong'd both to Ecclesiastical and Lay Persons, they were now by the policy of the Roman See, eluded or infring'd.

XXVII. That, whereas Annats were paid to the Pope by Ecclesiastics, and whereas the Princes of Germany did also pay them for divers years, upon condition the Money might be employ'd in War against the Turk; now because they understood the Money was otherwise dispos'd of, they desir'd henceforth to be eas'd of this great burden.

XXVIII, XXIX, XXX. That Ecclesiastics do not pay their due parts, either for a War against the Turk, or other publick Affairs; whereas having so great a portion of Revenue in Germany, they should furnish their reasonable share; and in this case the Church-Ornaments and Treasure are not to be spar'd, lest they come all together into the hands of the Turk.

XXXI. That, whereas Ecclesiastical Persons, being by taking Orders exempt from secular Justice; do thereupon take more freedom to commit Adultery, Murders, Rapine, and even Coining Moneys, to the no little scandal of Religion, and derogation of the secular Authority; and that their Superiors likewise never punish them, but being first degraded, (to which yet much Ceremony and Time is requir'd,) and that the said Superiors by their Chapters, are bound not to punish them otherwise.

XXXII. And whereas the leaving these Crimes unpunish'd, may cause Sedition and Tumult in the Laity, as finding the Ecclesiastics have not parity of punishment with them:

XXXIII. Therefore, they desir'd that Ecclesiastics and Layics may equally suffer for crimes of the same nature; and that no Order may privilege them from the Magistrate.

XXXIV. That whereas Banns and Excommunications ought to be us'd only when Men are convicted of Heresy; that yet Layics incur'd this punishment for small faults, and so were driv'n to desperation, and excluded from Divine Service.

XXXV. That divers also, who were not properly interest'd in the Crime of the Excommunicated Person, did yet suffer as Complices; and all this only that more Money might be gotten.

XXXVI. That when the Priest or Ecclesiastical

cal Person was kill'd by chance, the whole Town or Village was interdicted, till compensation was made, and no regard taken of the occasion given.

XXXVII. That Holidays were in such number in Harvest-time, that People could not get in their Corn in due season; whereas, yet innumerable mischiefs were then done, rather than Gods Service frequented according to the first Institution.

XXXVIII. That the Revenues of the Knights of the Teutonic Order, destin'd for War against the Turk, were apply'd to Cardinals, Archbishops, and Bishops, which were neither Germans, nor of the said Order, contrary to the first Institution.

XXXIX. That Arch-Bishops, Bishops, and other Prelats obtain'd from Rome Conservators and Delegates, whence so many grievances follow to the Layics.

XL. That Layics Goods and Inheritance might come to Ecclesiastical hands by purchase, or otherwise; but that Ecclesiastical Goods and Inheritance might never return to the Layics.

XLI. That when Ecclesiastical Persons, having Inheritance descended upon them, did die Intestate, divers Bishops did claim that Inheritance themselves, to the prejudice of the next right Heirs.

XLII. That, whereas the profits of certain Lands and Possessions Temporal, were sometimes casually transferr'd by Layics to Ecclesiastical Persons, they labour'd to retain the said Lands as their own for ever, by submitting them to Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction.

XLIII. That Bishops would not confirm the Foundations of Ecclesiastical Benefices, unless the Founders gave them the first bestowing thereof.

XLIV. That they were forc'd to purchase the confirmation of them for great Sums of Money.

XLV. That, when by a Lay Person any Man were presented to a Benefice, he could not be invested therein, till he had paid as much as a years Profit, or two, to the Bishop and his Officers.

XLVI. That Bishops raise extraordinary Subsidies on the Priest under them, so that they cannot live unless they get Money again from the People. Insomuch that they will administer no Sacrament unless some Money be given.

XLVII. That many are made Priests who have not means to maintain the Charge, to the derogation of their Dignity, while they exercise some fordid Trades; and that they who can get six Voices for a Certificate, obtain Orders, when yet those Attestations were corruptly gotten.

XLVIII, XLIX. That more is exacted from the People for the Consecration of Churches than is needful; and that, though Layics bestow divers Gifts on the Church, as Altar-pieces, &c. yet Money is requir'd for their Consecration.

L. That if two or more fight in the Church-yard with their Fists, to the drawing of never so little Blood, the Town must pay for the new Consecrating thereof.

LI. That Suffragans us'd to baptize Bells, under pretence of driving away Devils and Tempests; and, for this purpose, did invite many rich Godfathers, who were to touch the Rope while the Bell was exorcis'd, and its name invoked, (unto which all the People must answer.) And that a Banquet was us'd to be made hereupon, at the cost of the Layics, amounting in little Towns to a hundred Florens, whither the Godfathers were to come and bring great Gifts, &c. whereas they desir'd that the said Bells might be baptiz'd, not only by Suffragans, but by any Priest, with Holy-water, Salt, and Herbs, without such Costs.

LII. That, if in any Diocese a Solemnity for a new Saint were frequented, the Bishop us'd to take to himself a third or fourth part of the Offering, which yet ought to have been employ'd in War against the Turk.

LIII. That whereas some Nunneries were govern'd by Provosts, the Bishops refus'd to accept the said Provosts till the Nuns had given them Money.

LIV. That when any Abbot or Abbess was chosen, they must be Consecrated anew by the Suffragans, (though otherwise they were capable of the charge) and Feasts made, and great Sums paid. That also many Offices were invented in the Court of Rome, so that Bishops could not enter their charge without paying great Fees, which again they were forc'd to get of the People as they could.

LV. That Ecclesiastical Judges commonly were Persons of an idle Life, and intentive wholly to Gain.

LVI. That though the Plaintiff be Ecclesiastic, and the Defendant Layic, and that by the Law, Aktor Rei Forum sequi debet, the Cause is to be heard in the Defendants Court, yet the Cause was revok'd still to the Ecclesiastical Court.

LVII. That though Justice be neither delay'd nor deny'd in Civil Courts, yet the Ecclesiastical Persons drew matters of debt into their Courts, and oppress'd Men by their rigid Censures.

LVIII. That, whereas Citations and Monitories are granted against Layics, in many cases, which are known not to belong to Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, yet that the Persons so cited, either can get no remedy herein, or that, before the Civil Magistrate can avoke the cause, so much Time and Money is spent, as is intolerable to the poor Suitor.

LIX. That Ecclesiastical Judges drew many causes to their Court, which belong'd not to it, as Ravishments of Virgins, some cases concerning Bastardy, &c. which yet they could not be drawn to remit to the ordinary jurisdiction.

IX. That, when a Man were wrongfully call'd before the Ecclesiastical Judges, and at last, after much charges dismiss'd, yet unless his Adversaries Proctor were satisfi'd to the full, he ran the danger of Excommunication.

LXI. That Layics, though by long prescription they paid neither great nor small Tenths, out of certain of their Lands, yet receiv'd Citations from Ecclesiastical Judges, and were constrain'd to pay, under the penalty of Excommunication; not daring to appeal to Rome, for fear of more excessive charges.

LXII. That all belonging to Ecclesiastical Persons labour'd also to take the advantage of the Ecclesiastical Courts, when they had any Suit against Layics.

LXIII. That, on occasion of injurious words only, Ecclesiastical Persons drew the Suit to their Courts, and suffer'd not the lawful Judge to determine it.

LXIV. That in all Causes where Oaths are interpos'd, Ecclesiastical Judges us'd to avoke them, upon pretence that matter of Oaths were not otherwise to be decided: which at last yet would wholly frustrate Secular Courts; there being so many Cases wherein Oaths intervene.

LXV. That, when their Judgments concern'd their Ecclesiastical Superiors, they dare not exercise it, but only let them run against the poorer sort.

LXVI. That they have invented many Re-formations, Ordinances, Laws, and Statutes wholly differing from the usual and Common Law; which 1522. which yet tend not so much to the good of the People, as their own private gain.

Abuses in the Roman Church.

LXVII. That, it being agreed by the Canons of the Fathers, that Spiritual Punishments should be inflicted for Spiritual and manifest Sins, Ecclesiastical Judges and Officers yet did extend and aggravate these punishments so far, that Layics were forc'd to redeem them with Money.

LXVIII. That Men and Women, being falsely accus'd, yet upon their purgation, they were so far from receiving satisfaction, that they were forc'd to pay for Letters of Absolution; and Oaths, besides, taken of malicious and wicked Women, upon words spoken when they revile each other; which made them often incur Perjury, and occasion'd much Offence.

LXIX. That, when business of Matrimony hath proceeded so far, that one of the Parties pretended a Contract, which the other deny'd, and that some Gifts, as Earnests of Marriage had pass'd betwixt them, the Ecclesiastical Judges yet separating the Parties, keep the Gifts for themselves, as forfeit or escheated.

LXX. That, whereas there are certain Causes so belonging to both Jurisdictions, as they are determinable by that Court which first questions them (as manifest Perjuries, Adulteries, &c.) yet the Ecclesiastical Judges forbid the Civil to meddle herein.

LXXI. That, upon pretences of Layics, that they cannot obtain of the Secular Magistrate execution of Justice, Citations were usually granted from the Ecclesiastical Court, or Breves to the Secular Judges, warning them in the space of a Month to end the said Cause, or otherwise that they would take Order; when, yet, the Cause being brought before them, depended often the space of three years, without that they would grant the like power to Secular Judges.

LXXII. That Ecclesiastical Judges, under colour of prescription, arrogated much to themselves, when as yet no prescription can avail against the Pope and Emperor.

LXXIII. That Offenders, after private Confession, being requir'd to do publick Penance before all the People, are compell'd also to pay Money to Ecclesiastical Officers.

LXXIV. That, instead of forbidding Usury, they permit it for Money given them; and that for an Annual Revenue paid, they permit Clerks, Religious and Secular Persons to live publicly with their Harlots and get Children.

LXXV. That, if one of the Marry'd Couple take a Journey either to the Wars, or to perform a Vow, to a far Countrey, they permit the party remaining at Home, if the other stay long away, upon a Sum of Money pay'd, to cohabit with another, not examining sufficiently whether the absent Party were dead.

LXXVI, LXXVII. That Synodal Judges, going to poor Towns and Villages every where, draw Annual Tribute thence or Excommunicate them, when they cannot pay: And that they draw Money weekly in many places, from Bakers, Brokers, Butchers, &c. under the same penalty.

LXXVIII, LXXIX. That they send Inhibitory Letters to Layics, forbidding them to proceed in their Suit, before the Secular Judge; whereby they are forc'd to submit to the Ecclesiastical Court, or otherwise to appeal to Rome.

LXXX. That many, not being able to endure the charges of Law in these kinds, are forc'd to make some bad bargain and composition, being not able to stand out.

LXXXI. That whereas Ecclesiastical Judges, by giving Oaths to the Advocates and Proctors attending in their Courts, did make them obnoxious, it was manifest their Clients could have little hope of Assistance, when the Cause any way concern'd the said Judges or their Superiors. Neither was there any remedy for this, but by their admission of foreign Advocates, to whom yet so short a time was allow'd for bringing them to the Bar as they could not easily come.

LXXXII. That the poorer sort, being not able to pay their Duties to the Parson, were often deny'd the Communion.

LXXXIII. That Labourers in time of Vintage were Excommunicated, unless they took such Seasons as the Ecclesiastics prescrib'd, upon pretence that their Tenths might suffer damage thereby.

LXXXIV. That Synodal Judges, going Progress yearly under pretext of Visitation, and inflicting punishment on Offenders, took only occasion to exact Money.

LXXXV. That the Canons of the Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, who had power to choose a Prelate or Superior, would not elect him, until he first promis'd and bound himself not to contradict them in any business, (how foul soever, and dishonest) and that if they offended, he should not punish them.

LXXXVI. That Livings belonging to Bishops, Monasteries, &c. were let forth to Vicars, at so dear rates, that they were forc'd to get Money again from the poor for Confessions, Anniversaries, Obits, &c.

LXXXVII. That, though Priests by their Foundation ought to sing such a Mass on such a day, yet they will have Money therefore. Besides, with one Mass they think to serve divers Benefices.

LXXXVIII. That if any of their Parishioners, for Marriage or other occasion quitted his House or Dwelling, he must pay so much to the Priest for Testimonials, or be Excommunicated.

LXXXIX. That whereas, by the Popes Canons, they only are deny'd Christian Burial, who without taking the Communion, died in any notorious and mortal Sin, yet their Ecclesiastics extended the Law further, and deny'd burial to Men deceas'd by chance, as drown'd or kill'd, until such Money were paid.

XC. That many Priests, and other Ecclesiastical Persons mixt themselves with the Multitude, dancing and disguising themselves, wearing Swords, with which they made Quarrels, and hurt People, and yet constrain'd them to pay.

XCI. That in most places, Bishops, and their Officials not only tolerated Concubinage, upon paying Money in the more dissolute sort of Monks, but exacted it also in the more continent; saying, it was now at their choice whether they would have Concubines or no.

XCII. That at the Dedications of Churches, permission was given to the Chaplains and Priests to set up Taverns, Dice, Cards, &c.

XCIII. That, at the point of Death, they perswaded Men by flattery and fictions, to give their Goods from their Children unto them.

XCIV. That Mendicant Friars, drew many Causes to Rome unjustly, to the grievance of the Layics, getting also so much Money, that they had lately bought three Cardinals Hatts for their Generals at a huge rate, and that they much molested Nunneries.

XCV. That the Legats and Orators of Popes made Bastards, and others born ex damnato coitu, from Marriages within the degrees forbidden, to be legitimate, to the no little wrong of the right Heirs.

XCVI. And that they made also certain Viscount Palatines as their Substitutes, having power also to legitimate and admit Bastards to Succession; and to make Notaries, when yet some of them are so ignorant, as they know not what 1522. what belongs to a Notaries place. Besides, the said Legats go about to absolve Men from their Oaths, Pacts, and Obligations, with permission to treat de novo; than which nothing yet was more contrary to Equity and Justice.

XCVII. Besides, that they endeavour'd to take Livings from the true Patrons, and bestow them as they pleas'd.

XCVIII. That, because Religious Persons succeeded Secular Men in their Inheritance, and not vice versa; there could be no equality, unless that before any enter'd into a Religious Life, they renounc'd their Succession in Temporal Estates.

XCIX. That the chief part of these Grievances having been represented in the late Diet at Worms, to the Emperor by the Lay-States, against Arch-Bishops, Bishops, and other Ecclesiastical Persons, that yet no remedy ensu'd. And that therefore all the Secular States of the Roman Empire renew'd now their Petition to the Pope, that his Holiness would reform these Abuses.

C. That there are many Grievances more intolerable than these, which the said Secular States of the Roman Empire could shew, but (for brevity) did forbear, as hoping that when those were taken away, the rest would follow.

Wherefore, by way of final Petition, the said Secular States of the Roman Empire, both of the higher and lower sort, did beseech his Holiness to take away, amend and abrogate the said Grievances; or otherwise that themselves would take such course as should be expedient for the remedy thereof.

While, that his Holiness might take the better notice thereof, they thought fit to digest their Grievances into these Heads, and send them to his Holiness.

These Abuses and Grievances (which, as much as through the obscurity of some terms us'd there, was possible, I have endeavour'd faithfully to abbreviate) being publish'd; Luther became more obstinate, repenting now his Submission at Worms; insomuch that at Wittenberg, he doubted not to abolish the old Mass, and to frame a new Liturgy, &c. Of which more hereafter.

1523. Our King finding now his extraordinary ways for levying Money to fail, or at least having resolv'd to determine them in a Parliament, summon'd it to be held in the Black-Friars in London upon the fifteenth of April, in the fourteenth year of his Reign. And here the Cardinal took order that the Spirituality should lead. The business of Subsidy, therefore, being brought into the Convocation-House, found a fair way for the most part. Yet Richard Fox Bishop of Winchester, and John Fisher Bishop of Rochester, and one Philips oppos'd it. But the Cardinal, silencing some, and causing others to absent themselves, prevail'd at last. Insomuch that one half of the Revenues Spiritual for one year, was granted payable in five years following. Hence the Cardinal went to the House of Commons, where in an elegant Oration, breach of Faith was laid to the charge of Francis the First, upon the League sworn for the general Peace of Christendom. Besides, default of payment for Tournay, and other things were objected; so that the King could do no less in this publick Cause, than joyn in War with Charles the Emperor against him. And because the charge thereof was cast up to Eight hundred thousand pounds, it was requir'd, that the aforesaid Sum might be rais'd out of the fifth part of every Mans Goods and Lands to be paid in four years.

This being said, the Cardinal departed. The next day Sir Thomas More, (Speaker of the House) inforc'd this demand, demonstrating how it was not much on this occasion, to pay four shillings in the pound. But the House of Commons answer'd, that though some were well Money'd, yet in general the fifth part of Mens Goods was not in Plate or Money, but in Stock or Cattel. And that to pay away all their Coin, would alter the whole frame, and inter-course of things. For, if Tenants came to pay their Landlords in Corn and Cattel only; and the Landlord again could not put them off for those things he had need of, there would be a stop in all Traffick and Merchandize, and consequently the Shipping of the Kingdom must decay; and the Nation it self for want of Money, grow in a sort barbarous and ignoble. To this was answer'd.

That the Money demanded ought not to be accounted as lost, or taken away, but only to be transfer'd into others hands of their Kindred or Nation; herein therefore, that no more was done, than that we see ordinarily in Markets; where, though the Money change Masters, yet every one is accommodated. Howsoever, that no Man ought to refuse unto him that fighteth for the honour and safety of his Country, so much as will maintain him; since he denies it not even to his Labourer. That those who are employ'd, must have been fed when they staid idle at home, and yet that they ask'd no more now, to give the uttermost proof of well-deserving Patriots. Howbeit, you may reply, this will exhaust the Coin from the poorer sort; but, to avoid this Objection, let the richer go themselves. Let them shew, in defending their Country, that they merit the better and greater parts thereof. Our King will not deny them this Honour. Or, when they would desire to be exempt, and lay the burthen and hazard upon others, let them not grudge yet the giving so poor a Stipend, as some of their Servants, at home, would scarcely take to stand bare-headed to them. Neither are they to value themselves more than others, because they have larger Possessions, unless they employ it to the publick Good; since, in ancient times, and even true Reason of State, they deserv'd not so much, who till'd and manur'd a Country, as they who defended it. Nor is it well said of you, when you object that this will carry the Money out of England, and leave it in France; for doth it not carry the Men too, and so in effect prove but the same Expence? Notwithstanding, if you be so obstinate, as to believe that making War in a Country brings Money to it, do but conceive a while, that, the French had invaded us, would the Money they brought over, think you, enrich our Country? Should any of us be the better for it? Let us therefore lay aside those poor Scruples, and do what may be worthy the Dignity and Honour of our Nation. When you did conceive the worst that can fall out, you should yet eat your Beef and Mutton here, and wear your Country Cloth; while others, upon a short allowance, fought only that you might enjoy your Families and Liberty. But I say confidently you need not fear this penury or scarceness of Money; the intercourse of things being so establish'd throughout the whole World, that there is a perpetual Circulation of all that can be necessary to Mankind. Thus your Commodities will ever find out Money; while, not to go far, I shall produce our own Merchants only, who, (let me assure you,) will be always as glad of your Corn and Cattel, as you can be of any thing they bring you. Let us therefore (in God's Name) do what becomes us, and for the rest, entertain so good an Opinion of our Soldiers, as to believe, that in stead of leaving our Country bare, they will add new Provinces to it, or, at least, bring rich Spoils and Triumphs home.

At last, after some debate and contention, it was agreed by the Commons, that every Man of Estate of twenty pound yearly and upwards, should pay two shillings in the pound; and from twenty pound a year downward to forty shillings, one shilling in the pound; and under forty shillings every Head of sixteen years

1523. years old or more should pay four pence, in two years. The Cardinal hearing no more intended, seem'd much troubled, and therefore, coming to the Lower House of Parliament, He told them, that he desired to reason with those who oppos'd his Demands; but being answer'd, that it was the Order of that House to hear, and not to reason, but among themselves, the Cardinal departed. Yet by the liberal motion of some of the Lower House, those of fifty pound Land and upwards, were induced to give one shilling more, (being three shillings in the pound) for three years to come, which at length being continu'd to the fourth year, and extended to those who were worth five pound in Goods, was all that could be obtain'd.

The more famous Statutes enacted this Parliament, fourteen, and fifteen Reg. Henry the Eighth, were these.

Laws pass'd in this Parliament about Blackwell-Hall Market in favour of Denizens. Concerning Aliens. That our Merchants might have eight days preference before Strangers, for buying of broad white-woollen Cloths, brought to Blackwell-Hall in London; unless in Fairs, Ports, Creeks, &c. That Strangers using a Handy-Craft, should take no Apprentices, nor above two Journey-Men, unless they were the King's Subjects. That they should be under the search and reformation of the Wardens and Fellowship of Handy-Crafts, and one Substantial Stranger, to be chosen by the said Wardens. That they should cause a Mark to be put on the Wares, and Workmanship, to be known thereby. That, if they were falsely and deceitfully made, they should be forfeit. That this Provision should extend to Strangers, living in other Towns than London. That, if Strangers were wrong'd, they might seek their remedy from the Lord-Chancellor and Treasurer of England, or the Justices of Assize in the Counties where they liv'd. That, during this Parliament, their Apprentices or Journey-Men might continue as before, and so to endure till the last day of the next Parliament. This Act yet was not to extend to Strangers of Oxford, Cambridge, and the Sanctuary of Saint Martins le Grand in London. That, if the Officers refus'd to put a Mark on the Wares, or Workmanship of Joyners, Black-Smiths, &c. being Strangers; that then it was lawful for the Strangers to sell them without the said Mark. That Lords and others the Kings Subjects of an hundred pounds yearly might take and retain Strangers being Joyners, and Glaziers, for their private Service, this Act notwithstanding. That English-Men living under Foreign Princes, and being sworn to them, should pay such Custom to our King, Subsidy and Toll, as other Strangers of those parts do. And that the Governor of the Merchant Adventurers, or the King's Ambassadors in Foreign Countries, shall certify their Names to the Chancery, to the intent that Order may be given therein to the Kings Officers in Havens, Ports, and Creeks. Yet if any such English-man, did return to inhabit here, that then he should be restor'd to all liberties of a Subject.

A Colledge of Physicians (among whom was that famous and learned Linacer, chief Physician to the King) was erected, and certain Authorities and Privileges granted to them.

Moreover the Statute of 6 Hen. VIII. 13. for shooting in Cross-Bows, or Hand-Guns was dispenc'd with in Men of one hundred pound per Annum. That Coiners who make Money in any Mint in England, should coin of every hundred pounds of Gold, twenty pound into half Angels or pieces of xl. pence, and of every hundred pounds worth of Bullion, Plate or Silver, a certain portion into Groats, Two-pences, Pence, Half-pence, and Farthings (the Farthings to have a Mark different from the Half-pence.) That they who bring less than 100 pounds in Bullion or Plate to the Mint, shall have the tenth part thereof in Half-pence and Farthings. That this yet shall not extend to the Mint-masters of York, Durham, or Canterbury. Concerning which Law, it is worth the noting, that though it was for the benefit of the Subjects, to have so much of the smallest sort of Coin, yet by reason of their liteness, it is all worn out.

That they which be in the Kings Service in Wars may aliene their Lands, for performance of their Wills, without any fine for Alienation. And, if any of them die in the Kings Service in War, his Feoffees or Executors shall have the Wardship of his Heir and Lands.

I find also in this Parliament, an Act for Attainder of the Duke of Buckingham. And another for the restitution of Henry Lord Stafford, Son to the said Duke.

Also an Act pass'd that the King shall, for his life have Authority by his Letters Patents at his pleasure to Reverse, Repeal, and Annul, all attainders of High Treason, and to restore their Heirs, &c.

While these Affairs at home were in agitation, the Cardinal * sending Thomas Anniball (Doctor of Law) to Pope Adrian then in Spain, obtain'd the continuance of his Legantine Power for five years more, which yet (saith Polydore) he made so venal, as if, to recompence the heavy Loans and Payments he had impos'd on the People, he would take order to discharge them of their Sins at an easie rate.

The King having sent divers times into Scotland, to require that his Nephew James, might have exercise of that Regal Authority which was due unto him, and the Duke of Albany discharg'd from his place of Vice-Roy, receiv'd so uncertain and dilatory Answers, that he thought fit to desist a while from his designs in France, and to pursue this. Therefore he makes a particular dispatch to Sir Thomas Bolen, Treasurer of his Household, and Mr. Richard Sampson Dean of his Chappel, resident then in Spain, requiring them to excuse him, if he did not proceed so roundly to the execution of the Treaty at Windsor, (formerly mention'd) since, for defence of his Nephew, he was constrain'd to take in hand the business of Scotland; yet that he would, in good time, perform all that could be requir'd on his part. Together with which they were charg'd, to intimate some jealousies he had of a near Alliance propos'd betwixt Charles and Francis; whereof he would gladly be clear'd. Presently after which, he sent the Earl of Surrey (Lieutenant of the Borders) commanding him to join with Marquis Dorset, (Warden of the East and middle Marches) and Lord Dacres Warden of the West Borders of Scotland. These Lords, having gather'd together convenient Forces, took Jedworth; and, making frequent Incursions, did great harm to that Country; without other intention yet (as the Scots have it) than to reduce that Nation to a better intelligence with England. Hereupon, the Duke of Albany, who was in France, prepares to return to Scotland. Our King, advertis'd hereof, sends out his Navy to intercept him. Sir William Fitzwilliams with 36 great Ships, cruising on the Coasts of France, and Anthony Pointz with a convenient Navy, guarding the Western Seas. While Fitzwilliams attended this occasion, he discover'd twelve French Ships, in which the Arch-Bishop of Glasgow and divers others of quality were, whom the Duke of Albany had sent before him into Scotland. Giving Chase to these, two of them were cast away near the Havens of Diepe and Boulogne. After which, Fitzwilliams, leaving part of his Fleet to shut up the French Ships, (which were

The Duke of Albany, knowing how narrowly he was watch'd by the English, had caus'd all provision for his return unto Scotland to be conceal'd, and made it to be rumor'd abroad, that he had no purpose to stir out of France this year: Which our King understanding, call'd home his Fleet. But it was no sooner in Harbour, than Albany halting together his Men and Ships, set sail at Brest; and, passing along the West Coast of England, landed in the Island of Arrain Sept. 24. to the great joy of the Scots, and with him came Richard de la Pole, and three thousand French. When Albany came, the minds of the Nobility were divided, some favour'd the English, some the French: It being disputed much before the coming of the Governor, to whether side it were best to adhere.

The Arguments of the English Party in Scotland for a League with England. The favourers of the English Party, which were many, alledg'd the conformity in Person, Manners, Language, and Laws betwixt the two Nations; their Living and Neighbourhood within the same Island; the Power the English had, not only to do more good or hurt, but sooner than the French could prevent them: That the English were Masters of the Seas, and thereby, able to stop, and interclude all succour that could come to them from any other place. Lastly, divers Letters were produc'd, written from our King to the Nobility of Scotland, wherein he did offer both to maintain Peace there, and to confirm it, by giving the Princess Mary his Daughter in Marriage unto James his Nephew, since he had vehement suspicions that Charles intended a March elsewhere.

Buch. The French Parties Answer. Those who favour'd the French (whereof many (saith the same Author) were gain'd with large Gifts, and Pensions, or were such, as, being of mean Fortune, desir'd to make their advantage in the publick Troubles) reply'd hereto, That credit was not easily to be given to the specious pretext of a new Alliance, the former having succeeded no better; especially, when all things in England were order'd chiefly Ex Arbitrio Thomae Woolsey Cardinalis pravi & ambiciosi, according to the Will of the ambitious and corrupt Cardinal Woolsey, (as Buchanan hath it.) That, the occasions of falling out betwixt potent Neighbours, being frequent; friends were to be fought out in any other place. Howsoever, their ancient Ally, (the French) was to be acquainted herewith, and no time to be lost for preparations to defend themselves.

These, though but cavils of the more tumultuous sort, being join'd to the rancor of others, prevail'd so with the heady Multitude, that, in the Parliament which the Governor summon'd as soon as he came to Scotland, it was presently resolv'd, that he should raise a puissant Army. These being gather'd, march to a Wooden Bridge over Twede, near Mul-Rosse, which leads to England; here the Duke pass'd over the greatest part of his Forces, intending the rest should follow; but because divers muttered against the causelessness and danger of this Attempt, he thought it his best Course, presently to bring them back again. Passing thence, he commanded Siege to be laid to the Castle of Werke, lately fortified by the Earl of Surrey. Some French here, that, serv'd on the Scotch side, found means to enter the outer Court, in which the Cattel and Corn of the Neighbour-hood in dangerous times were usually kept. But the English, using no other manner of Repulse, set fire only to the Hay and Straw there, and smoak'd out the French: Hereupon a Battery was planted against the Walls, and a sufficient breach made; wherewith an Assault was given by the French and others, but being beaten back with the loss of many, and the Earl of Surrey being with a great Army not far off, the Duke desisted and retir'd, doing no more with his Army for that year, shortly after which by the mediation of Queen Margaret, a Truce was concluded. And thus our King quit- ted himself of the troubles which Francis stirr'd against him, in Scotland. Let us now look on Ireland, for there also Francis had his Projects. And Tillet sets down a Treaty between Francis and James, Earl of Desmond in June 1523. But, as it took no effect, by reason of Francis his business in other parts, so it hasten'd the second troubles of the Earl of Kildare, who though he had freed himself of his Imprisonment in England, by the favour he got upon his Match with Elizabeth Gray, Sister to the Marquis Dorset, and so was remitted home to his former charge, (Pierce Butler being upon some Accusations put out) yet, being Kinman to Desmond, he could not so behave himself, but that his Enemies found Arguments to traduce him; but of this in its place.

While these things were doing, the Kingdom of Denmark suffer'd a great change. For Christiern the Second succeeding his Father John, Anno 1514. the Swedes not long after rebell'd, making Steno Stura their Head, who yet being slain in Battel, and the Swedes overcome, Christiern commands his Body to be taken up and burnt; which with other Cruelties, made the Swedes take Arms again, under Gustavus Erixon, whom they made their King, and separated themselves wholly, from the Crown of Denmark: Christiern having thus lost Sweden, and incurr'd the hate of the Danes by his Tyrannical Government, fearing Conspiracy at home, and War from abroad, left his Kingdom to be invaded and taken by his Uncle Frederick, Duke of Holst; (whom the Lubeckers aided in the Enterprize) and, flying together with Isabell, Sister to Charles the Emperor and his three Children, (one Son and two Daughters) as voluntary Exiles from their own Country, went first to Flanders, and from Flanders with a small Train came hither. This Misfortune yet did not hinder them from finding a reception worthy their Degree; our Queen, being Aunt to his, taking particular compassion on them. After all manner of Royal Entertainment, therefore, for the space of about three Weeks that they stay'd, and divers rich Presents bestow'd upon them, they thought fit, upon some hopes given them of recovering their Kingdom, to depart hence again into Flanders.

The Duke of Suffolk, being attended by the Lord Montacute, Lord Herbert, Lord Ferrers, Lord Morney, Lord Sands, Lord Berkley, Lord Powys, and divers other Knights and Gentlemen, and an Army of six hundred Demilances, two hundred Archers on Horseback, three thousand Archers on Foot, and five thousand Bill-men, besides two thousand and six hundred Prisoners came to Calais. To these again the Duke added one thousand and seven hundred more, taken out of the Garrisons thereabouts. With this little Army he march'd into the Enemies Country, taking all places that resisted him by the way. At last Florence d'Egmond Count de Bure General 1523. to the Emperor, joyn'd his Forces; so that in all they made about twenty thousand Men, yet as it was now about the latter end of September, and the weather prov'd very unseasonable, it was difficult to perform any great Action. King Henry yet would have them begin with Boulogne; but the Imperialists said it was impregnable, and that for entering France, it were better to coast the River of Soam, which they did, their design being to come to a Battel, as being advertis'd that the French had long since attended their coming. But finding no Forces in the Field, they belieg'd Bray on the River Soam. In this Town, Monsieur Antoine de Crequi, Seigneur de Pont-Dormy commanded, with a strong Garrison; but a breach being made by our Men, and violently assaulted, Antoine de Crequi, having set fire on the Town, fled over the Bridge, with the Men that remain'd, drawing some Boards after him; but our Men laying on other Planks, and getting over, chas'd him, and kill'd divers of his Men. When they return'd, they found little sav'd from the Fire, but some Cellars of Wine, which, in that cold and wet time, was a great Relief. From hence, passing over Soam, they march'd towards Roye, taking by the way some lesser places. This Town being summon'd, and promising to yield, Sir Richard Cornwall with four hundred Men was sent to take possession of it. Thence the Army march'd towards Montdidier, where by the way Monsieur de Pont-Dormy meeting with some of our Horse scatter'd, put them to the worst. But at last, more of our Men coming, his Horse was kill'd under him, and he, mounting on an other, was constrain'd to flee. Monsieur de Barniuelles and de-Canaples yet stood the Shock, to favour the retreat of the rest; which part while they perform'd bravely, our Men overthrew and took them Prisoners, with some others of Note. From hence then they went to Montdidier, in which Monsieur de Rochebaron, with about 1200 Men, commanded. But, after some four hours battery of our Cannon, they capitulated and yielded. The Duke with his Army had now pass'd the River of Oyse, and was come within eleven Leagues of Paris, without that he met with any notable Encounter. The Parisians hereupon were much troubled. Neither could the coming of Monsieur de Vendosme, with some Forces, exempt them altogether from fear. But the time of year being far spent, and the weather falling out to be so extream cold, that almost all the Corn in France was frozen and spoil'd that year, (as the French confess,) our Men were forc'd to return. Besides, the Lady Regent in the Low-Countries withdrew pay from her Soldiers, and let all the charge fall upon our King Henry.

It was not therefore misdoubt of any attempt of the French, (whatsoever they brag) they having no Army in the Field, but only the cause formerly alledg'd that made them retire. They took yet the Castle of Bouchain near the Emperor's Territories, before they departed, which yet together with the other places, was presently recover'd by the French. Our King, hearing now the Armies were dissolv'd, seem'd to be much incens'd: His intention being to keep and fortifie the places that were taken. Therefore he had commanded the Lord Montjoy with six thousand Men to reinforce the Troops. But, before the Kings pleasure could be certified to France, the Duke (who by reason of the foul ways left his great Ordnance in the Town of Valenciennes) was come, with the rest of his Army, to Calais; where he thought good to stay, till the Kings Anger were appeas'd, by the representing of those important and necessary Causes, that made him desist from any other Enterprize this year, wherewith therefore the King at last being intirely satisfied, he was receiv'd into his former grace and favour.

Francis finding now two of his Armies dissolv'd and ruin'd, resolves in Person to bring a third. For as he found his Auxiliaries more than the French Forces could command, and that, together, they had not their pay in due time, he intended now to remedy these faults. But this Voyage succeeded worst of all. So little can intervening Accidents, but especially those of War, be prevented by Human Wisdom. Being on his way now as far as Lyons, he hears three Armies were preparing against him; one on the part of our King, for Picardy; an other on the Emperors part, for Burgundy and Champaigne; and a third on the Spanish side for Fuentarabie. That on the English side yet astonish'd him most, as suspecting he had given our King enough to do in Scotland and Ireland. Therefore, he stay's at Lyons, and sends Bonivet before with the greatest part of his Forces, consisting of the flower of the Nobility of France; in which also Richard de la Pole (return'd now from Scotland) was; and reserves the rest for the most urgent occasions. Only, he wanted Charles Duke of Bourbon, whom I find so considerable a Person at this time, both with our King and the Emperor, as I have thought fit to speak of him, with much particularity. The causes of Discontentment (as the French Writers have it) were many.

That, having done ill Offices to Francis in the time of Louis XII. Francis challeng'd him to a Duel, (which unkindness yet, Francis coming to the Crown effaced by giving him the Place of Constable.)

That he was deny'd to have Renee, Sister to Queen Claude, when yet she desir'd to marry him.

That (as is before mention'd) the King gave the Vantguard from him, being Constable, to the Duke of Alencon.

That having lay'd out much Money for the Wars of Italy out of his purse, the King not only refus'd to pay him, but detain'd some Pensions and Rents, which were due to him for divers years.

That a Procefs or Law-Suit was brought against him, about the Dutchy of Bourbon, being inheritance devolv'd to him, in right of Susan his Wife lately dead.

That Louise the Kings Mother, persecuted him, because he refus'd to marry her, and was a Suitor to Renee.

That the Chancellor and others oppos'd him, for the sake of Louise, who was in greatest Authority.

These again being industriously fomented by Adrian de Croy, Seigneur de Beaurain, on the Emperors part, and William Knight, Doctor of the Law, Resident for our King with the Lady Margaret, and lastly by Sir John Russell, who in disguis'd Habit often treated with him, (as I find by our Records) made him finally Revolt. Neither did our King make difficulty to appear herein. Francis having not only supported Richard de la Pole, but treated with Desmond; so that finally, Conditions were agreed on with Bourbon, to this effect;

1523. That the Emperor should have Burgundy, and Artois, and our King Normandy and Guyenne, and the Title of King of France; and that, besides, he should renounce all the Claim the French pretend to Italy.

Francis Visits him. This yet was not kept so close, but some notice of it came to Francis, who thereupon with a singular freedom, did visit him, at Molins, fain- ing then to be Sick, and discover'd the Intelli- gence given him; promising yet that all should be forgotten upon his Confession, and assurance to serve him faithfully in his Wars; giving fur- thermore his Royal Word, that the Inheritance now in question should be restor'd, when it were by Law evicted. Bourbon thus surpris'd, and counterfeiting his weakness still, confess'd he was indeed fought to, but would never condescend to any Disloyalty. The King hereupon de- parted well satisfi'd in appearance; but as the Process or Law-suit went on, and some secret Guards were put on him; Bourbon, offended, escapes in a disguis'd Habit to Genoua: Whither the Seigneur de Beaurain came from the Emperor to offer him his choice, whether he would com- mand the Imperial Army in Italy, or come to Spain (where Charles had newly extinguish'd a Rebellion in Majorca, and given order to besiege Fuentarabie.) But Bourbon chose to command the Army, both as it was more generous, and as he did thereby comply best with both Princes; to whom he was oblig'd (as I find by our Records,) to furnish five hundred Men at Arms, and ten thousand Foot, for performing the Agreement betwixt them. But Francis had also other strong oppositions; for though he labour'd to retain the Venetians; yet as that State consider'd Italy would be quieter when Francisco Sforza held Milan, than if it came under the domination of the French, they easily abandoned Francis.

Aug. 3. A League against France. Whereupon a League was enter'd into, be- twixt the Pope, the Emperor, Ferdinand, Fran- cisco Sforza, Julio de Medicis, the Florentines, those of Siena, Lucca, and Genoua; and the Vene- tians; place being left also for our King; by which it was concluded, among other things, that the Venetians should furnish six thousand Foot, and one thousand two hundred Horse, when Francisco Sforza in Milan, or the Emperor in Na- ples, were invaded.

Aug. 11. That the Emperor should do as much for them, in the like case. All parts thus tending to War, Bonivet using much diligence, march'd strait to Milan, where Colonna had retir'd himself; the Army of the League being not yet joyn'd. But Galeazzo Vis- count of Milan, meeting and desiring him to stay, till he had rais'd a Tumult in the City (where- of he assur'd him in two or three days) Bonivet lost his opportunity; Colonna using that space to put the Town in such defence, as Bonivet re- tir'd. Yet so, as he forgot not to relieve the Castle of Cremona, the Garrison whereof was reduc'd only to eight Persons. Neither did he more of Importance (though Colonna now dy'd) but attended six thousand Grisons, and eight thou- sand Swisses; but as the Grisons, finding their passage seiz'd on, return'd; so the Swisses, be- cause they wanted only four hundred Horse to convoy them, (according to the Agreement made) refus'd to come to the French, when the Imperi- al Army, now united, was approaching. This made the French wade through the Water, to joyn with them. But Bourbon, and the Imperia- lists passing also, charg'd the French so, as Boni- vet being hurt escap'd, and the Count de Saint Poll and Bayard sustain'd the Shock. When Bay- ard having receiv'd a Mortal hurt, (whereof he dy'd, leaning on a Tree, with his face turn'd to the Enemy) all the Army was routed, and the Ordnance and Baggage taken. Whereupon also Alessandria, Rhodes, and other places were ren- dred. At Fuentarabie, Francis had no better for- tune. For Frauget Governor thereof, being de- sirous to save his Goods, yielded the place with- out much constraint, towards the end of Sept. 1523. for which he was degraded upon a Scaffold at Lyons publicly.

Notwithstanding all these Oppositions, yet Francis lost not his Native Courage, but proceed- ed in his design for Italy. For as he knew the Army of the League had different designs, he hop'd some occasion or other would disunite them; neither did it trouble him that Sforza was put in the possession of Milan: For he knew the Imperialists would hold a hand high and hard enough to disoblige him. Besides, he found that a design the Emperor had on Burgundy, fail'd, for want of Money to pay certain Lam- quenets, who thereupon were drawn to his Ser- vice.

Adrian's Death this while intervening, through Poyson, (as some have it,) Cardinal Woolsey hearing thereof, by a Letter dated 30 September 1523. adviseth the King hereof; adding fur- ther, that his not being at Rome, was the only obstacle that could hinder him from obtaining that Dignity. Yet, that he thought none there present would be Elected, by reason of the Fa- ction among them. Therefore he humbly in- treated his Highness, that, since heretofore he thought him worthy of that Charge, he would now assist him. This Letter also was seconded by an other, dated October the first, desiring the King to write with his own Hand to the Empe- ror, to this purpose. Notwithstanding all which endeavours, he being, about two Months after, inform'd that Julio de Medicis was made Pope, by the name of Clement the Seventh, thought fit, for justification of his Merit, to write again to our King, that the business was not yet so clear- ly carry'd, but that many of the Cardinals con- curr'd on him; though, by reason of his Ab- sence, and the dangerous state of Italy, (which requir'd present remedies,) they insist'd on the other. Whereupon it was thought fit by the King and Cardinal to send to John Clerk, now Bi- shop of Bath, Secretary Pace, and Thomas Annibal, Doctor of Law, and Master of the Rolls then Resident at Rome, a dispatch, requiring them to congratulate his Election, and together intreat him, not only to continue the disaffection he had ever shew'd to the French, but to give pub- lick Testimonies thereof according to the great- ness of that power which now was in him. The Cardinal, also by a particular dispatch, desir'd Richard Pace to procure, that his Legantine Pow- er might be amplified; protesting that, by rea- son of the Kings Prerogative, and other Causes, it was not a thousand Ducats yearly to him: Yet, if that his Authority and Faculties might be en- larg'd, that it should be thankfully acknowledg'd. All which Clement condescended unto, and the Legantine Power, which Adrian granted only from five years to five years; was now (by a new ex- ample) given him for term of Life, Jan. 9. 1524.

Thus had Woolsey (to comfort him for his re- pulse in Rome,) a kind of Papal Authority in England; whereof, also, he made the uttermost use. Though, while amongst other Visitations, he would needs visit the Freres Observants, he found himself resisted; which yet he could not take ill, the Pope having desir'd him particularly to spare them.

While these greater Exploits in France and Scotland pass'd thus, many brave Actions with small numbers were perform'd in the Confines of the English and French Pale, insomuch that a company of Adventurers there, nick-nam'd the Crackers, grew very famous thereby; till, being at last oppress'd by the Count Dan-martine, who with one thousand five hundred Horse and eight hundred Foot, assail'd them, being only one hundred seventy five Foot, and twenty five Horse, they took their end: which happen'd not yet till they had fought it out, to the last Man. The like feats also were done, between the Borders of England and Scotland on either side, some of which our Chroniclers particularly relate. But as these Wars in several Countries, drave the King to an excessive charge, so, in October this year, it was requir'd, from all Men worth forty pound, that the whole Subsidy, granted in Parliament, and payable in four years, should be anticipated, and brought to the King in one entire payment.

This the Commons imputed to the Cardinal, but he apprehended it not, as thinking his Ecclesiastical Dignity would ever prove a sufficient protection for him against the hate of the People. Therefore, he doubted not to be the Author of many rash Counsels, upon pretence only of furnishing the Kings Necessities; neither did he believe, that, when he had precipitated the Royal Authority to violent and dangerous Courses, himself should fall: As thinking his place in the Church so high, as would give him leave ever to look securely upon any ruin, some Arguments whereof appear'd in his design to build two Colledges, one at Oxford, the other at Ipswich (where he was born) at the price of throwing down certain Monasteries, and appropriating the Revenues thereof to this use. The design for the Colledge of Ipswich, was to erect only a Grammar School, to train up the youth till they were ready for the University; but that in Oxford (call'd first Cardinal's, then King's Colledge, now Christ's Church) was nobler; for the building was intended most ample and magnificent, (as the Foundations and first Lines demonstrate,) the number of Students, Professors, &c. great; as appears by a Catalogue found among our Records, and inserted here.

Besides whose Salaries, a considerable Sum of Money was yearly to be allowed, partly for keeping Hospitality, and entertaining Strangers; partly for Charity to be quarterly distributed: As also for Horses, Travelling Charges, and other Necessaries, which in so large a Family, cannot but be very many every day.

I find also, that about 1524, he sought in Italy and elsewhere, for able Men to be his Readers. Among whom at this time the Excellent John Ludovicus Vives (a Spaniard) was sent to him to be Professor of Eloquence in Oxford. And, for Books, he sent to have the rarer sort copy'd out of the Popes Library.

These so great Preparations, made the Cardinal use many rigorous means of getting Monies, as by visitation of Religious Houses, &c. and at last by the ruin of divers. To perform this yet, he was to obtain the consent of the Pope and his King. The Reasons represented to the Pope, were I suppose of this nature.

That his Holiness could not be ignorant what divers effects this new Invention of Printing had produc'd. For as it had brought in and restor'd Books and Learning, so together it hath been the occasion of those Sects and Schisms which daily appear'd in the World, but chiefly in Germany; where Men began now to call in question the present Faith and Tenents of the Church, and to examine how far Religion is departed from its Primitive Institution. And, that which particularly was most to be lamented, they had exhorted Lay and Ordinary Men to read the Scriptures, and to pray in their vulgar Tongue. That, if this were suffer'd, besides all other Dangers, the common People at last might come to believe that there was not so much use of the Clergy. For if Men were perswaded once they could make their own way to God, and that Prayers in their Native and Ordinary Language might pierce Heaven, as well as Latin; how much would the Authority of the Mass fall? How prejudicial might this prove unto all our Ecclesiastical Orders?

That there were many things to be look'd to in these Innovators, but nothing so much as this; since it was clear, that the keeping of the Mysteries of Religion in the hands of Priests, had been a principal means in all Ages, of making the Priesthood Sacred and Venerable. That these Mysteries and Rites therefore, as the greatest Secret and Arcanum of Church-Government, should be preserv'd. Nay, that the Clergy should rather fly to Tropes and Allegories, if not to Cabala

Religion should be kept a Mystery.

1523. Cabala it self, than permit that all the parts of Religious Worship, though so obvious, as to fall easily within common understandings, should be without their Explication; since it might be well question'd, whether the Essence of Religion, (consisting in the Doctrine of good Life and Repentance) might be held sufficient alone to exercise even the most vulgar Capacities; unless frequent Traditions concerning former times, and such obscure passages as need Interpretation, did concur. In which state of things therefore, nothing remain'd so much to be done, as to prevent further Apostacy. For this purpose, since Printing could not be put down, it were best to set up Learning against Learning; and, by introducing able Persons to dispute, to suspend the Layity, betwixt Fear and Controversies. This, at worst yet, would make them attentive to their Superiors and Teachers. All which being maturely weigh'd by his Holiness, it was not doubted but he would advise, and commend to all Christian Princes, the erecting of new Colledges and Seminaries for the advancement of Learning; and here in England particularly, where many favourers of Luthers Sect, but especially of Zuinglius, did appear. Yet because his Holiness by our Ambassadors at Rome, had divers times been inform'd of the great expences of his King in the Wars he had made with France and Scotland, he did not think it the best course to desire any Money out of his Purse. That therefore he had thought of another expedient; which he humbly offer'd to his Holiness; which was, that in regard the number of Monasteries was greater in this Kingdom, than that there could be found Learned Men to supply them; that it were not amiss to diminish the one a little, to increase the other. That as this would take away the objection of Ignorance, where-with the new Seſtaries in Germany had so much branded the Clergy, so it would furnish able Persons to resist their Doctrine, and uphold the Credit and Reputation of the Roman Church. Therefore he would be an humble suppliant to his Holiness, to give him leave to throw down a few superfluous Monasteries, and to imploy the Revenues of them to the building of two Colledges; one at Oxford, th' other at Ipswich; and to believe, that all things being rightly considered, the fall of those few, might be a means to keep up the rest, especially since, in this Kingdom the number of them was thought excessive.

Reasons for suppressing them to the King.

To the King; as he needed not to use those Motives, so he discreetly conceal'd such as might discover the secrets of Ecclesiastical Government. For certainly, what fault soever might be objected to the Cardinal, he seem'd still a devout Servant to his Religion, as aspiring thereby unto the Papacy. Therefore, he said little more unto the King, than that it was fit so learned a Prince should advance Learning, and maintain that Faith, whereof the Pope had made him the Defender. For this purpose, he should advise him to found more Colledges. Yet because his Wars and other Occasions had so exhausted his Treasury, he would ask no more, than that the care thereof should be committed to him; who, if his Holiness so thought fit, would only suppress some little and unnecessary Monasteries, and imploy the Revenues to this use. King Henry also considering, that if, for his urgent Occasions, he were necessitated at any time to seize on the other Religious Houses, he might this way discover how the People would take it, grants his Request. Our King thus concurring with the Pope, who, in favour of the Cardinal gave way to this Suppression, that Overture was first made,

K Henry approves of it as a good Example for him. The Pope consents to it.

1524. which being pursu'd afterwards by the Kings sole Authority, became the final ruin of all Monasteries.

Clement the Seventh hearing of the preparations of these great Princes, had sent in the beginning of this year an express Legat, which was an Archbishop of Capua, with Instructions to procure an Union betwixt them against the Turk. He had already been with Francis and the Emperor, without effecting any thing; and was now come to our King; but finding the same difficulties, he was forc'd to return, without other satisfaction, than a particular of the Demands by our King made, and the Reasons of them; which our Cardinal promis'd also to certify unto the Pope. Therefore, in a particular dispatch to Rome, he wish'd our Agents there, to shew an inclination to Peace; reserving, nevertheless, one ear open to the exploits of Bourbon; whose prosperous success in France (he said) might be such as to alter the case. Howsoever, that the place of the Treaty might be Calais, whither himself offered to come in Person.

This while (in the beginning of this year) the Princes of Germany held a Diet at Noremburg, whither Clement (the new Pope) sent as Legate Cardinal Campegius; much complaining of their Peſtula or Gravamina the last year, since many Points in it smelt of Heresy. About April also the Emperor from Spain sends to the Princes at the Diet, desiring them to see the Decree made at Worms against Luther (1521.) to be observ'd. (Thus to comply with the Pope it seems, whom he desir'd to retain on his side against Francis.) The Princes nevertheless at the conclusion of this Diet, made a Decree, that as soon as might be, the Pope by the consent of the Emperor should call a Council in Germany; and, in the meantime, things to be ripen'd for a peace in Religion, &c. This second urging of a Council (for it was press'd also the last year to Adrian) provok'd much Pope Clement; who, knowing our Kings zeal to the Roman See, and particular hate of Luther, sent a Letter to King Henry, complaining of this behaviour of the Princes of Germany; and to win our King the more, he sent him a Rose of Gold, (consecrated and curiously wrought) by Thomas Hannibal, (who now return'd) as also a Bull, seal'd with Gold (Dat. tertio Non. Martii) for Confirmation of his Title of Defensor Fidei.

In the mean time, by frequent dispatches, the Cardinal, in our Kings Name, urg'd Bourbon to undertake his Expedition into France; to which purpose our King was to allow him an hundred thousand Crowns a Month. Bourbon, on the other side, requir'd that our King, or his Lieutenant, should at the same time enter Picardy with an Army; which was promis'd. When (having giv'n Oath to acknowledge Henry the Eighth King of France) he advanceth towards Provence, June 24. (on the Emperors part Monsieur de Beauvain attending him; and on our Kings, Richard Pace;) and in the beginning of July enters France; where, proclaiming liberty to the Common People who willingly came in, he took divers Towns. Nevertheless, his course was staid. For, although he had a Fleet of the Emperors to second him, coasting along the Shoar, to bring Victuals to the Army: Yet the French Navy being too strong, kept them off, and so intercepted their Provision. The supplies also of Money to be sent him by the Emperor and King of England were slackned; for each of these Princes fear'd lest the other should reap the fruit of this Expedition; and Charles de la Noy the Viceroy of Naples was thought, besides, to be willing that Bourbon should be repuls'd, as one whom he envy'd for being made Lieutenant in his

 Aug. 19. to Marseilles, but in vain; for it being stoutly defended by Renzo de Ceri, and Philip Chabot, Francis also with a great power coming to relieve it, at the same time Bourbons Soldiers mutined Heretires for want of pay, (although Sir John Russel had newly brought twenty thousand pound Sterling Sept. 27. from our King;) the Siege broke up, and the Duke embarking his Cannon, retir'd to Genoia with some loss, the Prince of Aurange being taken Prisoner there.

Octob. It was now mid-October, and a season, in all probability, not to begin any great Enterprize.
 Nevertheless Francis who had left Claude his Wife July in July last, and left Louise his Mother Regent of France during his absence, pursu'd his design to conquer Milan; contrary to the advice of the Pope (who perswaded Peace) and of his Counsellors; (who at least advis'd him not to go in Person.) Charles de la Noy hearing this, puts An-

Francis I. tonio de Leyva in Pavia, with twelve thousand Span- his Expe- iards, and six thousand Lansquenets; and with the dition in- rest of his Army hastens to Milan. But as he to Italy.

The French enter Mi- lani. Francis being presently inform'd hereof, advances his Army; yet so, as according to an ancient Military Rule, he would not leave so strong a place as Pavia behind him. But the observing hereof cost him dear. While he laid siege to Pavia; the Imperialists were but in an ill Estate; the Pope at most standing as Neuter; the Florentines friends but in appearance only;
 the Venetians excusing themselves, as suspecting the Emperor, in that he would not sign the Investiture of Milan to Francisco Sforza; and our King, instead of giving more Money, requiring that which was due to him, (being 133000 Crowns yearly, in regard of the Pension withheld by Francis;) which yet being refus'd by Charles made him averse. Besides, he consider'd the designs of the Emperor were only on Italy.
Francis on the other side had a flourishing Army, consisting of about thirty thousand, whereof yet the most part were Mercenaries and Volunteers; and therefore particularly mention'd by me, as not remembring to have read in any History, that so many of this kind (being irregular and properly under no command) should be admitted to the hazard of disordering a whole Army. And for the other part, being Mercenaries, he had found them slow, wilfull, of small trust, and oftentimes venal; though it cannot be deny'd, that those whom Francis in particular now us'd, have been reputed in all times a valiant constant Nation. All which I have the rather observ'd, that the success which Francis had not long after, might seem less strange unto the Reader. The Nobility that came with him were indeed principal Persons, Henry d'Al- bret, (the Titular King of Navarre) the Dukes of Lorain, Longue-ville, Alencon and Albanie, (who the Spring before had left Scotland, upon promise made him by the Nobility, that nothing should be innovated there, till his return) The Counts of St. Paul, Vaudemont, Laval, the Marshals of Foix, Chabanes, and Montmorency, the Admiral de Bonivet (chief Author of this Counsel) le Seigneur de Fleuranges, le Vidame de Chartres, Buissy d'Ambois, Richard de la Pole, and many other brave Gentlemen.

Novem. The manner which Francis us'd in besieging Pavia, seem'd to take up more time than stood 1524. with the Season, (being now Winter) and the advantage he had over the Imperialists, who were neither in number nor vertue sufficient to repel him. This leasure the Pope made use of to mediate a Peace, by the means of the Bishop of Verona, and (when that could not be done) to keep Francis yet in good terms with him, promising him, therefore indifferency at least, both as he was Communis Pater, and as he conceiv'd him the stronger. But, finding that the Treaty of Accord took no effect, was perswaded by the French Ambassadors (Resident with him) to make a League with Francis. The perswasions the French us'd, were Promises, and certain Propositions of Peace, upon such Conditions as should be very advantageous to both.

 And thus at last the Pope by the secret intervention of Jo. Matthei the Bishop of Verona, made Peace with the French, encouraging them together (saith Bellay) to attempt Naples, which yet the Pope dissembled strenuously, both with our Kings and the Emperors Agents; though, when he could hide it no longer, he pretended he was forc'd to it by the French. Yet, it may be the Pope was not a little inclin'd hereunto by a Message which came from England; for I find in our Records, that not long after the time that Francis pass'd into Italy, there came from France into England, on Louise the Regents part, one John Joachin, a Genouese, whose coming (as things then stood) was much suspected by the Imperialists. And the more, that he kept himself close, and repair'd every day to the Cardinal, and consulted with him only; but so much was dis-cover'd as the Popes Agent here, by a Letter, advis'd his Holiness to make Peace with Francis in time; which the Pope did (although to his loss, as will appear in its place.) And now Francis, not fearing the Imperialists, sends the Duke of Albany, with Renzo de Ceri, and about twelve thousand Men, against them of Lucca and Siena, for the Popes Service; and after, to attempt Naples, where all the places were unpro-vided of sufficient Garrison. Besides, he had sent the Marquis de Saluces with four thousand Men to Savona, from thence to attempt Genoia.
 Again, three thousand Italians (their Commander Genovanni de Medicis being hurt) disbanded, and six thousand Grisons, hearing of some troubles in their Country, return'd; so that his Forces were much weaken'd. Which Charles de la Noy understanding, took the less care to defend Naples; as believing the French unable to second the Duke of Albany. And, therefore, gave order only to the Duke of Trajetto to defend the Country the best he could; while Bourbon, pawning his Jewels to the Duke of Savoy, went to Germany, and rais'd twelve thousand Men.

During these passages in Italy, the affairs of Scotland seem'd to change form; for the Duke of Albany being now so far distant from them, the prime Nobility of Scotland (notwithstanding the promise exacted of them by the said Duke, when he departed, (which was in May 1524,) promising to return in September next) May-inclin'd to the Queen's side. So that presently after they began to consult of making peace with England; which because they knew King Henry would never grant, as long as they acknowledg'd the Duke of Albany Governor, (for so he had lately intimated) they agreed to abrogate his Authority, and to invest the young King in the exercise of his Regal Power. To this purpose, the Queen of Scots wrote to her Brother King Henry to assist his Nephew herein; who sent to the Borders his Lieutenant, Thomas late Earl of Surrey, now (since his Fathers *Death much lamented, for his great Vertue) Duke of Norfolk,

1524. Norfolk, and the Treasurer of England, to procure the liberty of the young King. Hereupon the Queen, assisted by the Earls of Arran, Lenox, and divers of the chief Nobility, brought the young King from Sterling (where the Governor had appointed him to reside till his return) to Edendurgh, where he undertook the Administration of the Kingdom, July 29. whereupon Allegiance was sworn to him, and the Duke of Albany was Excommunicate; yet not with so general a Vote, but that the two Bishops of St. Andrews and Aberdeen disslik'd it; alledging both the Non-age of the King, and the Promise of the Nobility to the Governor, of not Innovating till September. Upon this they are both confin'd, but shortly restor'd to their Liberty. Our King soon after sent Ambassadors, Thomas Magnus (a Civil Lawyer and a Priest,) and Rattcliffe (a Gentleman) to reside in Scotland; commanding from thenceforth all Hostility to cease. Whereupon a Truce was taken, during which the Scotch Ambassadors were to be sent into England, for the concluding of a firm Peace. Also (for establishing the young King's Power) he offer'd to maintain (a while) a Guard for him of two hundred Persons. But this good Correspondence was a little clouded; for while these things were in hand, the Earl of Angus and his Brother George Douglas formerly Banish'd (as we have shew'd) into France, found means to escape into England. The Earl desir'd our Kings aid, for his Restitution; but the Queen of Scots, who retain'd her old grudge to him, and (perchance) had newly cast an eye on Henry Stewart, (whom afterwards she marry'd) labour'd the contrary; reimonstrating to our King, by divers Letters, that his coming to Scotland at this time would trouble the State. For the Earl of Arran, whose Power and Reputation was great, being Enemy to the said Angus, she said would oppose him; but our King suspecting by some Actions that Arran was French, suffer'd about October the Earl to enter Scotland, to counterpoise him; taking of him at his departure, a Promise or Obligation; 1. To procure and maintain the young Kings Authority, to the exclusion of the Duke of Albany. 2. To seek to be reconcil'd to the Queen with all Humility. 3. To make friendship with Arran, as long as he maintains the the young King, and averts him from France; whereupon also our King promis'd, that if he did contrary, he would maintain Angus against the said Arran, &c. Thus was Angus restor'd to his Country for a while; but the Queen took it ill that he was come, and the Ambassadors appointed to be sent to King Henry for Peace, were in danger to be staid; yet I find that December 19. they came, being Gilbert Kenneth Earl of Cassilis, &c. and intreated Peace, and the Princess Mary as Wife for their King. Our King gave hope of both; (for I find that both the Emperor and Francis made overtures of Matches for King James at this time.) Howbeit, when our Commissioners in private conference treated of Peace, and the Princess, it was upon these Conditions, 1. That they should renounce the League with France, and instead thereof make the like with England. 2. That the young King till he be ripe for Marriage, shall be brought up in England. It seems yet the Scotch Ambassadors Commission was not large enough to treat these Points; so Decemb. 30. Cassilis (leaving his fellows here) goes to Scotland; and shortly after (March 19.) returns to King Henry with the resolution of the Nobility, and Letters from Queen Margaret, shewing, that the Lords of Scotland will be content to relinquish the French, so that the Match with the Princess Mary may be made sure; but they required that the Promise, whereby she was engag'd to the Emperor, be first discharg'd. Our King hearing this, said he would confer with the Emperor about it; and so nothing being concluded, but a Truce for three years and a half, the Scotch Ambassadors departed in April.

The Emperor hearing of this Treaty, dispatched hither Adolpho de Borgona, Senior de Beures Adm. of Flanders, with the Presid. of Malmes to require that the Princess Mary might be delivered to him, promising hereupon to declare her Empress, and make her Governess of the Low Countries; her Dower also was requir'd to be paid presently, and that our King in Person would the next year invade France. But before our King could give a perfect Answer to these Particulars, News was brought of the Battel of Pavia, and the taking of Francis Prisoner, the manner whereof was thus.

Pavia was a place easie enough to take, had either the French press'd it roundly, or a less valiant Captain than Antonio de Leyva defended it. But while Francis, as being confident he was Master of the Field, drew the Siege out in length, he gave not only time to the Imperialists to join an Army, but at last fail'd miserably in his Enterprize. The Advice he approv'd, after a Breach and Assault made in vain, was to open a way to the Town, on the one side of the Tescin; for, as that River divided it self into two Channels, whereof one pass'd by the Walls, (which had no defence on that part, but the River, being not fordable) his intention was to divert this Current, and so to leave the Walls bare. But one rainy Night alone so swell'd the River, that all the Damms and Works which the French had rais'd, were carry'd away by the violence of the Stream. His ablest Counsellors hereupon wish'd him to raise the Siege, and give place to the Season. Besides, as the Imperialists, with a great Army, were now marching towards him, they thought it not fit he should be enclos'd betwixt the Town, (wherein was a strong Garrison,) and the Forces now approaching. It was the even of Saint Matthias in February 1525. (being the day of the Emperor's Nativity) when the Marquis de Gualto leading the Vantguard, the Marquis of Pescara the Battail, and Charles de la Noy, accompany'd with Bourbon, the Rereward, came in good order near the French Army. Their Resolution was to weary the French all Night with Alarms and Skirmishes, and towards Morning to fall on them with the whole Army; so that nothing of Importance was intended till full Day-light; when Francis, pointing his Ordnance against them, so pierc'd their Squadrons, that they were forc'd to retire to a more covert place. Francis, thinking this was a Flight, draws his Army out of his strong Intrenchments into an open place, with intention to pursue them. The Commanders of the Imperialists having thus obtain'd what they desir'd (for they wanted both Money and Victuals to subsist any long time,) encourag'd their Soldiers to fight, telling them, that though a King was present, there was not therefore more danger, but more Honours and Riches propos'd to them. That they should but follow their Commanders, who would lead them to an assur'd Victory. The Soldiers hereupon (being not ignorant of the necessity they were in,) resolutely promis'd to go on. The Marquis of Pescara having advanc'd a little to discover the Enemy, return'd; and, with a chearful Countenance, turning towards the Spaniards, told them that he must not conceal from them the cruel command the French King had given, that no Spaniard should be receiv'd into mercy. This being a meer Invention of the 1525. the Marquiss To kindled their Courage that they requir'd the Signal, promising for the rest, to sell their Lives as dear as they could. Herewith then a furious Battel began; in which yet because the Mercenaries, and especially the Swiss, did not shew their accustom'd Valour, all the charge fell on the few French that were present. None yet fought more bravely among them, than the King; insomuch that with his own hand (as his Enemies did afterwards confess) he kill'd the Marquiss of Civita de St. Angelo; which Example so encourag'd the rest of his Nobility, as they omitted nothing that could be done in so little number. During this brunt, Antonio de Leyva, throwing down some part of the Walls of Pavia, issued forth with the best of his Garrison, and fell on the backs of the French then fighting. This wholly routed the Army, insomuch that all now began to fly. The King had his Horse kill'd under him, whose fall so engag'd his Leg, that he could not recover himself. In this posture one Juan de Urbieto, a Guipuscoan, seiz'd on him. But the King declaring himself, and saying he yielded to the Emperor, Urbieto without offering any Violence, receiv'd him as his Prisoner. The Kings Leg yet lay under his Horse; Urbieto thinking by this means he was sure from escaping, runs to succour his Alferes, who was then in danger of being kill'd, desiring the King only to take notice that he wanted two Teeth before, and that he would remember it as a mark that he took him first. With that one Diego de Avila came, to whom the King also naming himself, and saying he was already yielded to the Emperor, Diego demanded, whether he had given any Gage thereof? The King saying, None was required, Diego laid hold on his Sword, (which was bloody) and his Gauntlet, and therewithal deliver'd him from his Horse, by the help of one Pita, who for his pains took his Order of St. Michael from him. This so much troubled the King, that, not knowing how to help himself, he offer'd a great reward to the Soldier to let it alone, which yet the Soldier deny'd, saying he would carry it to the Emperor. The King being now on foot, divers Soldiers came in, and as they observ'd some Contention among those that took him, would without further enquiry who he was, have kill'd him. But one Monsieur de la Motte (or Pemperante, as the French have it, a French-man) coming by chance thither, kneel'd to him, and kissing his Hand with all Reverence, made them know how rich a prize they had got amongst them; the King yet caus'd him to rise, saying only, that he should behave himself like that Man he had ever esteem'd him. Herewith, a great concourse flocking in, the King was perswaded to take off his Helmet, which was no sooner done, but every one took a part of a great Pennache (or Feather) he wore thereon; others more presumptuously, cut pieces out of a Coat of Arms or Sobreveste he wore over his Harness. At all which this magnanimous King shew'd no other Countenance, than that of Scorn, as knowing sufficiently, that in despite of Fortune, his Valour had made him comply with his Dignity. The chance of those who deserted the King was various; many were kill'd, others, thinking to pass the Tessin, were drown'd, among whom six thousand Mercenaries (the most part Swiss) are accounted. Henry de Albret, thinking to save himself by Flight, was taken. And now the report being general that the King was made Prisoner, divers French, who might have escap'd, out of a singular piety to their King, returned, and yielded themselves, saying, they would not return to France, and leave their King behind them. The first of the chief Commanders that came in,

was the Marquiss de Pescara; after him, Guasto, 1525. and others; at last Bourbon being Arm'd Cap a Pe, and with his Sword all bloody in his Hand, comes towards the King, who hereupon demanded his Name: Being told, he stept (if one may believe the Spaniard my Author) a little behind the Marquiss de Pescara. He also perceiving the King troubled, goes to Bourbon, and (after he had told him that the King was there) demanded his Sword; which Bourbon without more ado rendred, and thereupon, running to the King, and lifting up his Beaver, cast himself on his Knees, and humbly demanded his Royal Hand to kiss; which yet the King refus'd. Hereupon Bourbon, with tears in his Eyes, said, Sir, if you would have followed my Council, you should not have needed to be in this Estate, nor so much blood of the French Nobility shed as stains the Fields of Italy. The King hereupon turning his eyes to Heaven, now reply'd only, Patience, since Fortune hath fail'd me. Further Discourse was hindered by the Marquiss of Pescara, who, desiring the King to mount on Horse-back, conducted him towards Pavia. But the King intreating he might not be kept Prisoner in a Town before which he had lately so puissant Army, they brought him to a Monastery adjoining. Henry de Albret, the Comte of St. Paul, and divers other Prisoners being deliver'd to several Custodies. From hence the King was remov'd to a strong Castle call'd Picquigon, and there kept with a great Guard of Spaniards under Hernando de Alancón, till other order came from Charles; to whom, immediately after this Victory, a Messenger was sent, to acquaint him with the Success. In the mean time Francis was us'd with all respect. For more ostentation whereof, Charles de la Noy brought (before Supper) the Basen, the Marquiss of Guasto the Ewer, and Bourbon the Towel; which courtesie he requited, by inviting them to sit at the Table with him. After which, requiring some Money might be furnish'd to him for play, he pass'd away the time the most cheerfully he could.

Charles was at Madrid when this great News came to him. The fence he shew'd of it, was such as became a wise Prince, and one that was not himself exempted from a Quartan. He compar'd the afflictions of Fortune with those of Nature, and found the difference so little, that he thought himself to want even the advantages of Liberty as much as a Prisoner. For, if he consider'd Francis as in the custody of his Guards, he lookt upon himself as in the custody of his Physicians, and confin'd to his Chamber by a stronger hand than that which held Francis. Moreover, he said, it was not for Christians to rejoice for their Victories against each other, but only against Infidels.

Our King was not advertis'd hereof sooner than the Ninth of March. When a Messenger from the Princess Margarite, Governess of the Low-Countries, inform'd him of all the Particulars. Charles de la Noy not omitting also to write to him thereof (as I find by our Records.) This being brought to Council, it was thought fit the King should comply with his Confederate Charles, in giving some publick Demonstration of Joy. Therefore the King going to St. Pauls, and causing a Mass to be sung in a more solemn manner than ordinary, seem'd to celebrate the Victory, though inwardly not so well satisfy'd thereof. For, as he consider'd Charles grown now to more Greatness than stood either with reason of State, or due terms of Neighbourhood, he deliberated with his Council what was next to be done. Whereupon it was thought fit to send immediately Ambassadors into Spain, with with charge to represent unto the Emperor, how that this War being made at a Common charge, it was reasonable the fruit should redound to both. That the part his Highness pretended to, was Inheritance in France, which he desir'd (upon some fitting Treaty with Francis) might be restor'd. To which his Highness doubted not but the Emperor would afford his best Assistance; as well because it was just in it self, as that it was according to their late Treaty. Or, if this could not be obtain'd by fair means, to require the Emperor, by vertue of the said Treaty, to proceed in levying Forces to make War in France, wherein his Highness would likewise concur. Neither could his Highness doubt that the Emperor would refuse to embrace this Motion, since the benefit hereof would finally accrue to him; for as his Highness was purpos'd to ratifie and make good the intended Match betwixt the said Emperor and the Princess Mary, who was Heir not only to the Crown of England, but to his Titles in France, so all at last would devolve on him; which therefore might be thought so beneficial and advantageous, as he ought not to think it much to deliver up Francis to his Highness hands, upon consigning of the said Princess to his. Especially, since by an expresse Article of the foresaid Treaty, they were bound mutually to deliver all Usurpers upon each others Right. All which being founded upon a solemn Agreement, confirm'd by Oath, could not seem Insolent, what Indisposition soever might be found in the Emperor to accomplish it. Notwithstanding which, if (as it was most likely) this Proposition should take no effect, and that the Emperor would derive the total benefit of his prize upon himself; that his Highness yet might make so much use thereof, as with more justification to take that order which pertain'd to his present occasions, and the peace of Christendom. This Advice being approv'd by all, a Dispatch was made, and given to Cuthbert Tenshal (Bishop of London, and Lord Privy Seal) and Sir Richard Wingfield Knight, sent then to Spain; wherein also an Interview betwixt our King and the Emperor was propos'd. In which further it was offer'd, that the Princess Mary should be given into the Emperors hands upon fitting Conditions. Many other Particularities conducing to the ends above-mentioned were specified therein; though for the rest it seem'd not probable to some of our Councillors, that the Emperor would accept them, as being resolv'd (what Promise or Advantages soever was presented to him) to suffer none else to partake of the Profit or Honour he had acquir'd in his Victory. This Proposition finding no reception in Spain, but what was before imagin'd, our King returns to that brave and wise Resolution he had formerly taken, to make himself Arbitrer of Christendom, and to fall on him who interrupted the publick Peace. Many reasons also of great moment concurr'd to this Resolution. For the Lady Margarine (Regent of Flanders) who ought by the late League to have rais'd Forces against the French, began already to treat with them concerning an Accommodation. Besides, the Flemings being grown strong by Sea, had not only very insolently treated with divers of our Merchants; but, contrary to a Remonstrance made in that behalf, had rais'd the value of our Coin, and thereby secretly deriv'd great Sums into their Country. Again, when demand was made only for re-payment of that Money which was lent to the Emperor in his greatest necessity, nothing yet was return'd but a dilatory and frivolous excuse. Neither was our King ignorant of the Treaty which the Emperor had already begun for the ransoming of Francis. Nor of a Match purpos'd with Donna Isabella of Portugal; which reflected on his Daughters Reputation. Lastly, the Popes Breve, representing the danger of Christendom through the prosperity of the Turk, (who had now taken Belgrade, and Rhodes, and thereby open'd several ways to Italy and Germany) and, together, exhorting all Christian Princes to join against the Common Enemy, had so prevail'd with our King, that he thought fit to lay aside all Ambition to recover his Inheritance in France, and to endeavour an Universal Peace. In the furtherance of which good desire, as the remembrance of the kind Interview betwixt him and Francis did operate not a little, so the Reputation that Francis had gotten by his courage shew'd in this late Action, had kindled in the mind of our generous King a compassionate zeal for his Delivery. Therefore, at the request of the Kings Mother of France, (who by the mediation of Giovanni Joakim had much dispos'd our King to return to his ancient friendship with Francis) he sent to Cuthbert Tenshal Bishop of London, and Sir Richard Wingfield Knight, his Ambassadors in Spain, to intercede for the delivery of Francis; who had begun the way already in a particular Letter to Charles; where, after an excuse of his not sooner Writing, because they who had charge of him, would not permit it, he said, that the greatest Comfort he found in this his miserable Condition, was, that he had fallen into the hands of so generous a Prince, who therefore would not force him to anything, which might be unjust to require, or impossible to perform. That he hop'd therefore sufficient security would be accepted for his Delivery, since thereby, instead of detaining an unuseful Prisoner, he should make a King his Slave. Howsoever, that it was more profit to have him a faithful friend, than to suffer him to die desperate. None yet was so vigilant and intente either for his Delivery, or the general good of the Kingdom, as Madam Louise his Mother (Regent of France) who, by many forcible and reiterated Ambassies and Treaties, drew most of the Christian Potentates, and Republicks to favour the deliverance of her Son. Thro' her care also Andrea Doria (General of the French King's Gallies) re-conducted the Duke of Albany, who, though far engag'd in the Enemies Country, did yet, without any considerable loss of his Men, return to Marseilles, April 25.

The Emperor now finding that all the chief Princes and Estates in Christendom would puissantly labour for the delivery of Francis, sent Adrian de Croy Seigneur de Beaurain, with certain Propositions dated March 25. 1525. unto him. Whereof this is the Sum.

That an universal Peace and League should be concluded betwixt all Christian Princes, and security on every side be given, for the continuance thereof.

That either of them two, with twenty thousand Foot, and five thousand Horse should invade the Turk.

That, for further security, the Dauphin should marry with the Princess Maria (Daughter to the King of Portugal and the Queen Leonora) and the Dowry should be a mutual disclaim in each others Inheritance.

That the King of France should restore and leave the Dutchy of Burgundy in that estate and manner as it was in the time of Charles the last Duke thereof; and Theroüene, Hesdin, and all that was usurp'd in Artois should be re-deliver'd.

That Charles Duke of Bourbon should be restor'd to his former Estate; and (particularly) have the County of Provence conferr'd upon him, which thereupon he should hold under the Title of King thereof.

1525. That the King of England should have all restor'd that appertain'd to him, or otherwise was agreed upon.

That all followers of the Duke of Bourbon should be reintegrated in their former possessions.

That the Prince of Aurange, Don Hugo de Moncada, the Seigneur de Bonze, and d' Antroy, should be set at liberty, and all restor'd to the Prince of Aurange, which was taken from him in the Wars of Bretagne.

That Madam Margerite, Aunt to the Emperor, and La Reyna Germana, second Wife to Ferdinand of Spain, with divers other Princes and great Persons, (particularly nominated in the said Articles) should be righted in their just demands, for restitution in all things taken since the War.

That all Commerce betwixt the Subjects should be renew'd hereupon.

That the chief Parliaments of Paris and elsewhere in France, should ratifie the Agreement.

That the King himself, being at liberty, should with all due Solemnity, confirm it, as also the Dauphin as soon as he came to the age of fourteen.

When these Articles were presented to Francis, some of them so displeas'd him, that he is said in a fury to have drawn his Dagger, and spoken these words, It is better for a King of France to die after this manner. Infomuch that Hernando de Alancón who was present, hastily took it from him. Yet, to gratifie the Emperor, he gave order that the Prince of Aurange, and Don Hugo de Moncada should be set at liberty. Moncada coming to Court, brought two Letters, one from the King, the other from Madam Louise, his Mother, by which (as also by the intervention of the Archbishop of Embrun, and Philip Chabot Seigneur de Brion, and others who were deputed Ambassadors upon this occasion) these Conditions following were offer'd.

Conditions of Peace offer'd by Francis.

That Donna Leonora (Sister to the Emperor, and Relict to the late King of Portugal) should not be given in Marriage to Bourbon, (howsoever promis'd him) but to the King of France, and the Infanta Donna Maria, her Daughter, unto the Dauphin.

That the Dukedom of Burgundy should be held by Francis, as the Dowry to the Queen Leonora, and should be left to the Heirs Males betwixt them. If no such Issue yet should happen, that the Dukedom should then descend to the second Son of the said Emperor; if the Emperor should have no Sons, but Daughters, that then the second Son of the King of France should marry one of the said Daughters, and have Burgundy for her Portion.

That Francis would renounce all the Right and Interest he had in Milan, Genouia, and Naples, together with all Debts and Pensions that could be demanded on that occasion.

That he would release the Superiority and Dominion that he pretended over Flanders, and Artois, and for this purpose would obtain the consent of all the Estates of France.

That he would restore Hesdin and Tournay.

That, for the Lands he held near the River of Soam, he would pay the Emperor a just price.

That, when the Emperor should go to his Coronation into Italy; or otherwise, that if he or his Brother Ferdinand should make War, he would pay half the charges of his Army, and go along in Person.

That, if the Emperor would pass into Italy by Sea, he would command all his Gallies and other Shipping to attend him at Barcellona.

That, if the Emperor would make War against the Infidels in Africa, or Greece, he would pay half the charges of the Army, and attend the Emperor in Person.

That all the Emperor had Capitulated with the King of England, and all that was due by way of borrowing or Pension to the said King, should be paid and accomplish'd, in such manner that the Emperor might be altogether discharg'd, and free thereof.

That he would restore to the Duke of Bourbon, all his Estate, and pay him his Pensions, and moreover give his Daughter in Marriage to him, together with such a Portion as was fitting her Degree and Quality, and that when any Army should be rais'd by him for the Emperors Service, the said Duke should be General, in case the King went not himself in Person, and that all former Services, and unkindnesses should be forgotten.

That sufficient security by the Parliament of Paris should be given of these Particularities.

Upon mature Deliberation taken concerning these Propositions, the Emperor reply'd, that the The Em-Dutchy of Burgundy was his Inheritance, and there- perors An-fore not to be dispos'd of, or alienated according to any swer.
Mans fancy or abtirement. Concerning the Marriage propos'd between Francis and Leonora his Sister; that he could resolve nothing without the consent of Bourbon, to whom she was promis'd. That for the busineses of Italy, he would innovate nothing, but rather keep all quiet. As for Naples, since Francis had no right thereunto, there was no occasion to make use of his disclaimer. That it would content him much to have Burgundy restor'd in the same manner that his great Grand-Father Charles enjoy'd it. And that he accepted well of his Shipping, when he would think fit to go and receive his Crown in Italy. The French on the other side instead of Burgundy, offer'd great Sums of Money; but Charles insisting still upon Burgundy, nothing was concluded. So that, leaving Madrid, the Emperor went to hold his Cortes (or Parliament) at Toledo; where, among other things, it was petition'd by the Estates assembled, that the Emperor, being now of age to marry, should take to Wife Donna Isabella Infanta of Portugal, and not the Princess Mary our Kings Daughter.

While affairs pass'd thus betwixt Charles and March. Francis, our King, who knew he might have use of Money on these occasions, and (howsoever) did well understand that the maintaining of a sure Peace at home, was almost as costly as the making of a War abroad, advis'd with his Council how to provide himself. Yet as the Cardinal had undertaken the King should never want, as long as he might manage the publick Affairs; so they gladly discharg'd themselves on him. But Princes ought to take heed, in whose hands they commit their extraordinary Power, lest it hazard their ordinary, it being the Clue of that Labyrinth of State, which ought not rashly to be put into anothers hand. Neither should they inforce any thus violently; when business may be done in a calm and gentle manner. The harmony of Government consisting in such a delicate proportion, that no one part can safely be strain'd higher, unless the rest may well be tun'd and accorded thereunto. This appear'd in the Actions of this year, (being the seventeenth of the Reign of our King,) when, Commissions being granted forth into all the Coun- April ties of England, for the levying the sixth part of Commis-alledging, First, that these Commissions were against the Law. Secondly, their own Poverty, and that the King, since the fourteenth of his Reign, had of them twenty Fifteens. But as this seem'd to be done, without that the King was fully inform'd thereof, so when the sequence appear'd, it was resolv'd to disavow the whole proceeding. Our King therefore, by Letters sent through all the Counties of England, de-clar'd, he would have nothing of them but by way

1525. Curſe, and the King as many Bleſſings. Notwithſtanding, under this Title of Benevolence, he requir'd great Sums of all his Subjects, and particularly of the Citizens of London. But one of their Lawyers answer'd, that by the Statute, primo Ric. tertii, Cap. ſecundo, ſuch Benevolences were forbidden. But it was reply'd, That Laws made by Uſurpers oblige not Legitimate Princes, that Richard the Third, was not only a Tyrant, but a Murderer of his own Nephews, and therein more fit to ſuffer by the Law, than to make any. Therefore his Intentions were, only by popular and licentious ways, to obtain the favour of the Commonalty, as having no other means to ſubſiſt. That our King, being the true and undoubted Heir of the Crown, could be tyed hereby no further than it pleas'd himſelf; it being abſurd to think, that a Statute invented by a factious Aſſembly, and approv'd no otherwiſe than by a Criminal in the higheſt degree, ſhould bind an abſolute and lawful Monarch; wherefore if they had no better evaſion, it were not fit to mention this. Thereupon the Cardinal promiſing to examine them one by one, concerning what they would give, he begins with the Lord Mayor: But the Mayor deſiring leave not to declare himſelf fully, till he had ſpoken with the Common-Council of the City, the Cardinal wiſht him and the reſt of the Aldermen to come to him privately, and give what they would. In the Country yet, (where they ſeem'd more obſtinate,) ſome Ring-Leaders of the People (who had taken Arms) upon the perſwaſion of the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk ſubmitted themſelves, and were brought to London, and there imprisond. The King yet, perſiſting in his Intention not to puniſh any on this occaſion, (as being advertiſ'd that the common ſort of his Subjects excus'd themſelves by their want of Means, and not of Affection, to ſupply his Majeſties Occaſions) brought the matter to the Council-Table, where the Cardinal, by way of Apology, ſaid, that he had done nothing herein, without adviſing firſt with the Judges, who affirm'd poſitively, the King might lawfully demand any Sum by Commiſſion, and that the Council of State confirm'd this courſe. But the King ſaying that he was made believe, his Subjects were richer than indeed he found them by this Commiſſion, all the fault was laid on the falſe Informers, and Pardon given to all thoſe who had deny'd the former Benevolence. Hereupon the Offenders were brought to the Star-Chamber; where after a ſharp charge laid againſt them by the King's Council-Learned, the Cardinal ſaid, That, notwithstanding their grievous Offences, the King, in conſideration of their Poverty, had granted them his gracious Pardon, upon Condition, that they would give in ſureties for their good Behaviour henceforth. But they replying, that they had none; the Cardinal firſt, and after him the Duke of Norfolk, ſaid they would ſtand bound for them, wherewith they were diſcharg'd.

The Cardinal, who by a Concurrence of the Papal and Regal Authority, had ſuppreſs'd divers Monafteries, and given that Terror to the reſt, that he drew large Sums from them, would not yet deſiſt ſo, but continued ſtill his purpoſes of converting the profits of all thoſe, which by any colour might be reputed Supernumerary, unto other uſes; among which while he reduc'd the Monaftery of Beggam in Eſſex, a diſguiſ'd Company, in ſtrange Viſors, taking the Canons along with them, reimplac'd them, and ſo departed; promiſing, at the ringing of their Abbey-Bell, to come at all times to their Succours. But theſe Apparitions did not long haunt the Houſe; for the King's Council, underſtanding hereof, ſo examin'd the Canons, that they at laſt confeſs'd the Authors, who therefore were ſent for, and grievouſly puniſh'd. The Cardinal thus every way eſtabliſhing his Authority, was thought by this time, between Viſitations, making of Abbots, Probats of Teſtaments, granting of Faculties, Licenſes, Diſpenſations, and many other ways, beſides the great Penſions he had from Foreign Princes, to have made his Treafury equal to the Kings (notwithſtanding the Sums he often tranſmitted to Rome;) in which way of enriching himſelf, one John Allen Doctor of Law, his Chaplain, accompany'd with a great Train, and riding from one Religious Houſe to another, in a kind of perpetual Progreſs, or Viſitation, did the Cardinal no little Service. But as this at laſt became a publick Grievance, ſo the King took notice of it, in ſo ſharp a manner, that the Cardinal was enforc'd, not only to excuſe himſelf with much ſubmiſſion, but to promiſe never to do ſo any more; proteſting withal, that he had made a laſt Will or Teſtament, wherein he had left a great part of his Eſtate unto his Highneſs. Upon which ſubmiſſion of the Cardinals (as I take it) the King ſent him this Letter, written all with his own hand, as we find it in our Records.

As touching the matter of Wilton, ſeeing it is in no other ſtrain than you write of, and you being alſo ſo ſuddenly (with the falling ſick of your Servants) afraid, and troubled; I marvel not that it overſlipp'd you as it did. But it is no great matter, ſtanding the caſe as it doth; for it is yet in my hand, as I perceive by your Letter, and your default was not ſo great, ſeeing the Election was but Conditional. Wherefore, my Lord, ſeeing the humbleneſs of your ſubmiſſion, and though the caſe were much more heinous, I can be content for to remit it, being right glad, that, according to mine intent, my Monitions and Warnings have been benignly and lovingly accepted on your behalf, promiſing you, that the very affection I bear you caus'd me thus to do. As touching the help of Religious Houſes to the building of your College, I would it were more, ſo it be lawfully; for my intent is none, but that it ſhould ſo appear to all the World, and the occaſion of all their mumbling might be ſecluded and put away; for, ſurely, there is great murmuring of it, throughout all the Realm, both good and bad. They ſay not that all that is ill gotten is beſtow'd upon the College, but that the College is the Cloak for covering all miſchiefs. This grieveth me, I aſſure you, to hear it ſpoken by him, which I ſo intirely love. Wherefore, me-thought I could do no leſs, than thus friendly to admoniſh you. One thing more I perceive by your own Letter, which a little me-thinketh toucheth Conſcience, and that is, that you have receiv'd Money of the Exempts for having of their old Viſitors. Surely, this can hardly be with good Conſcience. For, and they were good, why ſhould you take Money? And if they were ill, it were a ſinful Act. Howbeit your Legacy herein might, peradventure, apud Homines be a Cloak, but not apud Deum. Wherefore, you, thus moniſh'd by him who ſo intirely loveth you, I doubt not, will deſiſt, not only from this, (if Conſcience will not bear it) but from all other things, which ſhould tangle the ſame; and, in ſo doing, we will ſing, Te Laudant Angeli atque Archangeli, Te Laudat Omnis Spiritus. And thus an end I make of this, though rude, yet loving Letter, deſiring you as benevolently to take it, as I do mean it, for I enſure you, (and I pray you think it ſo) that there remaineth, at this hour, no ſpark of diſpleaſure towards you in my Heart. And thus fare you well, and be no more perplext. Written with the hand of your loving Sovereign and Friend,

The Kings Letter to the Cardinal.

1525. so it must seem less strange, if amid the fair Ladies, which liv'd in his Court, he both gave and receiv'd Temptation. Among whom, because Mistress Elizabeth Blunt, Daughter to Sir John Blunt Knight, was thought, for her rare Ornaments of Nature, and Education, to be the Beauty and Mistress-piece of her time, that intire affection pass betwixt them, as at last she bore him a Son. The Child, proving so equally like to both his Parents, that he became the first Emblem of their mutual Affection, was call'd Henry Fitz-Roy by the King, and so much avow'd by him, that having now attain'd the Age of six years, he was made Knight publicly, and the same day created Earl of Nottingham, Duke of Richmond and Somerset, and Lieutenant General beyond Trent, and Warden General of the borders of Scotland, and * shortly after Admiral of England. After which he was first bred up together with Henry Earl of Surrey, in the Castle of Windsor (which the Earl elegantly describes in a Sonnet extant in his Works) from whence (November 1532.) they went both together to Study at Paris, which acquaintance and friendship was indear'd again by a Match of the said Duke with Mary the Earls Sister; by whom yet he had no Issue. Howbeit, I find, he was very personable and of great expectation, inasmuch that he was thought, not only for hability of Body but Mind, to be one of the rarest of his time, for which reason also he was much cherish'd by our King, as also because he had no Issue Male by his Queen, nor did, perchance, expect any.

The Cardinal builds Hampton-Court and gives it to the King. The Cardinal had now built his fair Palace at Hampton-Court. But as he wisely consider'd, that it would but add unto that envy for which he had already suffer'd so much, he gave it the King, who, in exchange, permitted him to live in Richmond House.

The Credit that Luther, at this time, had gotten among those Germans, who were either weary of their obedience to the stricter parts of Ecclesiastical Government, or desirous to reform the Errours and Abuses of it, (now so general, as even Pope Adrian himself confess'd that many were crept into Rome) had prevail'd far. Yet as others examin'd which way he took to make his Reformation, so they thought Religion yet not so exactly form'd, but that it might be cast in a better Mold. Therefore not only Huldricus Zuinglius, at Zurich, began a Reformation somewhat varying from that of Luther; but one Muncer in the confines of Turingia, having invented a Doctrine, opposite enough to the Church of Rome, yet differing from the other Reformers in many things, publish'd it with much applause of the inferior sort. For, as he said he had power from God to depose Princes, and substitute others, and that, again, he taught, all Goods should be Common; and divers other Articles tending to Popularity, he was follow'd by huge Multitudes. To temper yet this licentious Doctrine, he preach'd Austerity of Life; counselling Men to Prayers, Fastings, and all other Devotions, which might argue, his Intention was not so much to invade other Men's Possessions, as to establish a moderate Equality. Thus did he season Falshoods with Truths, and Ill with Good, while the vulgar sort, who could not distinguish betwixt them, admir'd, and follow'd all. To remedy these so dangerous Assemblies and Opinions, the chief Neighbouring Princes rais'd some Forces; and prevail'd so far, that, at last, they dissipat'd, and kill'd their whole Army. Neither was it difficult, they, for their best defence, singing only a Psalm, (whereby they invoc'd the Holy Ghost) while Muncer (who it seems trusted least to his own Doctrine) fled away; yet being pursu'd and taken, together with his Companion Phifer, they shortly after lost their Heads. His Sect yet took not its end so; as being reviv'd again, in part, not many years after, by John of Leyden and Knipperdoling, who, to his other Impieties added this, that in a throng of People, being born upon Mens Shoulders, he would breath on them, and bid them receive the Holy Ghost.

Such was the generous Disposition of our King, that not only for Francis then a Prisoner, but the expelled King of Denmark, Christiern, he interceded with his best Offices. Therefore, this year, he sent Henry Standish Bishop of Saint Asaph, and Sir Henry Baker Knight, to perswade his Subjects to recall him home; whence yet nothing had chas'd him so much as the guilt and horror of shedding so much blood there (so great a persecutor is Cruelty of it self:) But the angry Danes obstinately deny'd. The next Instance then was, that at least his Son (who was Nephew to Charles) might succeed. But this also was refus'd; they alledging they durst not commit the Supream Power over themselves, into the hands of one, who, they thought would imitate and revenge his Father.

The French King being weary of his restraint in Italy, had desir'd he might be remov'd into Spain; both as he hop'd the Emperor might be perswaded to come to speech with him there, and as he reputed change of Prison to be a second Liberty. Charles de la Noe also concurr'd in this request, as fearing he might be taken out of his hand. Having obtain'd this favour, he found not yet the Emperor sufficiently dispos'd to see him, though otherwise he could not complain of being either debar'd the pleasure of hunting, or any other reasonable Exercise. Finding yet still that the Emperor did estrange himself so much, as not to vouchsafe him one Visit, he fell Sick; for he did not think that his Misfortunes had made him forfeit his Dignity; or that, for being a Prisoner of War, he had extinguish'd his Title to be a King. Charles understanding this, whether out of Compassion, or fear of losing Francis, resolves to go to him at the Alcazar de Madrid, where, coming to his Chamber he embrac'd Francis, who said presently, Monsieur, veys aqui vuestro esclavo; the Emperor answer'd again, No Sino, buen hermano, y amigo libre. The King reply'd, No Sino, vuestro esclavo. The Emperor answer'd again, No Sino, libre amigo, y buen hermano; and thereupon wisht him to have a care of his Health, which he much desir'd, and that his businesses would succeed well. The Emperor not thinking this courtesy sufficient, returns to see him the next day again; which so comforted Francis, that he amended suddenly. Whereupon the Emperor resolv'd to return to his businesses at Toledo. But Madam Margarite Dutcheß of Alanca, Sister to Francis, hearing of his Sickness, made hast to see him. Whom therefore the Emperor courteously entertain'd, and accompany'd to her Brothers Lodging; where, after many affectionate Protestations, he left them together, and so held on his Journey to Toledo, whither Madam de Alanca, not many days after, followed him, mediating still the delivery of her Brother, to whom she desir'd the Emperor to give his Sister Leonora, upon the conditions above-mentioned; and that the King, her Brother, would provide for Bourbon a Match equal to this; wherein she was thought to have intimated her self, as being newly made Widow by the death of her Husband, the Duke of Alanca. As for the right of Burgundy, she desir'd it might be determin'd by way

The French Writers add, that promise was made by Francis at this time also, that the King of England should receive intire Satisfaction. Madame de Alacon, finding at last how little her intreaties prevail'd, desir'd leave to return, and by the way to see her Brother, which was granted. Here then was propos'd how he might escape; which was at last resolv'd, by changing Cloaths with a Negro, who carry'd Wood and Coals to the Kings Chamber, and blacking his face with Cole-dust. Which Invention as it is like enough to be a Lady's, and somewhat better than the lending him her Mask, I have thought fit to give her the honour of. This Plot was kept secret, only betwixt the King, his Sister, one Clement Chappion his Chamberlain, and another Treasurer. But Monsieur de la Roche-pot striking this Chappion on some occasion, he, as being discontented and without remedy, flies to the Emperor, and discovers all. The Emperor yet would not suddenly believe it, nor without better enquiry into the business; as not thinking (if one may believe the Spaniard my Author) that the King of France would, in such an undecent and unworthy manner, procure his Liberty. Therefore, in favour of this conceit of the Emperor's, he so represents the Crime, as if Francis ought to believe, that it was more Honourable for him to stay in Prison, than escape it; howsoever it seems his ancient Courage was so far from being abated, as it increas'd rather by his close keeping. Therefore he sent Monsieur de Montmorency to tell Charles, that he was resolv'd to endure any thing sooner than to restore Burgundy, or yield through constraint that which did not become him, so that he desir'd only to know the place of his Imprisonment, and number of his Attendants. The Emperor answer'd, that he was content to appoint him a place, and to nominate those that should guard him; for the rest, protesting that it griev'd him much that Francis should refuse to do that for the Ransom of his Person, which he was bound to do, for the sake of Justice only. But ample Commission and consent being come from Madame the Regent and Parliament of Paris to transact a further Agreement, Francis demanded that he might have Donna Leonora, and, for her Portion, the Counties of Mascon and Auxerre, promising, in consideration thereof, to restore Burgundy. But to this demand of Leonora, Charles answer'd again, that being obliged to the Duke of Bourbon, he could do nothing therein without acquainting him first: Yet, to satisfy the King, he sent to Bourbon, to let him know how much it concern'd him, that Francis might have Leonora. But Bourbon (it is doubtful whether out of his former contumacy and stubbornness, or out of a violent affection to the Lady) answer'd, that he had lost great possessions in France, only to have the Honour to match in that nearness of blood to the Emperor. This seem'd much to trouble Charles: At last, sending for Bourbon, he offer'd him, in recompence of Leonora, the Investiture of Milan, which Bourbon accepted; the Writings or Patent for which my Author saith he saw in Simanca, not expressing in the mean while, how this concurr'd with the Investiture, which, a little before, he saith, the Emperor gave to Francisco Sforza. To reconcile which difficulty, I shall produce (out of a dispatch extant in our Records) the reason, as I conceive it; for though Charles had (together with the Possession) granted Sforza the Investiture of Milan, yet it was upon condition, that Sforza should pay him twelve hundred thousand Crowns towards his charges, and that the said Investiture should remain in the hands of la Noy, till the War of Italy were ended. But Sforza finding this too hard, joyn'd with the adverse Party, and gave occasion to the Emperor to bestow the Investiture on Bourbon. And he had reason to be content herewith; for Donna Leonora, hearing of this competition about her, decided the controversy in favour of Francis; sending word to the Emperor, that she had rather be a Queen of France than Wife to Bourbon.

This while, the Pope, the Venetians, and Princes of Italy on the one side; leagu'd together for the defence of Italy against the Emperor, inviting also our King into the Treaty; our King on the other, mediated for Francis; neither did it diminish the suspicion entertain'd by them that Charles pretended to an universal Monarchy in Christendom, because, presently upon the making of Francis Prisoner at Pavie, he had written to our King, as well as to all other the said principal Persons, that he should take it well if they did not meddle with the Dominions and Estates of Francis, since, being his Prisoner, he could do no less than protect him against all others. While these Treaties proceed, Henry de Albret, King of Navarre, found a more compendious way to his Liberty, by corrupting his Guards. The Count de Saint Paul also devis'd means to escape without paying any Ransom.

That all Taxes and Impositions laid by each of the Kings upon the Subjects or Merchants of the other, within these last 50 years, shall be extint, and no new ones impos'd.

That one shall not protect the disobedient Subjects of the other, nor entertain Rebels, Traytors, or Fugitives; but, within twenty days after due requisition made, shall deliver them up.

That no Letters of Reprisal (or Merk) shall be granted on either side, but only against the principal Delinquents, and that but in case of denial of Justice.

That, if the Subjects of the one or the other offend against this Treaty, they shall be punish'd, without that the Treaty shall, any way therefore, be infring'd.

That, presently upon the Ratification of this Treaty, the Prisoners of War on the one and the other side shall be releas'd, as also the French Hostages.

That, in this Treaty shall be comprehended the Friends and Allies of each Prince. The King of England shall do his best Endeavour to procure, as soon as may be, the Liberty of Francis, and to induce the Emperor to accept reasonable Conditions.

That this Treaty shall be sign'd and sworn to by Francis, within three Months, if he get his Liberty so soon; or otherwise he shall confirm it by his Letters, written with his own hand, and written to King Henry VIII. And that Madame la Regente shall renounce all Exceptions, which in Law (as by Senatûs-Consultum Velleianum, &c.) may be taken against this Treaty.

That the Cardinal of Bourbon, Duke of Vendôme, Duke of Longueville, Comte Saint Paul, Mr. de Lautrech, Mr. de Montmorency, Mr. de Pressi, Comte de Maleuse, and Comte de Bryan, as also the principal Cities, Paris, Lyons, Orleans, Tolosa, Amiens, Rouen, &c. shall, under the Obligation and Forfeit of all their Goods, swear hereunto, to observe this Treaty, within three Months after the date hereof, (in which also their Heirs and Successors shall be comprehended) giving, for this purpose, a Bond with their Seal annexed, to be sent to the King of England, within three Months. Moreover, certain Bonds were given for the Debts and Moneys hereafter specified, viz. Two Millions of Crowns, at the payment of Fifty thousand Crowns at a time in Calais. The first Payment to begin within forty days after the Treaty. The second the first of November next ensuing. The next the first of May following, and so from Term to Term, and Year to Year, till the whole be satisfy'd to King Henry or his Successors. After the Payment of which, the said King Henry shall, during his Life (and no longer) receive yearly the Sum of an Hundred thousand Crowns.

Aug. 30. This Treaty was concluded Aug. 30. by the Commissioners on both sides, viz. For our King, William Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Cardinal Ebor. Thomas Duke of Norfolk, Henry Marquis of Exon, Charles Earl of Worcester, Nicholas Bishop of Ely, and Sir Thomas More. For the Regent of France were John Brinon Premier President de Rouen, and Giovanni Joachim Seigneur de Vaulx, Mr. de Hostel to Louise. And was * proclaim'd in September; and, in October, John Taylor Doctor of Law, and Sir William Fitz-William were sent into France, to take the Regents Oath. By another Treaty this Year at Lyons, I find the Regent obliged her self to pay all the Arrears due to Mary our King's Sister out of France, by reason of her Marriage with Louis XII. as also to suffer her to enjoy the Profits and Rents of all the Lands left her in Jointure, according to the Treaty Octob. 8.

1514. Francisco Sforza being inform'd now that a strong League was intended by the Pope, Venetians, and divers others, against the Emperor, was persuaded to enter into it, upon pretence that by their Assistance he might sufficiently defend his Country. But this was his Ruin; for the Marquis of Pescara understanding hereof, or (as others say) supposing it only, questions him: But Sforza denying constantly that ever he gave his Consent thereto, the Marquis demanded the Castle of Milan and Cremona for security. But Sforza utterly refusing this, the Marquis of Pescara took Milan, and laid siege to the Castle (which only remain'd to Sforza,) and after Pescara's Death (which happen'd by Sicknefs) the Duke of Bourbon. The conclusion hereof was, that Sforza (by constraint) yielded the Castle upon Conditions, and so retir'd at length to the Army, rais'd by the League against Charles the Year following. 1525.

The Emperor, who had now treated of Marriage in many places, * concluded it at last with his Niece, Donna Isabella the Infanta of Portugal, and Daughter of Manuel and Maria, Infanta of Castile, whom yet he married not till January 2. 1526. alledging for his Excuse to our King, that at the Request and Petition of his Cortes or States assembled at Toledo, he had preferr'd this Lady before our Princess Mary, which therefore he desir'd might be understood for no Breach of Friendship. Our King also considering the tender Age of his Daughter, not yet fit for Marriage; and that it was an Incongruity to ally himself with a Prince against whom he might have so soon occasion to draw his Sword, (as may appear by the League above-mention'd) seem'd very well content to relinquish the Match, upon this mutual Consent. After which time the Friendship betwixt them grew so remiss, that at last it dissolv'd wholly; insomuch that the Ambassadors of both sides were recalled home, and Charles, who before was accusom'd to sign his Letters to King Henry always Tuus Filius & Cognatus, from henceforth subscrib'd only Carlos.

But I the less wonder that the Emperor now began to take State upon him, since a richer Booty than that of Francis fell into his hands, that is to say Peru, where the Mines of Potosi (and many others, which for want of Labourers remain to this day buried and unuseful) were first discovered. Which began in this manner.

Vasco Nunez having first * discover'd from a high Rock near Darien, the Mer del Zur, † Her- † 1520. nando de Magellanes (a Portugeuze, but set forth by Charles V.) afterwards found out the Streights that bear his Name, and pass'd through them with two Ships to the Isle of Zebut, and others in that Sea; but * dying in the Voyage, his Companions went on to Borneo and the † Moluccaes, and many other places, whence one of the Ships * return'd to Spain by Capo de Buena Esperanca, and so first compassed the Globe, Juan Sebastian de Cano, a Biskainer, being Pilot. The other Ship was taken by the Portugeuze. Yet, as the Continent towards that Sea was unknown still, Francisco Picarro, a Spaniard living at Panama, (being the furthest part of Land, where it is narrowest, betwixt the North-Ocean and the Mer del Zur) first attempted the * Discovery of that Coast, bending at last to Peru, which afterwards he † ransack'd; for landing his Men at a time when there was Dissention betwixt Guancar the lawful Heir, and Atabaliva his younger Brother, he made his Advantage thereof, to the Overthrow of both, and of Atabaliva first, in this Pretext. Picarro having his Forces in a readiness, sent a Dominican Fryer, with a Cross in one hand, and a Breviary in another, who (as the Spanish Writers have it) told Atabaliva (then in the Head of his Army) That God was Three, and yet One, and that he made the World of nothing, and that he sent his Son down to be born of a Virgin, and to die for our Sins upon a Cross, like that he bore; and that he rose the Third Day, and left St. Peter his Vicar, and the Pope his Successor, who had given the Emperor that Country; if he wou'd not believe this, commanding him also to make War, and destroy him and his Religion. Atabaliva, who though full of superstitious Worship, did yet venerate a Supreme Deity (confessed in these Parts by the Name of Viracocha, or Baracocha, as in Mexico by that of Teutb, and in Guatimala by that of Cabovir, in Nueva Espanna by that of Yocabuwa-guamaorocoti) and together acknowledged Virtue and Vice, Reward and Punishment, after this Life, as believing the Soul immortal, found this Ambassage about settling

Francis at liberty.

Ambassage strange, and said, He believ'd no Power on Earth was superior to himself, yet that he would be glad to hold Friendship with the Emperor; and for the Pope, he wondred at him, because he gave that which was none of his. As for his Religion, he would not dispute it, since it was so ancient, and receiv'd in his Country. And, for worshipping Christ that died, he said, he thought he had done better in worshipping the Sun and Moon that never died, as believing (which I find by the History of the Incas, written by one of that Blood Royal) that the Sun did go about the World on God's Errand. Lastly, he demanded, Who told him that God had made the World on that fashion? To which the Dominican answering, The Breviary, and together putting it into his Hands; Atabaliva turning over a few Leaves (as if he expected some such Expression from thence) but finding he understood nothing, threw it away, where-with the Dominican exclaiming that the Gospel was on the Ground, and demanding Vengeance, Pizarro discharg'd some great Ordnance, and his Small-shot against him, wherewith the terrified Indians fled, and Atabaliva was taken Prisoner. Atabaliva hereupon offers for his Ransom as much Gold and Silver as would fill a great Sala or Room where they were, which being accorded and almost perform'd in effect, Pizarro upon false Pretences most cruelly put him to death, tho' baptiz'd; for which also the Conspirators and Pizarro himself at last came to ill Deaths, as the Spanish Writers observe. However, for the present, the Spaniards proceeded in their Cruelty to others, of all sorts, especially of the Blood-Royal, and got infinite Treasure, their Temples being plunked with Gold, and their Graves full of Treasure and Riches, which were buried with them. But I doubt I have insisted too long upon these Barbarisms.

The Year of our Lord 1526 was now entred, when Charles required his Council to advise him whether it were best to deliver Francis; and if so, upon what Terms? Charles de la Noy Viceroy of Naples did not think fit the Emperor should lose the Benefit of such a Prize; therefore, though he perswaded the delivery of Francis, yet he wili'd that the most advantageous Conditions that could be made thereof, should be taken suddenly, and before the League, which was now forming against him, could be concluded. That, this being done, the Emperor was more free to provide for the Business of Germany, to resist the Turk, and to surpress Barbarossa and other Pyrates that infested his Seas. Others, and among them Guattinara the Chancellor, said, that there was less danger of Francis being in Prison than abroad; especially, since it did not appear sufficiently, the new League would be broken off, when Francis had his Liberty, but rather strengthen'd and confirm'd, as being not directed so much for the delivery of Francis, as oppos'd to the Greatness of Charles. That many things might be done while Francis was unsetled, which would take no effect when he were restor'd to his former Estate. Therefore, his best course were to find some means to have the Children of his Prisoner, and other Affairs in France, within his Power, that so nothing might interrupt his Designs elsewhere. And that himself should undertake his Journey to Italy, before he let go so dangerous an Enemy, who if once loose, would rather make War for redeeming his Losses, than improve them by standing to any servile Conditions. Lastly, That his Imperial Majesty ought to believe, that if Francis being in Prison would not make restitution of Burgundy, he would much less do it when he were free. Hernando de Vega said, that Francis was very well in Madrid. To which Guattinara reply'd resolutely, There might be use both of detaining and letting him go; only, since he saw so little hope of performance (what Security soever were given) he thought it best either to let him go freely, and therein put a perpetual Obligation upon him, or to keep him still where he was. This was a wise Advice. The Emperor yet chose rather to adhere to them who counselled him to prevail himself of the occasion. Therefore, considering Francis offered his two Sons for Hostages, while himself going to France, mediated with the Estates for restoring Burgundy; and that, without this personal Intercession there was little hope of any Satisfaction or Peace; he thought it best to deliver Francis, as that which at least would declare to the Christian World, that he desir'd the Quietness thereof. So that upon the fourteenth of January a Treaty (called the Concord of Madrid) was concluded, the Tenor whereof according to the most substantial Articles is here set down.

Charles the Emperor, and on his part Charles de la Noy Viceroy of Naples, Hugo de Moncada, and Juan Aleman: And Francis le Roy Tres-Christien, and on his part Francis Archbishop of Embrun, and Jean de Selue Premier President du Parlement de Paris, and Philip Chabot, having Commission from Madam Louise Regent of France, in Vertue of the Power given her by Francis, before his Imprisonment (thought therefore authentick) did upon the Day and Year above written, Treat, Accord, and Conclude these Articles following:

1. That there shall be a good and secure Peace and Confederacy established between the two Princes, so that they shall be Friends to the Friends, and Enemies to the Enemies of each other, for the mutual Defence of their Estates and Kingdoms.
2. That Traffick and Commerce shall be renew'd betwixt their Subjects on either side, upon payment only of their ancient Customs; and that the Sea shall be secur'd from Pyrates.
3. That the Dutchy of Burgundy, together with all the Rights, Members and Dependences, shall in the name of him, his Heirs, and Successors, be restor'd within the space of six Weeks after the delivery of Francis, notwithstanding any Decrees of Parliaments, Pretence of the Salick Law, or other Claim whatsoever.
4. Because yet, for better performance of these things which are requir'd, the French King alledgeth it is necessary that he should presently repair home; it is therefore concluded, that upon the tenth of March next, the said French King shall be set free in that part of France which adjoins to Fuentarabie; upon condition nevertheless, that at the same Hour and Instant (the number of Attendants on both sides being equal) the Dauphin his eldest Son, and Duke of Orleans his second Son, or (instead of the said Duke) Monsieur de Vendosme, John Duke of Albany, Monsieur de St. Pol, Monsieur de Guise, Monsieur de Lautrech, Monsieur de la Val, the Marquis de Saluzzo, Monsieur de Rieux, the Great Seneschal of Normandy, the Marechal de Montmorency, Monsieur de Brion, and Monsieur de Aubigny, should be deliver'd to Charles as Hostages, till all Conditions were perform'd; which being done, that within the space of four Weeks a Ratification by the Parliament of Paris, and all the other Parliaments of the said Kingdom, shall be deliver'd unto Charles; whereupon the said Charles doth swear and promise upon the Faith of a Prince, to return the said Hostages, upon condition yet that the third Son of Francis, being Duke de Angoulesme, should at the same time be given to Charles, to be kept and brought up in his Court, and with him. And the French King doth furthermore promise, in case these things were not perform'd (that is to say, the restitution of Burgundy, and the rest in six Weeks, and the Ratification in four more ensuing) 1526. being) to return Prisoner to Charles. And, for this purpose, as he had sworn already, so when he is at liberty, he shall renew and confirm the said Oath, before such Commissioners as Charles shall appoint. And that upon his said return to Charles, his Hostages should be deliver'd.

5. That Francis for Himself, his Heirs, and Successors, shall renounce his whole Right, Claim, and Interest, in all the Kingdoms, Estates, Lands, and Seigneuries, which are now in the possession of Charles, and especially in the Kingdom of Naples, as well for all Propriety therein, as any Pension or Payment demanded for the same. And that the Investiture thereof, given by the Apostolick See to his Ancestors or him, as also all Capitulations made to this effect heretofore, shall not be available for the said Kingdom of Naples, or for the Estates of Milan, Genoua, Asti, and their Dependencies. And that the Grants or Writings to this purpose, whether Pontifical or Imperial, or only between him and Francisco Sferza, should be deliver'd to Charles. And that Francis shall, for Him, his Heirs, and Successors, renounce all his Demand or Claim to Flanders, and to all other Places thereabouts, now in Possession of Charles, together with all Superiority over them. In lieu whereof the said Charles promisseth to relinquish his Title to Perone, Montdidier, the Counties of Boulogne, Guisnes, Pontbieu, as also the Cities, Towns, Seigneuries on both sides of the River of Somme, now in the possession of Francis, reserving only the Counties of Masconois, Auxerrois, and Bar sur la Seine, which shall be dispos'd of particularly hereafter. And that all other Lands, Towns, and Seigneuries not mention'd in these Presents, shall be restor'd to the Estate in which they were before the Wars.

6. That, in performance of the League defensive betwixt both Princes, they shall suffer no hostile Forces to pass through either of their Countries, to the Hurt or Prejudice of the other; and that either Prince being invaded, may have of the other five hundred Horse, and ten thousand Foot, with convenient Artillery (or any less number) at the Charges of the Demandant; and, for the Offensive League, that it shall extend no further than to their joint Enemies, and by the mutual Advice and Consent of both.

7. That a Marriage shall be had and made betwixt Francis and Leonora, a Dispensation for that purpose being first obtain'd; and that she shall be deliver'd to Francis at the same time that the Hostages shall be restor'd by Charles.

8. That her Dowry shall be Two hundred thousand Crowns de Soleil, besides her Arras (i. e. a Pledge given in Spain where Marriages are recorded) which did appertain to her upon her first Marriage.

9. That, besides the aforesaid Sum, the Emperor out of his abundant Love to his Sister Leonora, shall bestow the Counties of Masconois, Auxerrois, and the Seigneury of Bar sur la Seine, on her, and her Heirs Male only.

10. That the Queen Leonora shall renounce all Rights of Goods, or Heritage, that might descend to her from the part of her Grandfather Maximilian, her Father King Philip, or Queen Joan her Mother, save only the Collateral Succession, in case the said Charles or his Brother Ferdinand should die without Issue.

11. That the said Queen Leonora shall receive from Francis Jewels to the value of Fifty thousand Crowns, to remain to her, her Heirs, and Successors.

12. That if the said Francis and Leonora shall have Issue Male betwixt them, the eldest Son shall be Duke of Alencon, and have in possession the Dutchy thereof, conferr'd on him by Francis, 1526. and on his Mother's part the above-mentioned Counties of Masconois, Auxerrois, and Bar sur la Seine, and that his other Sons shall be provided for according to their degree, reserving still the Right belonging to the Dauphin. And that the Daughters shall have such Portions as the Kings of France usually give.

13. That, in case Francis die before Leonora, she shall have for Arras sixty thousand Livres Tournois of Rent, yearly to continue, during her life only.

14. That, in case Leonora survive Francis, it may be lawful for her to return to Spain, Flanders, or Burgundy, and carry with her all her Goods and Jewels; and that before the Solemnity of the said Marriage, the Seal of the said King and Dauphin, and of the Estates and principal Places of the said Kingdom of France, together with due Acknowledgments and Obligations shall be given, to the intent they may be forc'd to the Accomplishment thereof, both by way of Excommunication, and also by Arrests, and detaining of all Persons of the said Kingdom, of what quality soever.

15. That a Marriage shall be solemniz'd between Francis the Dauphin, Son and Heir to Francis, and Donna Maria Daughter to Leonora and her first Husband Manuel, in Words de futuro, when the said Lady shall attain to seven Years of Age, and by Words de presenti when she shall be twelve. And that her Brother Don Juan King of Portugal shall give his consent thereunto, with sufficient Provision for her Dowry.

16. That the said Infanta Maria shall at twelve Years of Age be conducted to France, and consign'd to Francis.

17. That Francis shall use his best means to dispose Henry d' Albret, together with his Brothers and Sisters, to renounce their Title to Navarre, or when they could not procure any such Disclaim, not to assist him or them in their Pretences. That Francis likewise shall use his best means to dispose the Duke of Gueldres to leave (after his life) the Dutchy of Gueldres and County of Zutphen to Charles; or when he could not procure this, to assist Charles with Three hundred Horse, and Four thousand Foot, to recover it.

18. That Francis shall not give assistance to Duke Ulrich of Wittenberg, nor to Robert de la Mark, or his Sons, against the said Charles, but rather help him to repress them, nor interpose himself by way of Treaty in favour of any Potentate of Italy.

19. That when Charles shall pass in Person to Italy, Francis shall lend the said Charles his Fleet in the Mediterranean Sea, being well equipped, for the space of three Months, and no longer. And, whereas Francis promised to assist Charles, both with Men and Artillery for his Voyage, he should in lieu thereof, pay in Money Two hundred thousand Crowns, giving him good security for it; yet, if the Emperor demanded Five hundred great Horse, together with sufficient Artillery, Francis should furnish them at his own proper costs.

20. That because Charles, for the better drawing Henry King of England to his Party against Francis, had promis'd to pay unto the said Henry the Sum of One hundred thirty three thousand three hundred and five Crowns yearly, in lieu of those Pensions and Rents which the said Francis was bound to pay to Henry, and during such Terms as was agreed betwixt them; (as by a Treaty concluded at Windsor, June 19, 1522, more at large appeareth) and because, since that time until a late League betwixt Francis and Henry, all the said Money remains in Arrear: And because 1526. because Francis saith, he hath taken order with Henry for the payment of the said entire Sum; therefore it is agreed, that Francis shall save harmless the said Charles from all demands on the part of Henry; and furthermore, shall give an Authentick Copy of the said late Agreement betwixt him and Henry, sometime before the end of four Months next ensuing the date hereof; as also of the Acquittances he shall receive from Henry upon payment of the said Sums, which shall be such, as Charles, his Heirs and Successors may remain indemnify'd and discharg'd thereof for ever. So that, if Charles should be call'd upon for satisfaction in these Particulars, Francis shall take the business on himself, and defend it as his own, without that Charles shall be any way molested therein.

21. That, because this particular Treaty is made in the way of a General League, intended to be agreed on and concluded hereafter against Turks, Infidels, and Hereticks; therefore, that supplication should be made in both their Names unto his Holiness, that he would write unto all Christian Princes and Estates to joyn herein; as also to authorize a Cruzada for the said Enterprize; to endure at least for three years next ensuing, not exempting Ecclesiastical Persons from it. And, if need be that Charles and Francis should go in Person to this Holy War by Sea, that then they shall join and unite their Forces together with those of the great Master of the Knights of Saint John of Jerusalem, and the Genouese; or, if the danger appear not so great, as to require their presence in the said War, that then a General for conducting the said Forces, shall be appointed by Charles; or, if otherwise it should be thought necessary themselves should go in Person, that then Ambassadors and Commissioners should be appointed to reside in each others Dominions, for the determining of all Differences that should arise in their absence.

22. That, because Charles Duke of Bourbon, together with divers of his Friends, Allies, and Servants, did for a while absent themselves from France, and the Service of Francis, and that for this cause the Duchies of Bourbon, Auvergne, Chastelleraut, the Counties of Clermont, &c. had been taken away from them, it is agreed, that Francis presently, or at farthest in six Weeks after his Delivery, shall restore unto the said Duke of Bourbon, as well as to all the rest of his Friends, Allies, and Servants, (whether Ecclesiastical or Secular) their former Possessions, together with the just value of all the Goods that have been taken from them, as also the Writings or Deeds by which the said Possessions were formerly held, and also the true profit of the said Lands and Possessions, during their absence, and to stay all Suits and Proceedings against them on this occasion. Furthermore, That the said Duke shall not be constrain'd personally to appear in the French Court, but that he may Administer, and dispose of all his Estate and Possessions, by sufficient Deputies and Officers appointed thereunto, and receive the Revenues thereof, in such place as himself shall chuse, when it were out of France, and that the said Officers shall not be molested in execution of their Charge. And, as for the Right the said Duke of Bourbon pretends to the County of Provence, and the Dependencies thereof, it is agreed that a just and equal hearing and decision thereof, shall be permitted and given before competent Judges, whensoever the said Duke shall re-commence his former Suit therein; and that the said Duke, his Friends, Allies, and Servants, may without prejudice to their Rights or Possessions stay or continue in the Service of the Emperor. And that, for performing of all these particulars above mention'd, Francis shall give good and sufficient warrant and assurance, according to form of Law, and the terms usual in this case.

23. That, before the fifteenth of February next, all Prisoners on both sides, and particularly Philibert Prince of Orange shall (without paying any Ransom) be set free, and return to their several Countries, unless their Sovereigns by mutual consent do otherwise determin.

24. That all Rebels and Fugitives on either side shall be remanded, (only those in the Duchy of Milan, Genoua, and County of Asti excepted) who shall be freely pardon'd, and within six Months restor'd to their former Estates. As for those who are charg'd with heinous crimes of that Nature, as they cannot be return'd home, without Scandal and Inconvenience, it is agreed, that upon a Months warning they shall depart from those places to which they are restor'd, upon the penalty of being apprehended, and sent to their lawful Sovereign or Superior.

25. That all Prelates and Ecclesiastical Persons, as also all Subjects, of what condition soever, shall on either side return to their former Places, Estates, and Possessions, notwithstanding any Confiscation, Gift, or Alienation thereof whatsoever.

26. That, because in the Cortes of Castilla, the Consuls and University of Burgos had complain'd of divers losses they had receiv'd, contrary to some ancient Privileges, (both before and since these Wars) which they pretend to hold from the Ancestors of the most Christian King as Duke of Bretagne, it is therefore agreed, that upon verification of the Particulars, the said Privileges shall be confirm'd, and a friendly end made, or otherwise Justice done on the Offenders.

27. That, because the Cloths made in Catalonia, Roussillon, Cerdenna, and other places of the Crown of Arragon, are not permitted to be carry'd through the Territories of France into other Countries without danger of Confiscation; it is therefore agreed, that paying their ancient Customs, they shall have a free Way and Passage, both by Sea and Land, along all the French Dominions.

28. Because M^{adame} Marguerite, Aunt to Charles, hath much mediat^d this Peace; and because a certain Neutrality, by the consent of Charles, was accorded betwixt her and Francis, for the Countries in her possession, during their late Wars, according to which she ought to enjoy the County of Carthus, and certain Granaries of Salt, &c. notwithstanding which, they have by force been taken from her; it is agreed therefore, that they, together with the profits in arrears, shall be restor'd to her, during her life only. And, that afterwards they shall descend on Charles and his Heirs.

29. That, because the Queen Donna Germana de Foix, Widow of Arragon, saith, she had receiv'd a definitive Sentence in the Parliament of Paris, by which the Towns and Lands of Marcen, Turfen, Gavierdey, and Gavavere are adjudg'd to her; it is agreed, that Francis shall see the said Sentence executed by strong hand, if need be.

30. Item, Because Philibert de Chalon, Prince of Orange, since his service of the Emperor, hath had divers Places and Rights in Dauphine and Bretagne taken from him by Francis, and some Money's detain'd; it is agreed, that he shall be restor'd to his former Possessions, and the said Moneys paid, and good and speedy Justice done him in his other demands.

31. Item, Because Philip de Croy Marquis of Avescon, pretends to divers Lands, and other Rights in France, which since these Wars have been taken from him; it is agreed he shall be restor'd to them, and Justice done him in his other Demands.

32. Item, Because the Princess of Chimay pretends to certain Goods and Inheritance descended to her, as in the Right of the Seigneur de la Brit her Father, as also to some Goods of her Mother and Brethren; it is agreed that good and speedy Justice be done her.

33. Item, That Henry Count of Nassau shall have right done him by Francis for part of the Dowry of his Wife.

34. Item, That Adolpho of Burgundy, Seigneur de Beures, Admiral of Flanders, shall be restor'd to his right of the Castle and Lands of Crevecoeur en Cambrésis, in the manner he held it before the War.

35. Item, That Monsieur Charles de Pompet, Camarero to the Emperor, shall have the Money restor'd him, which contrary to the Privileges of the University of Paris, he was constrain'd to pay for the Ransom of his Children, Students there, when the late War began.

36. Item, That Guillaume de Vergi shall have right done him for the Seigneurie of San-de-fier en Perchois.

37. Item, That the Seigneurs de Frenes, Conde de Gaures, Monsieur Audriano de Croy, de Reulx, de Meleny, Conte de Spinay, and Sieur de Reulx, shall have the Goods restor'd which they enjoy'd before these late Wars.

38. Item, That the Marquis Antonio de Saluzzo his Mother and Sisters, as also Frederico de Baugy shall have those Goods restor'd, which were taken in these late Wars, and Justice done them.

39. Item, That the Seigneur de Monago Bishop of Graso shall be replac'd in his Bishoprick, and Justice done to him, and against those who kill'd his Brother.

40. Item, That the Seigneur de Luz shall be restor'd to his Possessions which he enjoy'd before he entred the Emperors Service; and good and speedy Justice done in certain Lands he pretends descended to him from his Ancestors during those Wars.

41. Item, That the Pope, the King of England, Hungary, Poland, Denmark, Portugal, and Scotland, Don Ferdinando Brother to Charles, (and his Lieutenant-General of the Empire) Madam Marguerite Aunt to the Emperor, the Electors and other Princes of the Empire, (who are obedient to the Emperor) the Seigneurs of the Ancient Leagues and Cantons of High-Germany, may upon notification of their desire to be admitted into this League, (and not otherwise) be receiv'd there into at any time within the space of six Months next ensuing.

42. Item, That Francis being set at liberty, shall in the first Town he shall come to within his Kingdom, give Letters Patents for the ratification of this Accord, and send them to Charles. And that the Dauphin, when he shall attain the age of fourteen, shall likewise ratifie them with a solemn Oath, in which he shall renounce all Advantages, which by Minority of Age he might take hereafter to infringe the said Oath.

43. Item, That both Charles and Francis shall ratifie this present Capitulation and Agreement, and all that is contain'd therein (each for his part) before Ambassadors appointed for this purpose; and especially Francis, when he is free in his Kingdom, shall swear solemnly upon the Evangelists in the presence of the true Cross, to keep and hold all that is contain'd in the said Capitulation; and that both of them shall submit themselves herein to the Ecclesiastical Juris-

1526. diction and Censure, even to the Invocation of the Secular Power to constrain them; and that they shall appoint their several Proctors to appear for them in the Court of Rome, and before the Pope, where they shall voluntarily accept the Condition and Fulmination of the said Censures, in case of Contravention; and that neither of them shall demand or sue for absolution of this Oath or Censure; or if they do, that it shall not be available without the consent of the other.

44. Item, Because no Man may pretend Ignorance, it is agreed that this Peace shall be publish'd before the fifteenth of February next, both in the Dominions of Charles and Francis; and especially in the Frontiers, and such other places as have been accusom'd in the like case.

This was Signed: Francois, Charles de la Noy, Don Hugo de Moncada, Francois Archevesque de Ambrun, Jean de Selue, Chabot.

The Treaty betwixt them being concluded in the manner above-mention'd, the Archbishop of Ambrun, for the last Seal and Solemnization thereof, said Mass. This being done, Francis coming to the Altar, and putting his right hand upon the Book of the Evangelists, (which the said Archbishop held) did swear by the Sacrament, and the Holy Evangelists, not to break this Capitulation all the days of his Life, nor to give Counsel or Favour that any other should break it. The like Oath was taken by the Vice-Roy of Naples, Don Hugo de Moncada, and the Secretary Aleman in the Emperors Name. (For the Emperor in Person did not think fit to balance his free Oath, with that of Francis, then in restraint.) This being perform'd on both sides, the Vice-Roy took the Faith and Pleyto omenae (being a kind of homage) of Francis, who as a Prince and the most Christian King, promis'd and gave his Fidelity and Royal word to return into Spain a Prisoner within the space of six Months, in case he did not accomplish all that was there capitulated betwixt them, giving his hands thereupon to be held betwixt those of Charles de la Noy. This being ended with much seeming content on all parts, the Emperors Commissioners went to Toledo; where, upon relation to the Emperor of what was done, it was thought fit to send the Seigneur de Praet, Chevalier of the Toison d'Or, who had been in England, and was now his Ambassador in France, to meet with the French King at Bayonne, and there to require of him, according to the Articles, a new and more ample Ratification of his Oath.

Some few days after this Treaty (commonly call'd Concordia de Madrid) Charles de la Noy having Power and Commission from the Queen Donna Leonora, privately contracted a Marriage with Francis in her name, and then having Commission from him again, went to the Queen Leonora and contracted a Marriage with her in the name of Francis. After which time the Emperor treated no more with Francis as a Prisoner, but a near Ally; insomuch that at the next Visit, he offer'd him the right Hand. I observe yet the Emperor would not permit Francis to enjoy Leonora his Sister, till he had fully accomplish'd the Concord betwixt them. Neither did he, in his last words to Francis, (being then licens'd to depart) seem so sensible of any thing, as of her Honour. At which time also (for further obligation of Francis unto this Agreement) I find by Sandoval, he demanded of Francis, whether he remembred well all that was capitulated betwixt them? Francis answer'd, Yes; for further confirmation repeating the most particular Sandoval, Jan 14.

Francis swears to this Treaty.

Emperor visits him with great Affection.

1526. lar Articles. Charles then demanded, Are you willing to perform them? Francis answer'd again, Yes; adding, he knew no Man in his Kingdom would hinder him. And, when you find that I do not keep my word with you, I wish and consent that you hold me for Lascche & Meschant, a Knaue and a Villain. Charles reply'd, and I wish you to say the like of me if I do not give you liberty. Whereupon they lovingly bid each other a long farewell. This being done, Charles return'd. There was much difficulty yet about the exchange betwixt Francis and his two Sons, neither could they (almost) devise how to secure it from jealousy on either side. At last these Articles were agreed.

The manner how Francis was to be deliver'd.

1. That no Man at Arms, or other Soldier, might within ten days before or after the exchange and delivery be permitted to come within twenty Leagues of the place; and that those who were come already should retire.
2. That no Gentleman of the French Kings Household should pass Bayonne, till the King were come to St. Juan de Luz.
3. That the number of Foot-Garrisons in either Frontier should not exceed a thousand. And that when Madam Louise the Regent had declar'd whether she would give the two eldest Sons of Francis in Hostage, or the Dauphin only with the twelve others above mention'd, that then it should be advis'd whether the number were to be increas'd.
4. That at the day of the delivery neither Man nor Woman, Neighbour nor Stranger should be near the place.
5. That six days before the delivery, Charles should appoint twelve Persons to visit the Coast, on that side where the River of Fuentarabie joins with France: And that four Persons appointed by Madam Louise, should be ready there to do whatsoever was requir'd for performance of these Articles. And that for this purpose Madam Louise might also appoint twelve on the other side of the River, whom four on Charles his part should likewise attend.
6. That neither on one or other side of the said River (passing near Fuentarabie) there should be any Boats or Pinaces, but two (which must be of the same bigness) to pass Francis to the one, and the Hostages to the other side, and that the twelve Deputies on either part should take order herein.
7. That there should be no Gally, Ship, or Pinace in the Sea within five Leagues of the place appointed for the Delivery.

March 15.

In sequence of which Capitulation, it was further agreed, that Charles de la Noy, with twenty five arm'd Men, with Swords and Daggers only, for guarding of the French King, and as many with Monsieur de Lautrech, in like manner weapon'd, for conducting the two Hostages, should come to the sides of the above-mention'd River; in the middle of which a little Bridge, upon a Bark fastned with Anchors, should be built, on which yet no body should stand; and that two Boats of equal bigness, fitted for twenty Oars apiece, should be ready there, of which Francis should chuse one; which being done, twenty Rowers, all French and unarm'd, should enter his Boat, and bring it to the side of Spain, at the same time that the other with twenty Spaniards unarm'd likewise, should be brought to the French Coast. That thereupon Charles de la Noy conducting the King, and taking ten Persons only with him, should pass to one side of the said Bridge, at the same time that Monsieur de Lautrech with the Hostages, and ten Persons, should likewise come to the other. That none of the said Persons yet should put themselves upon the Bridge, but Charles de la Noy with the French King and one other, and Monsieur de Lau-trech with the two Hostages, and Madam de Baisac and Chauvigny. That thereupon the exchange should be made in one instant. Before yet any thing was done the same day, that a Boat with four Rowers Spanish, and four French, and a Gentleman of either Nation, should visit the Coast on both sides, and take order that every thing should be prepar'd. For fear yet lest some supposititious Children should be rendred instead of the Dauphin and his Brother, it was agreed further, that the Seigneur de Praet, the Emperors Ambassador, should come along with them, while another Frenchman was allow'd to attend Francis in his passage.

Thus upon the eighteenth of March 1526. after one whole year and some days Imprisonment, was Francis deliver'd to his Boat, and by mutual consent at the same time accompanied with twelve Spaniards (whereof Charles de la Noy and Hernando de Alancon his Guardian were two) to the French shoar, while the Hostages, accompany'd with the like number, came to the Spanish Coast; neither was there any thing more that might be thought remarkable in the performance of all this, but that a stay was made while the two Children kiss'd their Fathers Hand, and that his last words to la Noy confirm'd again his promise to the Emperor. As soon as Francis came to his own ground, he got hastily upon a Turkish and swift Horse, and suddenly putting Spurs to him (if we may believe Sandoval) and casting one of his Arms over his Head, and crying Je suis le Roy, Je suis le Roy, posted to St. Juan de Luz, and the next day to Bayonne, where the Lady his Mother, and many other principal Persons with much anxiety attended him.

Francis's joy on his arrival in France.

I am the more particular in the Relation of these Passages, both as the Example is rare, and as it leads to the understanding of that which followeth in our History; and the rather, for that it was the Subject that chiefly took up the time, and thoughts of our King, whensoever his Prospect was turn'd on Foreign Affairs; insomuch that he might be truly said a principal Actor in them. And now he held it his part to relieve Francis. Therefore as he had sent Cuthbert Tonsal Bishop of London, and Sir Richard Wingfield, long since into Spain to mediate his delivery with the Emperor, so now hearing he was in his way homewards, he dispatches Sir Thomas Cheyney to congratulate his safe return, and to take his Oath to the Treaty of Moore above-mention'd, which Francis accepting, sent a Messenger immediately to advertise our King of the Conditions of his Delivery, and to acknowledge that he ow'd him chiefly his liberty, as both Sandoval relates it, and our Records, under his own hand, confirm; which fair Terms produc'd, afterwards, a more firm Correspondency betwixt them.

Owens his liberty due to King Henry.

Charles de la Noy & Hernando de Alancon having in vain sollicitated Francis, at Bayonne, to accomplish that part of the late Concord and Agreement he was bound to there, seem'd yet to receive some satisfaction, that they were referr'd untill their coming to Paris. (The King pretending he could do nothing, effectually, till he had spoken with the principal Persons of the Estate and Parliament.) Here again they press'd Francis unto the performance of that he was bound to by so many Oaths and Promises. But Francis, for a Conclusion, positively answer'd, that it was not in his power to dismember any part from the Kingdom, without consent both of the same part, and the whole Kingdom; and therefore, with many loving words, desir'd that his Ransom might be chang'd to some equivalent sum of Money. But Charles would by no means hearken thereunto. Therefore, as he had by

May. Francis refuses to confirm the Treaty.

1526. Treaty happily detain'd the Queen Leonora from passing into France, so he determin'd rather (at what price soever) to take off the Pope, Venetians, and Francisco Sforza, and the Florentines, from a League they were entering into with England and Francis against him, than to decline any way the least Article of the late Concord and Agreement.

Tillet. This League (call'd Clementina & Sanctissima) was begun (as the French have it) by the instigation of our King, during the Imprisonment of Francis, but not perfectly concluded, till about two Months after his delivery. To give this a more auspicate beginning, the Pope (as the Spanish History hath it) sent to the French King a Relaxation of the Oath he made to observe the Concord and Treaty of Madrid, upon pretext alledg'd by Francis, that those of Burgundy would not consent, by any means, to be alienated from the French Crown. Charles de la Noy & Hernando de Alancon finding matters thus distemper'd, and unlike to sort to any good end, desir'd leave to return, which Francis granted, upon condition that they would go to Spain immediately, and not to Italy, whither (in regard of his Government) la Noy desir'd much to pass through the French Territories. Though others write, and our Records confirm it, that they departed not till the following Treaty was sworn, at Cognac, in their Presence. Which that they might make more specious to the Emperor, they offer'd him place to enter into it, upon certain Conditions. This Treaty, concluded between Pope Clement VII, Francis the French King, the Venetians, Francisco Sforza, and the Florentines, was to this effect.

And heads a League made against Charles. May 22. The Articles of it.

1. That the Contractors of this League and Concord shall be Friends of the Friends, and Enemies of the Enemies of each other. That this Clause yet shall not extend to the Dominions held by the Pope and Venetians, out of Italy. And that the said Contractors shall, particularly defend the Person and Dignity of the Pope against all his Adversaries.

2. That place shall be left for the Emperor Charles to enter hereinto, if he desire it, and for Henry King of England, not only as a Contractor but Protector of this most Holy League and Concord, as also for Don Hernando, Arch-Duke of Austria, and the rest of the Kings, Princes, and Potentates of Christendom, provided yet, that the said Charles shall not be admitted hereunto, but upon these ensuing Conditions. That is to say, unless he first restore the two Sons of Francis, which he detains as Hostages, and take in lieu of them, some reasonable and fitting Recompence and Satisfaction. As also unless he leave the Dutchy of Milan freely unto Francisco Sforza, and the rest of the Estates and Dominions in Italy, in the form and manner they were before the late War; and unless, when he enters Italy, to be Crown'd there, he bring with him such Family and Train only, as the Pope and Venetians shall think fit; which yet is intended shall be such, as may take away suspicion of violent Attempt, and preserve together the Imperial Dignity; and unless within three Months, after the conclusion of the said Treaty, (the King of England entering into it) he pay unto the said King all the Money due to him.

3. That an Army shall be rais'd by the said Confederates, which shall consist of thirty thousand Foot, two thousand five hundred Men of Arms, and three thousand Light Horse, together with the Artillery and Munition fitting thereunto. Whereof, the Pope should furnish eight hundred Men at Arms, and seven hundred Light Horse, and eight thousand Foot: The French King forty thousand Crowns the Month in Money, and five hundred Men at Arms (call'd Maistres) comprehending one thousand Light Horse: The Venetians eight hundred Men at Arms, and one thousand Light Horse, and eight thousand Foot; Francisco Sforza, the Duke of Milan, four hundred Men at Arms, three hundred Light Horse, and four thousand Foot. That certain Swiss should be rais'd for the said League, at the charge of the French King; who, besides the above mention'd, shall have a powerful Army to hinder the passage of any considerable Forces into Italy. All which, are to be employ'd against the Perturbators of the Peace of Italy, until they be reduc'd to the Estate of not being able to keep the Field.

4. That, when this Treaty shall be ratified by all the Confederates, they shall joyntly desire Charles the Emperor to restore the two Sons of the French King, and, in case he refuse, shall denounce War against him, till he restore them. For the execution whereof (the War of Italy being ended) the Confederates shall furnish to the said French King ten thousand Foot, one thousand Men at Arms, and a thousand Light-Horse, or Money for the raising and payment of them.

5. That the Confederates shall defend each others Estate against all Invasion; In which case those of Italy shall furnish ten thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse to the French King, and he as many to them again.

6. That the Confederates shall have an Armado of twenty eight Gallies at least, whereof the French King shall furnish twelve, the Pope three, and the Venetians thirteen, to be employ'd in this War, unless the French King have particular use of his part.

7. That, for removing all suspicion of Attempt upon the Dutchy of Milan, the French King shall not only permit the present Duke to enjoy it, but shall defend him against all Adversaries, with the proportion of Forces above-mentioned, he paying, in consideration of the Claim and Expence of the French King, such a Pension (at Lyons in France) as the Pope and Venetians shall ordain; which yet shall not be less than five hundred thousand Ducats yearly.

8. That, because this Peace may be universal over Italy, all Goods taken away in these late occasions, shall be restor'd, and all Men re-inplac'd in their former Possessions.

9. That the French King shall give some Lady of the Blood-Royal of France, (by the nomination of the Pope) for Wife to the Duke of Milan, and shall procure the Swiss to defend his State on all occasions, as they were formerly accustomed. That the Concado de Asti, as being distinct from Milan, and anciently pertaining to the House of Orleans, shall be restor'd to the French King, or at least the Government thereof, to be administred by the Duke of Orleans, second Son to the French King, or his Deputy.

10. That Antonio Adorno shall remain Duke of Genoia, if either he enter into this League, or, otherwise, alter the form of the City Government, in such sort as may be thought most for the security and quiet of Italy, reserving yet to the French King his Title and Right of Superiority, in the manner he held it when he was in possession of the said City.

11. That, if the Emperor deny or delay to perform what is requir'd in the second Article, that then presently after ending the War for the Pacification of Italy, the Confederates shall invade the Kingdom of Naples; and, if the Emperor be expuls'd thence, that then it shall remain at the disposition of the Pope, as being held 1526. held in feud of the Church; and that, in recompence of the pretence which the French King hath to it, the Pope, with consent of all the Cardinals, shall bind himself and Successors to pay yearly to the King of France a convenient Pension, which shall not be less than sixty five thousand Crowns de Soleil.

12. That in Case any of the Confederates should die or fail, yet the League should continue firm among the rest, and that the Successors of the dead may enter into his place.

13. That all the Confederates shall take upon them the defence and protection of the House of Medicis, even to the restitution of them to their former Greatness and Dignity.

Henry VIII. Protector of it, with an allowance of 30000 Ducats per Annum.

14. And because the most serene and powerful King of England, Defender of the Faith, hath always affected Peace, as appears by the good Offices done to the French King, and hath always imploy'd his Forces in service of the Catholick Church, as his Father did before him; and because no Authority, superior to his, can be interpos'd either for the conservation of good Men in Peace or repressing of those who are ill: Therefore, it is agreed, that his Majesty shall be Protector of the most Holy League and Concord. For which purpose, the said Confederates do offer to him and his Heirs an Estate in the Kingdom of Naples, with the Title of Duke or Prince, not less worth than the yearly Rent of thirty thousand Ducats. And to the Cardinal of York, for his great pains and service in this Business, they offer another Estate in Italy worth ten thousand Ducats yearly.

The Cardinal 10000.

15. That the Confederates shall make no Treaty with others than these who are mentioned in this present Concord: And that, if, before this time, they have made any, it be reputed as of no force and value.

16. That, before the ratification of this Concord, every one, who is contain'd in it, shall name his Friends, provided, that they be not Subjects, nor Vassals, or Enemies of the greater part. And so the Pope nominated the King of England, and the Marquis of Mantua, reserving the naming of the rest within the time appointed. The King of France naming the King of England, Scotland, Navarre, Portugal, Polonia, Hungaria, the Dukes of Savoy, Lorain, and Gueldres, and the thirteen Cantons of the Swiss. The Venetians nominated the King of England, reserving the naming of the rest within the time appointed.

17. That the French King send his Moneys within the space of a Month to Rome, or consign them to Venice or Florence, and give security for payment to the Bankers six days before every Month.

18. That all, who enter the League, shall, in the space of one Month, approve and confirm it. And if the Duke of Milan, because he is straitly besieged, cannot perform his part, that then the Pope and Venetians shall sign it for him.

And thus far I have follow'd the Spanish Relation. By the French I find only such a League was sign'd at Cognac in France, the two and twentieth of May 1526.

Our King finding himself thus chosen Protector of the League, advises what to do; which being accordingly debated by his Council, it was resolv'd, most prudently, that he should not be a Party, where he might be a Judge.

The Emperor also, inform'd hereof, protested against Clement VII, as an ungrateful Person; he having been by his favour first made Cardinal, and after Pope, in despite of Cardinal Soderino's Allegation, that he was a Bastard, and, therefore, incapable of either of the said Dig-1526. nities: Neither had he other evasion to clear himself, but that he produc'd Witnesses, how his Father, Julian de Medicis, before his Death, (which he receiv'd by a stab as the Priest lift up the Host) had at length marry'd his Mother. Against the French King he exclaim'd, as perjur'd and false, and against the Venetians, as unconstant. Howsoever, his greatest care was how to divide them. Therefore, though in Italy, upon publishing of the League (July 8.) solemnly, by the Pope, July 8. they levy'd their appointed numbers, yet Francis, being put in hope of the restitution of his Children, delay'd so much on his part, that, at last, the Imperial Army constrain'd Sforza to yield Milan, reserving yet the Revenues thereof to July 24. his use, as hoping thereby to content him. But the despised and distrustful Duke, not satisfied herewith, fled to the Forces, which the League had then on Foot, in Italy, of which the Duke of Urbino was made General. This while the Emperor was advertis'd, how, in sequence of the Pope's Relaxation of Francis his Oath, the Parliament of Paris and Kings Council had disannull'd and annihilated the Concord of Madrid, as being concluded by a Person who was constrain'd, and in Prison. To colour yet this refusal, Francis sent Ambassadors to Granada, (where the Emperor was) to tell him again, Burgundy could not be alienated from the French Crown; and that, if he would return his Sons at a reasonable Ransom, (which I find by the French was two Millions of Crowns) he would take his Sister Leonora for his Queen; if not, that he would recover them by force. The several Ambassadors also of the Confederates, which were in his Court at that time, (and particularly the English) concurr'd herein; requiring further, that he should recal the Spaniards out of Lombardy, and restore Francisco Sforza; leave his pretence to Naples, and not go to Italy with an Army; and that he should pay the King of England, all the Contractors of the League, in case of refusal, denouncing War. The Emperor answered, That the French King should do ill, not to keep his Oath and Promise. Neither could he excuse himself sufficiently by laying the fault on his Parliament or Kingdom, they being privy and consenting to it. that he would detain the Hostages; and, for the Queen Leonora, she was not demanded in such terms as it was fit to send her. For Francisco Sforza, that he would chastise him as his Vassal. That he would hold his right in Naples. That he would go to Italy, when and how he list. And that, if all made War against him, he would, by the help of his good Subjects, defend himself against them all, and that he would pay the King of England with French Money.

Concord of Madrid declar'd Null.

Francis's Message to Charles.

Charles's Answer.

I must return now a while to speak of home Businesses, that the Reader may see wherefore our active King prevail'd himself no more nor otherwise of these great occasions. It was only for want of Money; the scarcity whereof also was the excuse his People made, for not furnishing those Contributions he demanded. Hereupon our King inquires into the Causes: Among which because secret transportation of Money was thought one of the greatest, he advises concerning the remedy. All his Counsellors yet did not concur in the same opinion; for some affirm'd, no Merchant would carry away Coin unless he found gain by it; and that this, returning home again, enrich'd the Country. Others said, there were subtleties yet, which, if order were not taken, would drain away our Monies insensibly; it being manifest to all, that would take the pains to consider it, that, unless the Commodities and Coin of our Country kept both Standard and proportion with those, with whom we Traffick, there would be loss. That the crafty Flemings, therefore, when they desir'd to raise the Reasons against exporting Coin.

1526. the Price of their Commodities, inhauc'd likewise the Value of our Money, especially Gold; lest our Merchants should be discouraged to buy, when they find the Price of the Commodity so much rais'd. The consequence whereof was, that as our Merchants desir'd, by Stealth, to convey over their Money in Specie, as having, thereby, the benefit of the inhancing; whereas if they receiv'd it in the Low-Countries by Bill of Credit or Exchange, they should not only lose this benefit, but pay somewhat to those who furnish'd them. Again, that when our Merchants had occasion to return from the Low-Countries, they were not suffer'd to carry back their Monies in Specie, but were forc'd to take Letters of Exchange for them in England, by which they lost again. Thus, notwithstanding all Prohibitions and Searches, great Sums were convey'd over, to the impoverishing of the Kingdom. The only Remedy whereof therefore was, to cry up our Money at home, to the same rate that it passeth at abroad, which will both keep our Money from transporting, and make the Exchange without loss: Neither was there other means to prevent these Inconveniencies; which had now extended so far, that our Gold was as frequent and current among our Neighbours, almost, as at home; whereas yet, little, or none of their Gold was to be found in our ordinary Payments. Besides, they made another advantage hereof: For as their Standard was baser than ours, so they coin'd our Gold again, and made no little profit that way. Thus did our Neighbours many ways procure the Wealth of their Country, and Damage of ours; and would do more, when timely Order were not taken. Which our Historians have thought worth the setting down, and my self have the more insist'd on, both to shew the rate of Gold and Silver in those times, and to help the Reader to understand the second enhancing under this King, Anno 1544. Therefore thus I collect. The Angel-Noble of Gold was hitherto in weight of an Ounce, in estimation six Shillings eight Pence of Silver, which Silver was two Ounces. Thus the Proportion of Gold to Silver was Twelve to One. Again, an Ounce of Silver (or Half-angel) pass'd for three Shillings four Pence; so twelve Ounces (or a Pound) was just forty Shillings, which is two Pound, as we commonly count our Money.

Sept. But Henry VIII. now, by Proclamation, advancing the Value of both (one tenth part) the Angel was rais'd to seven Shillings four Pence (which was the rate at which it pass'd in the Low-Countries.) And, consequently, an Ounce of Gold estimated at Forty four Shillings, and an Ounce of Silver three Shillings eight Pence, and a Pound Weight at Forty four Shillings, the proportion being (ut supra) twelve to one. The sudden Benefit of this appear'd such, that, in Novemb. November following, there was another enhancing of one Forty fourth Part. So that the Angel was seven Shillings six Pence, the Ounce of Gold Forty five Shillings, and the Ounce of Silver three Shillings nine Pence. And, by these means, much of our Gold (as our Historians observe) was brought back again. But, Anno 1544. 1544. these Metals were again enhanced one fifteenth part. So Gold came (from Forty five Shillings) to Forty eight Shillings an Ounce; and Silver (from three Shillings nine Pence an Ounce) to four Shillings; and a Pound Weight of Silver was Forty eight Shillings.

The Turks beat the Hungarians. This while Solymán brought Two hundred thousand Men into Hungary, with which (near Buda) he wholly defeated the Army of Louis King thereof, being Forty thousand, and constrain'd him to fly away; till, by the fall of his Horse, having his Leg engag'd, he was drown'd in less than a span-deep of Water and Mud, so that it concern'd all Christian Princes to make Peace, but chiefly the Emperor, whose Sister King Lewis had married; and whose Brother Ferdinand, in the Right of his Wife Anne, Sister and Heir to the said King of Hungary and Bohemia, claim'd to succeed in both Kingdoms. Francis, being not ignorant hereof, thought fit to prevail himself of the occasion: Therefore he sent in September, 1526, the Archbishop of Bourdeaux (with whom also the Nuntio and Venetian Ambassadors join'd Offices) to desire the Emperor to send back his Children, and to accept some honest Ransom in Money; promising, withal, his Love and Friendship. But Charles, now incens'd, told the Archbishop, that, if he would have his Children, he must according to his Oath and Promise, return Prisoner himself; (adding, that his Kingdom could not hinder him herein, however he pretended they would not consent to the restitution of Burgundy.) Wherein yet, he should but imitate the Example of King John his Predecessor; who, being Prisoner in England, and permitted to go home upon the like Terms, did (when he was not able to pay his Ransom) most faithfully return again, and yield his Body unto Custody, where he dy'd. Then, taking the Ambassador aside, (as Sandoval hath it) he bid him tell the French King his Master, that he had done Laschement and Meschamment, in breaking the Concord of Madrid, and that, if he deny'd it, he would make it good in Person against him. But Francis wanted not Courage to reply in the same Language, as will appear afterwards.

In the mean time, as he thought it concern'd him to defend his Reputation in any probable way, rather than to confess in himself so notable a Fallhood, he caus'd an Apology (penn'd by the Chancellor of France) to be publish'd, and sent to all Christian Princes, the Effect whereof was.

That the Emperor had first broke the Confederation of * Noyon, in denying the Tribute due for the Kingdom of Naples, the restitution of Navarre, and divers other Rights. Besides, that he had made War in Milan, which was his by Inheritance, the Concession of Popes, and Donation in Feud by Maximilian the Emperor. And, which was worst of all, had enticed his Vassal the Duke of Bourbon, to rebel against him, and invade Provence. That, thereupon, he had, indeed, drawn his Sword, and chased the Imperial Army from before Marseilles, and follow'd it to Italy, where he was unfortunately taken Prisoner; yet that he had protested to those who kept him there, that, if the Emperor requir'd unjust or impossible things, he would not perform them, but rather that he would revenge himself, when he was free. That, as he doubted lest through his absence, some Troubles might arise at home, he had procur'd his Liberty the best way he could. In the whole Frame whereof, if any thing were to be dislike'd, it must be rather imputed to the Emperor, who demanded unreasonable Conditions, than to him who found no other means to escape. Notwithstanding, that, at his return, he had for the satisfaction of his Honour, requir'd of his chief Nobility and Counsellors, what he ought to do, both according to Equity, and the maintenance of his Royal Dignity, who upon mature Deliberation, answer'd: That insolent Pactions and Contracts, which comprehend in them notable Damage and Detriment to the Contractor, as being impos'd on him from one more powerful, ought to be held as violent, and involuntary, and therefore in themselves void. Besides, that, when he was sacred at Rheims, he was then sworn not to alienate any Patrimony of the Crown, from which Oath therefore, as being formerly made, and more obligatory, he could by no means depart; especially, when the Inhabitants of Burgundy (which Wherefore, if the Emperor pressed him to any thing contrary to these Duties and Obligations, he must think it was not without a special Providence from above, that he recover'd his Liberty. For how could the Emperor be ignorant, that, he was ty'd by the greatest Bond of Religion not to violate the Right of his Crown? Or how could he believe, that the Presidents of the Parliaments of France would consent hereunto, when they had taken their Oaths to the contrary? Howsoever, that none could think him false or perjur'd as long as the Hostages (as the Counter-value of all that was capitulated) had been deliver'd to the Emperor. Neither was it enough to say, that, in demanding Burgundy, the Emperor did but require his own; since that Dutchy was (long since) annexed to Normandy, and incorporated into the Crown of France by King John, and consequently govern'd by the same Laws; among which the Salick being principal, the Emperor's Title, as being claim'd from a Daughter, was excluded. Furthermore, that this Affair had been communicated to some out of this Kingdom, who understood well what was to be done in such Cases, and that he had receiv'd much Comfort. In conclusion, as there remain'd nothing else for him to do, so he had offer'd a condign Ransom in Money, and other good Conditions, which might both redeem his dear Children, and testify the Desire he had to recover his lately married Wife, who was also detain'd from him; yet that he was still refus'd. All which Premises being duly consider'd, he appeal'd to all Christian Princes and Potentates, as his Judges and Protectors, whether the Fault was his, and not rather the Emperors, who, by his injurious and impossible Demands, had frustrated himself.

Charles answers it.

Aug. 8. Treaty between K. Henry and Francis.

Thus (as many thought) did Francis strive to elude his Oath with Reason of State; and to cover the Breach of his Faith under a Pretext of Impossibility; without making any good Excuse at all (that is extant) for his not returning, (tho' more easily palliated than the rest;) both as suspicion of ill Usage might be held a kind of natural Defence and Evasion in this kind, and as his Kingdom would less consent hereunto, than to any other Condition. And certainly, had the Emperor sufficiently consider'd all these Circumstances, he would have follow'd their Counsel, who advis'd him, either to detain Francis till he had made some Advantage thereof, or else have let him go freely. Neither should the Clementine League (begun during the Imprisonment of Francis) have deterr'd him; as being not concluded so much in favour of Francis, as directed against him, whose Greatness did then many ways appear. So that to let Francis go, was but to fortifie his Adversaries against himself. He thought fit yet to command an Answer to this Apology; wherein the Title, by which he claim'd all his doubtful Possessions, (especially that of Naples and Provence) is set down, and the Fault laid on Francis, with as much Bitterness as the Cause requir'd; all which is set down by Sandoval.

Francis, finding now there was no other way to recover his Children, but by Force, makes all the Friends he can: Wherefore, about the end of July, sending some Ambassadors to our King, a League was concluded the eighth of August, Anno 1526, By which both Kings did oblige themselves reciprocally, not to Treat or Agree apart, or separately with the said Emperor, concerning the restitution of the two Children of Francis (when yet they were freely offer'd) nor the Money due from the Emperor to our King; but jointly and together. And, as for all other Businesses, they should pass without Derogation or Prejudice to their former Treaties, which were understood to remain entire. And that neither of the said Kings should, in any kind, assist the Emperor, when he were invaded by the other.

The Persons who chiefly procur'd this Treaty, 1526. were Giovanni Joachim (now call'd Monsieur de Vaulx) and Jean Brinon the Premier President of Rouen; who, being (as is before said) dispatch'd by Francis, came to King Henry, April 28, and, being admitted, the President, in an eloquent Oration in Latine, before our King, set in his Throne, and attended by the Ambassadors of the Pope, the Emperor, Venice and Florence, (who at this time labour'd to draw him into the League of Italy,) profess'd publicly, that it was the King's Goodness merely that made him abstain from France at this season, the occasion of invading it being so fair, during the Imprisonment of the King his Master. This being ended, Sir Thomas More, in the same Language, wittily answer'd him; concluding at last, that since they acknowledg'd this Goodness in the King, it should be an Obligation on him to continue it; wherewith the Ambassadors departed, much satisfied. Our King also, considering the Difficulties he found to procure Money, divided his time, betwixt Businesses at home and his Pleasures, not neglecting yet the Publick Weal of Christendom; for which purpose, he sent Sir John Wallop, not only to the Princes of Germany, exhorting them to join against the Turk, but to Mary Queen of Hungary, to comfort her for the loss of her Husband, adding withal such a supply of Money as might testify his Zeal to that Cause, was greater than theirs, who by Kindred and Neighbourhood to the Danger were more concern'd herein.

Pope's Letter to the Emperor.

June 23.

The Army of the late League having now begun a War, with some doubtful success, in Italy, the Pope, for his Justification, thought fit to write unto the Emperor, June 23, 1526, a kind of Apology for his taking Arms; alledging, that, as he was Pater Communis, he thought himself bound, by all the ways he could, to procure a General Good before any Particular, exhorting him for the rest, to moderate his immense Ambition, to give Peace to Italy, Pardon to Francisco Sforza Duke of Milan, and Contentment to all the Confederates in their just Demands. To which Charles sharply answer'd, (by Letter dated the seventeenth of September following) laying the fault of that Dissention among Christian Princes (which had given occasion to the Turk to conquer so much in Hungary) from himself, and on the Pope chiefly; telling him, among other things, that, regularly, he ought not to draw his Sword, when even it were against the Enemies of our Faith. Then, taxing him, as if he were ungrateful, false, and an Incendiary, he declares how much he had done for the Peace of Italy, and the Christian World, and among others, for Francisco Sforza, proceeding thence to a bitter Expostulation with the Pope, as is more at large set down by Sandoval; by whom also I find, that Charles sollicitated all the Cardinals, openly, to call a General Council for the good of Christendom, (as of themselves) when, otherwise, the Pope would not consent thereto.

Emperor's Reply.

Sept. 17.

Sandoval, & Sleid.

This while Don Hugo de Moncada coming into Italy to offer some Conditions of Peace unto the Pope, and finding they took no effect, treated secretly with Pompeo, Cardinal de Colonna, and others of that Family; who suddenly, with three thousand Men only, or as others say, six thousand, enter'd Rome, sacking part of it, and causing that Terror to the Pope, that he fled to the Castle of St. Angelo: Neither could he free himself, till he had agreed with Moncada for a Truce of four Months with the Emperor, and the withdrawing his Forces out of Lombardy, and a Pardon to all the Colnnesi. Whereupon Moncada also withdrew his Forces out of Rome.

Sept. 20.

Sept. 22.

Our King, being not yet inform'd hereof, had sent to Charles to offer his best Endeavours to the mediating of a Peace betwixt all Parties, protesting, 1526. ing, that if he accepted his Good-will herein, he would disclaim all Interest in the Clementine League, although that Ambassadors from all the Confederates were, at that instant, in his Court, sufficiently authorised to induce him into it. The Emperor hereupon sends Instructions to his Ambassadors resident in England, to treat accordingly of an end; to which purpose also he dispatches Don Hugo de Mendoza, who came to our Court January 11, to treat hereof. Howbeit, as matters were likely to be spun out into a greater length than flood with his Master's occasions, he shortly after broke off the Treaty. One Article whereof concerning the Spices of the East-Indies, I have thought fit to mention with particularity. For whereas by the decision of Pope Alexander VI. 1493, the East-Indies were given to the Portugals, and the Western to the Spaniards, so that the first Bound was a Line drawn from North to South, distant from the Islands of Cape Verde the space of four hundred Miles Westward, (all on this side being allotted to the Portugals, the other side being permitted to the Spaniards) this Line yet in favour of the Portugals (who by their Riches, Power at Sea, and Conquests in Africa, had made themselves much redoubted) was afterwards extended to eight hundred eighty eight Miles Westward; whereby betwixt these two neighbour Princes alone, a new World, with the immense Wealth belonging to it, was divided; yet with this Honour to the Portugal, that his Discoveries and Possessions gave denomination to both, the River Indus having occasion'd anciently the calling these Parts after its Name, and the New Conquests on the Spanish part, though hugely distant, following the Stile. Notwithstanding which large Empire, able to satisfy any exorbitant Ambition, there wanted not Emulation betwixt those Princes, inasmuch, that neither Alliance, Neighbourhood, nor the Danger they should incur, if other Princes prevail'd themselves of their Dissentions, could keep them in good Terms. Therefore I find by a Letter from Edward Lee, our King's Almoner, and now Ambassador in Spain, dat. at Medina del Campo, the twenty first of January, 1527, the Emperor laid claim to some Spices in the Eastern Parts, which I find, by Sandoval, to have been the Moluccas, lately discovered (as we have shew'd) by the Companions of Magellanes, to the no little prejudice of the Portugal, who, to buy out the King of Spain, offer'd two Millions of Ducats; which yet the Emperor accepted not for the present, but chose rather to offer a Treaty concerning them to our King; and, thereby, either to draw a great Sum of Money from him, and, together, to engage us in a Quarrel against the Portugals, while himself continued his Navigation securely to the West-Indies; or, at least, to detain him a while from a League he was now entering into with Francis. I do not find yet what Answer our King return'd thereto: But as no effect follow'd, I believe the Offer, though advantageous, was (out of ill Information concerning these Parts) rejected.

And now our King finding no good to be done by Treaty, and understanding, besides, what rough Usage the Pope had receiv'd from Moncada, resolves, according to his former League, to join against that Prince which appear'd most refractory. Therefore, conceiving the Fault to be in Charles, he enter'd presently into a strict League with Francis, chusing rather to concur with him particularly, than to embrace the Clementine Accord, as containing many Articles in it, that no way concern'd him. Therefore sending over Sir William Fitz-Williams, he proposes to Francis the Princess Mary in Marriage, (since Charles had deny'd him Leonora;) and, besides, offers to enter an Offensive League with him (such as his Confederates in Italy had made) for the recovery of his Children, and forcing the Emperor to reasonable Conditions. Francis, gladly accepting this Motion, demands the Princess Maria's Picture, which, together with our King's, is granted, and the Match treated in France by our Agents, the Bishop of Bath, and Fitz-Williams. The French King, if he marry'd her, requir'd she should be presently given up into his hands: But our King not agreeing thereunto, (by reason his Daughter was yet but eleven Years old) March the second, the Bishop of Tarbe, the Viscount of Tourenne, and Antoine Vescy, the President of Paris, came into England; where, on the last of April (as I find by the French, and our Records) three Treaties were concluded, in which these are the most remarkable Articles.

I.

In the first the preceding Treaty betwixt them Aug. 8. was confirm'd. Besides, it was agreed, that the said Kings should send their several Ambassadors to the Emperor, with Instructions conformable to each other, (so that their Language might be the same) as well concerning a Ransom of the Dauphin, and the Duke of Orleans (then Hostages with Charles) as Payment of the Debts due from him unto Henry, and other satisfaction for his Rights.

II.

That they should propose also, in name of the said King, such decent Conditions and Offers, which should be by them advis'd, and pursue them instantly with the said Charles. And, if either he refus'd, or made no Answer within twenty days next following, or otherwise, detain'd or excluded the said Ambassadors from coming to his Presence; that then, by their Heralds (or Kings of Arms) they should denounce War against him, in such Form, Manner, and Order, as should be declar'd in the second Treaty.

III.

Furthermore, it was concluded, that an Alternative Marriage (for so the French and our Records call it) should be made, betwixt Mary Daughter of the said King of England, and the said Francis, or the Duke of Orleans his Son; and that the determination of the Alternative Marriage should be reserv'd to the Interview of both Kings, in the Town of Calais, (at a moderate Expence) which should be declar'd presently after the refusal of Charles: In which case Henry should send unto Francis some faithful Person, to advise concerning the Particularities thereof. Also, the Articles of the said Alternative Marriage were remitted until the aforesaid time. Howsoever, it was presently agreed, that, if the said Princess Mary or her Issue did not succeed to the Crown of England, and that the said War were not made against Charles, that then this Treaty of a more strait Alliance should be void. Notwithstanding which, if the said Alternative Marriage were broken off by the common Consent of both Kings, they should yet be oblig'd reciprocally unto the said War. Upon condition still, that Francis should re-imburse (at convenient days of Payment) unto King Henry the Expences he should be at; and, besides, should furnish unto the said Henry, as long as he liv'd, yearly, of the Salt of Brouage, the value of fifteen thousand Crowns. But if the said

March 2. of Tarbe, the Viscount of Tourenne, and Antoine Vescy, the President of Paris, came into England; where, on the last of April (as I find by the French, and our Records) three Treaties were concluded, in which these are the most remarkable Articles.

1527. said Marriage were hindred on the part of Henry, the said Francis should not be bound to pay the aforefaid Expences of the War. On the other side, that he should pay them double, if the impediment proceeded from him.

2. By the second Treaty it was agreed, that presently after the refusal, delay, or non-admittance of their Ambassadors, the Intercourse, Commerce, and Traffick between their Subjects and those of the Emperor should be forbidden. Nevertheless, that, by their Ambassadors, they should offer the respite of forty days, to the intent that the Goods of their said Subjects, might be reciprocally withdrawn, if the said Emperor accepted it. That, for the making an actual War against him in the Low-Countries, an Army should be levy'd of thirty thousand Foot, and one thousand five hundred Men of Arms, à la Francoise, a Band of Artillery (so term'd then) and necessary Ammunition: Whereof Francis should furnish the aforefaid one thousand five hundred Men at Arms, and twenty thousand Foot; and Henry ten thousand Archers or Halberdiers, whom five hundred of the said Men at Arms should accompany and convey, whensoever, by the command of the said King, or their Generals, they should be divided from the Body of the Army. And that Victuals and other Provision should be deliver'd to them, at the same price that other Foot-men had it. That, for better keeping of the Narrow Seas, as well as for hindring all Intercourse and Traffick into the said Low-Countries, a Navy should be equipp'd of fifteen thousand Men, besides Mariners and Seamen. Whereof Francis should furnish ten thousand, and Henry five thousand, each of them at their proper cost and charges. That at Calais, Abbeville, or other the most commodious Towns, under the Obedience of the said Kings, certain Priviledg'd Marts or Fairs should be appointed; and that those Merchants which usually frequented the Low-Countries, should be drawn and invited thither, by all means possible. That the number of their said Armies, both by Sea and Land, should be kept intire, and that the Towns, and strong Places, which were conquer'd, and Prisoners taken, should be equally divided betwixt the said Kings. And that the Spices and other Merchandize of the Portugal Ships, passing by the narrow Seas, should not be permitted to be sold in the Low-Countries; but only in France and England, while the said War continued, according to the proportion of that use and necessity, that either of the said Kingdoms should have thereof; Provided yet, that if the King of Portugal did declare himself in favour of Charles, that, in this case, he should be held as their common Enemy, and his Goods and Subjects adjudg'd as good Prize. And that the like course should be held with all others who succour'd the Emperor in his said Wars; which neither of the said Kings should abandon or leave off, or otherwise treat of any Peace, Truce or other Cessation of Arms, without mutual consent. That place should be reserv'd for the Pope, Venetians, and Francisco Sforza, to be compris'd in the said Confederation; upon condition yet, they should continue the War begun by them in Italy, as long as the said Kings proceeded in their Wars in the Low-Countries. That the said Francis should dispose Henry de Albret King of Navarre, as also the Duke of Gueldres, and Robert de la March, Sieur de Sedan, to make War, on their part, upon the Countries of Charles next adjoining to them. That if John Sepuse, Vayvod of Transylvania, (pretending to the Kingdom of Hungary against Ferdinand King of Bohemia, and Brother of the said Charles) have not yet allied himself with the Turk, and that the said King of Bohemia did any way assist the Emperor against the said Kings; that then, by their joint Letters, they should animate and comfort the said John Sepuse to the defence of his Cause, to the end he might both abstain from any dependency on the Turk, and that he might divert the Succour of the said King of Bohemia. That also, by their joint Letters, they should signifie to the Princes of Germany this Confederation, together with the causes thereof, to the end they might forbear giving assistance to the Emperor, and be excited to bring the said Emperor unto Reason, which whensoever the said Emperor would accept, Francis should condescend thereunto, by the Intervention of Henry.

3. By the third Treaty, true, solid, firm, perpetual, and inviolable Peace, Amity, Union, Confederation, League, Intelligence, and Concord between the said Kings, and their Posterity, even to the end of the World, was accorded, by Decree, and Law, obliging them, and all Kings their Successors, no less than the Oaths they take at their Sacrings and Coronations. According whereunto, they did respectively promise and agree, that the said Kings and their Successors, should never be inquieted or molested, by them or any of their Successors, being Kings, in the Lands, Countries and Seigneuries, which either of them held for the present; which therefore they and their Heirs should quietly possess for ever. In consideration whereof, the said Francis did bind himself, and his Successors, Kings of France, to pay, every year, at two several terms, after the decease of the said King Henry, to all the Kings of England his Successors, forty six thousand Crowns de Soleil, and twenty four Sols Tournois, without deduction or prejudice of the Sum of 1800736. Crowns de Soleil, xxxii. Sols, due to the said Henry, by Obligation, and Treaty of the xxx. August 1525. or of that which should remain to be paid after his Decease; moreover the said Francis bound himself, and his Successors, Kings of France, to give of the Salt of Broilage yearly, as well to the said Henry, as to his Successors, to the value of 15000 Crowns, as is above mentioned. Furthermore, it was agreed, that, if any thing were attempted by any Subject or Ally of the said Kings contrary to this third Treaty, that their Peace and Amity should not yet be broken, but that the Offenders and Delinquents only should be punish'd. And in every one of the said three Treaties, an express Article was inserted, that the precedent Treaty of August 30. 1525. should be by them confirm'd, and no ways infring'd, or diminish'd. Lastly, by Letter or Agreement apart, bearing Date likewise 1527. the said Kings declar'd, that they would have themselves held, understood, and reputed as one and the same, and that either of them should be still concern'd in the other. These Treaties being concluded and sworn, (yet so as the Bishop of Tarbe made not a few doubts concerning the Princess Mary's Legitimation, which we shall find afterward occasion'd the Divorce,) they were dismiss'd, and honourably rewarded, and afterwards (as I find) sent by Francis to Spain.

While these things pass'd, the Pope, as soon as the Imperialists had quitted Rome, and left him at his liberty, sends to our King a Letter, Septemb. 24. complaining of the Indignities offer'd to his Person by Moncada, and the Colonnefi, desiring his Grace to set his hand to the revenge of it, and defence of the Apostolick See. Moreover he told our Ambassadors, (as they write,) that if the King of England, by whose encouragement (he saith,) he enter'd this Labyrinth, 1527. will yet effectually assist him, and the French King amend his former slackness, &c. he will do as he did before, notwithstanding his late agreement with Moncada, to which he holds himself not bound, because he was forc'd to it. Whereupon our King in November, sent him about thirty thousand Ducats for a Present. The Pope being thus heartned, cites the Cardinal Colonna to appear at Rome upon pain of Deprivation of his Dignity: He, on the other side, threatening to call a Council against him, and depose him as a Simoniac; the Pope hereupon gathers an Army, and with about ten thousand Men, led by the Comte de Vaudemont, Brother to the Duke of Lorain (to whom the Pope now pretended to give Naples as the right of his Family,) enters the Kingdom of Naples, takes divers places belonging to the Colonnese, and approacheth the very Gates of Naples. But now new Succours coming from Spain, the Pope was distress'd and glad to treat again with la Noy the Vice-Roy, and to give the Imperialists sixty thousand Ducats; whereupon also it was agreed, that the Armies should retire on either side, and a Cessation of War should be accorded, for eight Months. But the Pope finding this accord also too disadvantageous (as having disarm'd himself thereby, and discontented both the French and our King,) intends to disavow it, and to provide himself of Money by creating 14 Cardinals, for which he had three hundred thousand Ducats; but Bourbon prevented his Attempts. For being actually General of the Imperialists (who for want of pay, were to be maintain'd with Pillage,) he takes a pretext to invade Rome it self; for (as the intelligence in our Records hath it) coming near that City, May 5. he sent to the Pope for leave to pass through it, and his Territories into the Realm of Naples, and to have Victuals for his Money; but the Pope denying it, Bourbon resolves to assault Rome, which Renzo de Ceri, an old Commander, defended. But Bourbon having an Army of thirty thousand Men, upon May 6. 1527. marches directly to the Walls; where carrying a Ladder before the rest of the Soldiers, with which he meant to Scale the Town, a shot kill'd him: Which kind of Death, some Writers say, he call'd upon himself by a kind of Imprecation, when the last year, being at Milan, he made the Citizens buy their quiet at a great price; wishing he might be shot to death the first time he went to the Field, if they should be oppress'd any more by such Payments, which yet he forc'd them unto soon after. Bourbon being thus dead, Philibert de Chaalon, Prince of Aurange, threw a Cloak over his Body, as fearing it might discourage his Soldiers. But they, whether out of Indignation for this loss, or greediness to sack the Town, enter'd it with fury; killing in the way divers Bishops, and surprizing some Cardinals that were flying to the Castle Saint Angelo; the Pope and Renzo de Ceri being already retir'd thither with seventeen Cardinals, and the Ambassadors of England, France, Venice, and Florence, and about five hundred Soldiers. The Prince of Aurange (who now took upon him the charge of General) did all that was possible to restrain the Soldiers from their frequent Murthers and Pillage. Notwithstanding which, their impetuosity was such, that (without making difference, betwixt Holy places and Profane) they ransack'd the City for the space of six or seven days, killing above five thousand Men. Not content with this yet, they laid Siege to the Castle, and brought the Pope to such necessity, that to free himself from further danger, he and thirteen Cardinals, that now remain'd with him, agreed, that four hundred thousand Ducats should be paid to the Army within two Months, and the Castle of Saint Angelo, together with those of Ostia, and Civita Vecchia, and other places, should be deliver'd into the hands of the Imperialists. That the Pope with the said Cardinals should remain in the Castle, till part of the Money were paid, and good Hostages given for the rest. Which being done, that he should go to Cajeta, or some other place in the Kingdom of Naples, there to expect the Emperors pleasure.

- Hereupon the Guard and Service of the Popes Person was committed to Hernando de Alanzon, and Victuals put into the Castle; (where the Pope remain'd under some restraint, not free from danger, though otherwise reverenc'd in all appearance, according to his Dignity.) And now the Cardinal Colonna, and others that sided with the Emperor began to treat concerning a General Council, conformable to a late Bull of Pope Julius II, by which it was declar'd, that a Pope might be depriv'd from his Place, and another substituted, when there were cause for it; (and they pretended to prove this Pope a Simoniac.)
- It was now the beginning of June, 1527. when the Emperor being at Valledolid took notice of this Success, divulg'd already over all Christendom. Nevertheless he shew'd not any other sense thereof, than such as might be expected from one to whose Ambition and Power nothing could seem either great or new. Yet as he knew that all Christian Princes must needs be highly interested in the Imprisonment of the Head of their Church, so he thought fit to falsifie them herein. Among all which none seem'd so considerable as our King. To whom therefore in a Letter dated from Valledolid, Aug. 2. 1527. he made a kind of Apology for these proceedings; beginning first with giving an account thereof, then demanding our Kings Advice; thereupon declaring also the causes why his Army could not be withheld from invading of Rome. Yet so, as he disclaim'd any part, either the counselling or authorising thereof. Notwithstanding which (as God could draw good out of evil) so he hop'd a benefit might redound to Christendom thereby. Wherefore, that he should intreat him again, as his good Uncle and Brother, that he would send his Opinion what further was to be done in this case. And particularly, that he would assist him against the Enemies of our Faith; against whom, when their intestine Wars were compos'd, he resolv'd to imploy his Blood and Life. He forgot not also, upon the instance of ours and the French Ambassadors for the Popes liberty, to write gently unto his Holiness, offering his Love and Friendship in case he desir'd it. But to the chief Officers of his Army, by his Agents Antonio Veyeley, and Francisco de les Angeles, General of the Franciscans, he sent Instructions, which for some space amus'd them. For he commanded to set the Pope at liberty, yet so, as together they should provide, that from a Friend he should not become an Enemy. The Prince of Aurange, Hernando de Alanzon, and some other principal Commanders met hereupon; where, after a long Consultation, how to reconcile and interpret this Riddle, they resolv'd at last, that to despoil the Pope first of his Money, and then to deliver him, was the best way to comply with their Instructions. After therefore having extorted great Sums, not only for the Emperors Occasions, but their own; and forcing him to give Hostages for Security, he was dismiss'd out of the Castle of St. Angelo, as shall be told in its place. Yet so, as they suffer'd him not to depart out of

From whence upon the first surrender of the Castle he complain'd (as I find by our Records) to our King and Cardinal; protesting, that all the Help and Succour he could expect in this extremity, was from hence, and therefore implor'd his Assistance. Which Petition therefore he caus'd to be seconded by the thirteen Cardinals then with him, and to be dispatch'd hither by Gregory de Casalis, our Kings Agent in Rome, and now returning to England.

June 6. Clement implores the assistance of K. Henry.

This while the Ambassadors of our King in Spain, mediated potently for delivery of the Hostages upon more reasonable terms than had been hereunto propos'd; and in conclusion so prevail'd, that (as Sandoval hath it) Charles protested to our Ambassadors, that for his sake only he would relinquish his demand for the restitution of Burgundy, in which the difficulty of the Peace consisted. Adding further, that for the same reason, he would accept, as well for the Ransom of the two Sons of Francis, as for the Recompence of the great expences he was at for breach of the Concord of Madrid, the Sum only which Francis had offer'd voluntarily long before to Charles de la Noy (which were 2000000 Crowns;) upon Condition yet that Francis should observe the rest of the Articles in the said Concord. But all this again was interrupted by the continual intelligence of the Pope's Imprisonment, which so incens'd our King, that he would not so much as vouchsafe an answer to the above-mention'd Letter of Charles, but prepar'd to joyn in a stricter League with Francis, as judging that Charles would never in so insolent a manner have captivated the Pope, had he not pretended to Universal Monarchy.

K. Henry refuses to answer the Emperor's Letter.

Mar. 14. This while Ferdinand King of Hungary and Bobemia, sent Ambassadors hither to invite our King to joyn against the Turk. Notwithstanding which, as John Sepuse, Vayvod of Transylvania, pretending he was chosen King of Hungary by the greater part of the Nobility, had lately complain'd of Ferdinand's Usurpation to divers Christian Princes, and particularly to our King; so no other satisfaction was return'd, but a Protestation made by Sir Thomas More, that the fault was not our Kings if more were not done therein. All these miseries which he so much lamented, being occasion'd by the Ambition of Charles the Emperor, his Brother, who (notwithstanding his Mediation) could not be induc'd to accept the Overtures generally propos'd him for a Peace. And that till this were done, the Turk must needs prevail. Whereupon the Ambassadors were honourably rewarded and dismiss'd.

Mar. 14. as John Sepuse, Vayvod of Transylvania, pretending he was chosen King of Hungary by the greater part of the Nobility, had lately complain'd of Ferdinand's Usurpation to divers Christian Princes, and particularly to our King; so no other satisfaction was return'd, but a Protestation made by Sir Thomas More, that the fault was not our Kings if more were not done therein.

May 3. Our King at this time intended to proceed according to his Treaty with Francis; but as he now heard that Rome was sack'd, he made, May 29. a new Confederacy with him, by which they agreed mutually to desist from their War in the Low-Countries, and to transport it into Italy; according to which, Francis oblig'd himself to send an Army of 30000 Foot, and 1000 great Horse, to joyn with the Venetians, and others of the Clementine League. And that Henry should contribute thereunto

Monthly 32222 Crowns de Soleil, to be deducted out of the Money which the said Francis ow'd him; and that this Contribution should be understood to be in lieu of those Forces which by the late Treaty he should have furnish'd for the Wars in the Low-Countries. And that therefore all the other Articles of the said Treaty should remain in full effect and virtue. It was agreed also that Henry might send a Commissary which should visit the Army in Italy, and advertise him of all Passages. For the better accomplishment of which Treaties, Sir Thomas Bolten, Knight, lately * made Viscount Rochfort, and Sir Anthony Brown, being joyn'd in Commission with the Bishop of Bath, (then Resident at Paris,) were commanded to see Francis sworn thereunto, which accordingly was perform'd. Sir Francis Pointz, Knight also, upon the tenth of May, 1527. was sent to Spain, where Doctor Edward Lee, and Hierome Bishop of Worcester, (lately come from Rome, and dispatch'd to the Emperor,) were Resident on the part of our King. To accompany him in which Journey and Negotiation, Clarenceaux King of Arms was sent to act his part, when the gentle persuasions of our Ambassadors could not prevail. The Proposition on their part to be made, was briefly this. That in regard our King was at half the charge of the War, Charles should send him half the Prize and Booty taken at Pavia, and one of the two Hostages; and that if he deny'd, Clarenceaux should denounce him War. To this rough Message Charles answer'd with much Gravity; That the Proposition made was of great moment on either part. So that whether he accepted or refus'd it, it was fit he took time to advise with himself, both that his good will to our King might be conserv'd, and Francis might be us'd according to his demerits, who had so perditionously behav'd himself, that he had broke his promise almost before he made it. Therefore that he would declare his resolution by Letters unto Henry; and that, till then, he would make them no absolute Answer. All which was done purposely by Charles, that he might gain time. Our King and Francis being advertis'd of this dilatory Reply, and together of the Popes distress, would no longer intermit to give order for their own, as well as the general Affairs of Christendom. Therefore our Cardinal was commanded to France, both for concluding the Marriage of our Princess Mary, either with Francis or the Duke of Orleans his Son, (as is before mention'd) as also for other occasions, which shall be hereafter declar'd. Though whatsoever they treated concerning her Marriage in so many places, and with Persons of so different Ages, her Husband Philip the Second, was now but newly born at Valledolid, May 21. 1527.

The Cardinal having kist the Kings Hand, July 3. and receiv'd his Instructions, arriv'd at Calais with a Noble Equipage, being near a thousand Horse, the eleventh of July, 1527. departing thence toward Boulogne, (leaving yet the Great Seal behind him in Calais with Doctor Taylor Master of the Rolls;) where he was met by Monsieur de Byron with a thousand Horse, and after by John Cardinal of Lorain, and the Chancellor of Alanzon, who accompany'd him in his way to Montreuil, and afterwards to Abbeville. Francis in the mean time assuring him by Letter, that Himself and Madame Louise his Mother would meet him at Amiens, as soon as he had confiscated the Lands of Bourbon, and extinguish'd his Title and Dignity. This occasion'd the Cardinals stay for some days, yet so as he wanted not a just exercise for that power which Francis had given him, wheresoever he went to release all those Prisoners he thought capable of Mercy. While he staid thus at Abbeville, the 1527. Bishop of Worcester, and Edward Lee, our Kings Ambassadors in Spain, sent him the Emperor's Demands, in case the restitution of Francis his Children were propos'd; which, though high, were to be qualified by our King, if his Highness so thought fitting, hereof therefore, by a Letter dated the twenty ninth of July, 1527 he advis'd our King; adding moreover, that though the Emperor were determin'd to train the Pope to Spain, (to which also he heard the Pope was inclin'd) yet that the Project was so dangerous, as it was not by any means to be suffer'd; since thereby Charles might both establish the Imperial Authority in Rome, and seize on the Patrimony of the Church, or at least constrain him to furnish what Money he would, and together compel him to make so many Cardinals of the Spanish Faction, as when the Pope died, would enable him to elect what Successor he pleas'd. Neither did he see how this could be avoided, unless Andrea Doria were commanded to use the Fleet he had then at Sea, for intercepting of the Pope; who, what shew soever he made of willingness to come to the Emperor, complain'd yet of his Captivity, as by a Letter written by the Popes own Hand in Ciphers, to his Highness, and convey'd by Gregory de Casalis, might appear; which also was confirm'd by divers Cardinals then attending him. Besides, that it were convenient, that the Forces his Highness was bound to furnish for the Wars of Italy, should be joyn'd with Lautrecb, (who was now design'd by Francis to pursue the War there) and employ'd to hinder the Popes passage; in which affair also, some Princes of Italy might be drawn to concur, when his Highness would write to them; all which was the rather to be speeded, for that the Bishop of Worcester had written from Spain, that the Emperor went to sow division betwixt him and Francis. This Letter was seconded by another of the same date, which yet contain'd only an overture for a meeting betwixt Madame Louise and himself, on the one part, and the Emperor on the other at Perpignan; wherein all these difficulties should be resolv'd. Moreover, by a Letter dated from Abbeville the thirty first of July, he certifies the King, how Monsieur de Bouclans had propos'd on the Emperors part, a Match betwixt the Duke of Richmond, natural Son to our King, and the Daughter of Portugal, with Milan for Dowry; which yet (as being colourable only) he thought fit should not be much insisted on. Only, because it was necessary to keep good correspondence with the Emperor, he thought it not amiss to entertain speech thereof. And together, (by a Letter the first of August,) to desire our Ambassadors in Spain, to quench all Rumours concerning a Divorce bruited now betwixt our King and the Queen; and to assure the Emperor, that the first Original thereof arose only from the objection which the Bishop of Tarbe (when he was lately in England) made, concerning the Legitimation of the Princess Mary. At last, Francis, together with Madame Louise his Mother, coming to Amiens, the Cardinal with all his Train sets forth from Abbeville; whereof notice being given, Francis being Royally attended, meets him a Mile and half out of the Town; and after Protections that he ow'd his Liberty chiefly to our King, conducted him to his Lodging. Shortly after which, the Cardinal obtaining Audience, declar'd his business, consisting principally in three Points.

First, To require the Resolution of Francis concerning this Alternative of the Marriage a little before mentioned.

Secondly, To advise concerning the means of making Peace with the Emperor, upon such terms as the restitution of Francis his Children might be procur'd.

Thirdly, To determine how the Pope might be deliver'd out of Captivity; for which purpose our Historians say, that the Cardinal carry'd over with him 200000 l. of our Kings Treasure.

To the first, it was answer'd, That the Duke of Orleans (as more suiting in years) should be recommended to the Princess Mary.

To the second, That Francis for re-obtaining of his Children, would, among other things, renounce his claim in Milan.

To the third, little more was said, than That the Pope (as soon as possible) should be set free, by Mediation, or Force.

Besides which Points, an Interview was propos'd on our Kings part, betwixt him and Francis; but Francis excusing himself by reason of the great Charges he must be at till his Children were redeem'd, the matter was urg'd no farther.

After this, Francis brought our Cardinal to Compeigne; from whence he wrote to the King, that howsoever Francis did promise to renounce Milan, yet, that it was best not overstrictly to tie him to it, until his Highness discover'd whether the Emperor would really confer it in Dowry upon the Match formerly intimated. The King receiving thus much satisfaction by the Cardinals Negotiation, writ a Letter with his own Hand, acknowledging therein the good Service he had done him and the Kingdom divers ways; and particularly in three Treaties, concluded, Aug. 18. 1527. which, by the French and our Records, I find thus related.

Three other Treaties concluded between England and France, Aug. 18.

1. The first Treaty was concerning the Princess Mary; who (according to the Reference formerly made,) was to marry the Duke of Orleans, reserving notwithstanding unto a further time, the particularities of her Dote, Dowry, Transportation of the said Duke into England, the Charges of his Family, and the like. Furthermore it was declar'd, that if the said Marriage, either by Death, or consent of both Kings, or any other Accident, took no effect, That yet the other Treaties betwixt the said Kings (being of the thirtieth of August, 1525. and of the last of April 1527.) should remain in full force. The Interview of the two Kings, which (the last of April) was agreed to be at Calais, was remitted to a further time. The Contribution, to which the said Henry oblig'd himself for the War of Italy, was express'd to be twenty thousand Escus de Soleil for June, and for July thirty thousand, and for every of the Months of August, September, October, thirty two thousand two hundred twenty two Crowns. Upon Condition yet, that the said Contribution should be abated proportionably, if the number of Soldiers employ'd in the said War were diminish'd. That, after the said Month of October, Henry should contribute no more; and that, if Peace were made sooner, he should be discharg'd of the said Contribution. And finally, that neither Prince might demand of the other, his Money spent in this War, as long as the perpetual Peace was conserv'd.

2. By the second Treaty it was agreed, that the said Henry should not charge himself with the Protection and Assurance of the Peace, whensoever it should be concluded betwixt Francis and Charles; but in case only, that the said Peace could not otherwise be made, which therefore so hapning, the said Francis did agree, that he should take the said Protection and Warranty upon him. On condition yet, that nothing should be attempted by him by reason thereof, either against him, his Kingdom, or Subjects. Moreover, the said Henry consented, that, for the good of the intended Peace, the 1527. the Marriage betwixt Francis and Leonora Sister to Charles, should be validated and confirm'd; upon Condition yet, that thereby no prejudice should follow to the Treaties concluded betwixt them. That if any Peace were made with Charles, by which Francisco Sforza should enjoy Milan, it was declar'd by the said Kings, that they did not intend to renounce certain Pensions assign'd to either of them, upon the said Dutchy, by the League of Italy, when Francisco should refuse to pay them. That if War were commenc'd by the said Kings against Charles, upon his refusal of the Conditions offer'd to him, then the like Priviledges, Exemptions, and Liberties, that the English Merchants had (a year since) in Flanders, Brabant, Holland, and Zealand, they shall now have in other places under the obedience of Francis, as long as the said Wars should last; the said places to be nominated and agreed on hereafter.

3. By the third Treaty it was concluded, betwixt the said Kings, that no Council-General, summon'd by the Pope during his Captivity, or by the Emperors Authority, should take effect; and, that for this purpose they should cause their Clergy on either side, by publick and solemn Protestations to renounce and detest all such Convocation. That any Commandment, Sentence, Bull, Letter, or Breve proceeding from the said Pope, being in Captivity, and tending to the damage of the said Kings or Subjects, and especially to the prejudice of the Legation of the Cardinal of York, should neither be obey'd by them, nor suffer'd to be obey'd; but that they should be declar'd as of no effect, and the bringers of them punish'd. That during the said Captivity of the Pope, whatsoever by the Cardinal of York, (assisted by the Prelates of England assembled and call'd together by the Authority of the said King) should be determin'd concerning the Administration of Ecclesiastical Affairs in the said Kingdom of England, and other Countries being in the Dominion of the said Henry, should (the consent of the said King being first had,) be decreed and observ'd. (To confirm which Power, the Pope sent him a Bull, to be Vicar-General throughout all the Kings Dominions.) It was also agreed, that Francis and his Clergy should have the like power in France, and other his Dominions, during the Captivity of the Pope. And here certainly began the taste that our King took of governing (in chief) the Clergy; of which therefore, as well as the dissolution of Monasteries, it seems the first Arguments and Impressions were deriv'd from the Cardinal: who having now in a Conference with certain Cardinals at Compeigne, resolv'd that the aforesaid Order for the Government of the Church was in these times requisite, took on him the charge of our Ecclesiastical Affairs (though Guiccardine writes that he sent for a Bull to be the Legate in England, France, and Germany, and the Imperialists gave out that he attempted to make himself Pope of the English and French Church, by a Schism from the See of Rome.) The Passages betwixt the Cardinals above-mentioned being certified to Rome, September 16. Woolsey prepar'd to return. Whereupon Francis not only richly presented him, but conducted him through the Town, and upon his way about a Mile, being accompany'd with the Titular King of Navarre, the Popes Legate, and his prime Nobility. The Cardinal now hastening homeward, came to Calais, where having established a Mart, he arriv'd at Court toward the end of September, where much Demonstration of Affection was given him by our King. To correspond with this Ambassade, Francis sent Anne de Montmorency Grand Maistre, John du Bellay Bishop of Bayonne, John Brinon the Premier President de Rouen, and le Seigneur de Humieres, as his Ambassadors to ratifie the said League here. These, with divers other Cavaliers, (being in all about six hundred Horse) were conducted to London, 1527. October 20. and lodg'd in the Bishop of Londons Palace. After which, Audience being given them, they were, November 10. entertain'd by our King at Greenwich with a Feast, (the most sumptuous, saith Bellay, that ever I saw,) and then with a Comedy, in which his Daughter the Princess was an Actor. On this day also the King of England receiv'd at the hands of Montmorency, the Order of St. Michael; and Francis, with no less Solemnity, that of the Garter, in Paris. For which purpose our King had sent over Arthur Plantagenet Viscount Lisle, (natural Son to King Edward IV.) Sir Nicholas Carew Master of his Horse, Sir Anthony Brown, all Knights of this Order, and Sir Thomas Wriothesley Garter-Herald. Both Princes likewise giving their Oath and Seal (which was in Gold) for the Ratification of the late Treaty.

Charles, being not ignorant of these Treaties, thinks fit to prevent the execution of them, by a timely consent unto all that could in reason be expected from him. Therefore at Palencia, September 15. he offer'd this Agreement unto the French, English, and other Ambassadors residing in his Court; which also for the present they seem'd to accept. That the Article for the restitution of Burgundy, should be ras'd out of the Concord of Madrid, reserving still to the Emperor his Right. That Francis should pay for the Ransom of his Sons, the two Millions of Crowns which were offer'd. And that out of them so much should be allow'd as would pay our King. Furthermore, that Francis should take upon him to satisfy Henry, as well as to keep Charles indemnified from the Obligation, by which he ty'd himself in London by particular Treaty; which was, that he should pay unto Henry the ancient Pension which Francis paid him, together with any other Sum that Francis should refuse to pay only because the said Henry had declar'd himself his Enemy. That the French should oblige themselves to restore Genoa, and all the rest that they had taken in Lombardy, before the Hostages were rendred. That in the particular of the Duke of Milan, Charles should nominate and appoint certain Judges, who should determine the cause betwixt them. And that if he were not found culpable, then his Estate should be restor'd to him, and the Investiture given him; otherwise, that the Emperor should dispose thereof as Lord of the Feud. That, in all the rest, the Concord of Madrid should be observ'd, saving in some few points of small Importance.

When these Articles were approv'd on both sides, the Ambassadors of France said, that they wanted sufficient Authority from their King to sign them, which yet they promis'd to send for, and procure. And so the conclusion of Peace at this time was deferr'd on their part. Charles not much troubled herewith, returns to his former Arts of dividing our King from Francis. Therefore he sends privately to the Cardinal, And ap (now return'd from France,) offering him, besides p'ies to his ordinary Pension, large Sums for this purpose. Notwithstanding which (saith Polydore) because he had deny'd him the Archbishoprick of Toledo, to which (if we may believe the same Author) he vehemently aspir'd, he was found inexorable.

This year our King sent out two fair Ships to discover new Regions, then daily found out by the Portuguese and Spaniard; though, as no Success follow'd thereupon, I do not find the design pursu'd.

This while, Monsieur de Lautrec made ready an Army of twenty six thousand Foot, and two thou-

Wherewith the Clementine League (whose Forces were eleven thousand Foot, and about one thousand six hundred Horse) being much encourag'd, an Answer was sent to the Propositions made by the Emperor, to the Ambassadors of the League, at Palentia. For which purpose a Secretary of Francis came the twelfth of December 1527, to Bruges, (where Charles then was) publishing by the way that he brought a final Resolution of Peace; when yet indeed he brought Order only to defie Charles, as will appear afterwards. Yet, to shew some desire of Accommodation, the Ambassadors of England and France desir'd two Points of the Treaty of Palentia should be alter'd in this manner.

Proposals made to the Emperor from Henry and Francis.

The first was, That Francisco Sforza should be restor'd to his Estate; and, afterwards, Justice done concerning the Complaints made against him. The other was, That the Hostages should be remanded, before Francis should deliver up Genouia or Asti, or withdraw his Army out of Italy. And to induce Charles hereunto, it was offer'd by the French, to put security into the hands of our King, for the payment of three hundred thousand Ducats to Charles, in case of not rendring the said Towns, and withdrawing his Army. Charles reply'd, That tho' all this was Innovation upon the Treaty of Palentia; yet, to shew his desire of Peace, he would put security for payment of so much Money into the hands of our King, in case the French would agree to perform that which was concluded on their part. But the French Ambassador saying, He had no Order to make any other end, than what was propos'd, this great Affair remain'd suspended.

Our Ambassador perceiving this, proceeds upon his Instructions, and makes four Demands.

1. The first was, That without any delay, Charles should pay to the King his Master all that was lent him heretofore.
2. The next was, That he should pay him a Penalty of Five hundred thousand Ducats, because he did not marry the Princess Mary, as was agreed.
3. The third was, That he should satisfy for the Indemnity he undertook to discharge, upon the Declaration that our King made of War against Francis, (whereof mention is made formerly) which from the time it was due, was four Years and four Months.
4. Fourthly, That he should deliver the Pope; and make him satisfaction for the Loss and Damage he had sustain'd.

His Answer.

To which Charles answer'd: That he marvel'd why the King should press him so much, since he never deny'd the Debt; and that, if they requir'd from him the Money, they should give him the Security he enter'd into for the payment thereof. But our Ambassador saying, That they were kept among the Archives and Records of England; and that, for the rest, they were sufficiently authorized to give him an Acquittance: Charles knew not well how to argue the matter further. As for the Penalty of Marriage and Indemnity, he said he would send an express Messenger into England, to acquaint our King with the Reasons, why he did not hold himself bound to give any such satisfaction. And for the delivering of the Pope, he said, Order was, and should be given. And indeed, I find that about this very time, the Pope recover'd his liberty. Which because it was occasion'd by the proceeding of the French in Italy, let us look back a while on those Affairs.

The Army of the League formerly mention'd, being commanded by Odet de Foix Seigneur de Lautrech, (an able General) great hope was conceiv'd; both as he was supported by our King, and Francis, and the Venetians, at a common

Charge, (whereof our King's part, according to the French History, was 60000 Angelots the Month) and as the Imperial Army, which sack'd Rome, was much consum'd with the Plague. By Sea also, Andrea Doria of Genouia, who had the Command of the French King's Gallies, a brave Commander, was appointed with a strong Fleet to second him; who, accordingly, so scour'd all the Coast of Genouia, that no Shipping on those Quarters durst appear. This caused great scarcity of Victuals there; which being advertis'd to Doria, and afterwards to Lautrech, he sends Caesar Fregoso with 2000 Men thither; who, together with Doria, so prest that City on both sides, that, at last, it yielded; whereupon Theodoro de Trivulci was made Governor of it, on the behalf of the French King. After this, Lautrech took (in the name of Sforza, and for his use) Alexandria, the Country of Lomeline, the Cities of Vigueria, Biagras, and Novarra, and besieged Pavia, to the great displeasure of Antonio de Leyva (then Governor of Milan) who wanting Soldiers for himself, would yet spare some for defence of that Town. This did not hinder Lautrech yet to make a Breach and enter it, at the second Assault; where, in revenge of the King his Master's Misfortunes, he permitted his Army to exercise all manner of licentious Cruelty: And now Milan it self which remain'd only to make an entire Conquest of those Parts) began to shake; neither could it have resisted long, but that a Mystery of State preserv'd it. For, as Lautrech's chief Design was on Naples, to which he knew yet Sforza and the Venetians would not easily concur) so he thought fit to leave this strong place entire, as well to keep them in exercise, as to draw from them a greater dependance on the King his Master. For he understood well, that when he had put a Garrison in it in the Name of Sforza, that he and the Venetians would sooner have excluded him from his further passage to Naples, than given him any assistance; which would have frustrated both his chief Designs, since Francis pretended a like Title to Milan and Naples. Besides, the more moderate sort approv'd this course; for when the event of War had been prosperous or doubtful, it left a way open for Peace; while each Party having somewhat to require, better Overtures might be given for a general Accommodation. Lastly, these Intentions of Lautrech were much facilitated by the Intreaty of the Pope; who solicited him to expel the Remnant of the Imperial Army from the Patrimony of the Church. Lautrech hereupon marches forwards; whereof Antonio de Leyva being inform'd, sallies forth of Milan, and with his small Forces takes Biagras, and holds it, until Lautrech sending Pietro de Novarra back with 6000 Men, wan it again, and setled Sforza in the possession thereof. Lautrech continuing thus his March, finds the Duke of Ferrara, and Marquis of Mantua, ready to join him. The manner of weaker and inferior sort of Princes being ever to comply with the more puissant and victorious Army. The Sincerity yet of the Duke of Ferrara seem'd questionable; both as he had just cause to be offended with the Pope, and as he had, a good while since, rang'd himself with the Imperialists; nevertheless, upon the Treaty of a Match betwixt his eldest Son, and Renee Daughter of Louis XII. all was compos'd, and he receiv'd into the Confederacy. But among all, none was so much perplex'd as the Pope; who being not yet deliver'd from his Guards, knew not whether were better for him, to trust to the fair Words of Charles (whose Agents now treated with him) or to the assistance of the League. Neither could he (when this latter part was resolv'd) determine concerning

For as, to keep the Army of Lautrech at a distance, had been to leave himself in restraint still; so, to invite him to his Territories, had been to expose his Subjects to the Rapines of both Armies. Therefore he varied strangely in his private Advices, Answers, and Negotiations; insomuch that Lautrech, at last, was neither scandaliz'd with his Denials, nor confirm'd with his Promises. Howsoever, Lautrech thought fit to pursue his point; whereof Charles being advertis'd, resolv'd, by a timely and voluntary discharge of the Pope out of Prison, to prevent compulsion. Therefore he sends a particular Dispatch to Don Hugo de Moncada, to set him free upon these Conditions:

That the Pope shall not oppose Charles in the Affairs of Milan and Naples. That he should grant him a Croisade in Spain, and a Tenth of all Ecclesiastical Livings in all his Kingdoms. That Ostia and Civita Vecchia should remain in the hands of Charles, for security hereof. That he should consign to him la Civita Castellana, and the Castle of Furli, giving Hostages till it were done. That he should pay presently to the Almains 77000 Ducats, and to the Spaniard 35000; and that fifteen Days after his departure out of Rome, he should pay as much again to the Almains, and within three Months after give the rest, being in all about 300000 Ducats; and to deliver Hostages for performance hereof. Upon which Conditions he was to be set at liberty, December 10. But the Pope prevented this, by escaping in the Habit of a Merchant to Monte Fiascone, and thence to Orvieto, the Night before they promis'd to deliver him. His Hostages yet, the Cardinals of Cesis and Orsino, remain'd till the Money was paid; for obtaining of which, he was forc'd to have recourse to undecent ways, making (as Guiccardine hath it) divers Cardinals for Money, which, otherwise, deserv'd not that honour. He also gave the Spaniards licence for the alienating of Ecclesiastical Goods and Possessions, (and particularly in the Kingdom of Naples, to the value of 600000 Crowns, as our Records say;) giving therein a beginning (as some observe) to that Liberty which was afterwards taken in divers places. But Necessity is a violent Counsellor. Howsoever, the Pope was glad now, not only to find his Person free from Guards, but safe from Attempts. The Cardinal Colonna (as a latter Author affirms) having labour'd much with Hernando de Alanzon privately to make him away. Thus did the Pope enter, by Night, and without other company but that of Louis de Gonzaga, (the Complice of his escape) to a Town, unable any way to relieve or protect him. From whence yet, though despoil'd of all his Money, he found means, within a few Months, to return to his former Greatness and Authority. Being now at liberty, he sends word thereof to Cardinal Woolsey, acknowledging him a great Instrument thereof; and, withal, certifies our King of his Estate, desiring him to continue his protection of the See of Rome. Our Cardinal also (who the last Year had caus'd the Litany to be thus sung, Sancta Maria ora pro Clemente Papa, Sancte Petre, &c. as Charles, who kept him in Prison, had caus'd to be done in Spain, though ironically, as most Men conceiv'd it) now came, in great Triumph, to St. Paul's in London, and caus'd Te Deum to be sung, and Bonfires to be publicly made. The French Ambassador in Spain this while understanding well how matters were likely to pass, hasten'd the delivery of the Cartelles, of which the chief Cause was ill Usage of the Pope. For the performing whereof therefore, with more Solemnity and Ostentation, all the Ambassadors of England, France, Venice, Florence, and the rest, desir'd leave of the Emperor to depart, saying, their Commission was expir'd. To which Charles briefly answer'd, That he would detain them no longer, than till his own were recall'd from their Masters Courts. Hereupon it was thought fit to proceed unto the Defie; which though the Spaniards relate with much particularity and circumstance, I shall yet declare as briefly as I can, according to their History.

Upon the 22d of January, Anno Domini 1528, Jan. 22.

Charles being at Burgos, Clarenceaux and Guyenne came to the Court, and demanded Audience, which accordingly was granted them; hereupon the said Heralds, holding their Coats of Arms in their left hand, after three low Obeysances, presented themselves before Charles, who sat in an high Throne, being attended by his chief Nobles and Counsellors. Clarenceaux (whom Sir Francis Pointz, being now return'd to England, had left there for this purpose) begins first, saying:

'Sire, According to the Laws and Edicts ir- violably guarded by the Roman Emperors your Predecessors, as well as by all other Kings and Princes, We two in the name of our Kings, do present our selves before your Sacred Majesty, to declare some things on their part; beseeching your Majesty, that, having respect to the above-mention'd Laws and Edicts, you would, out of your Benignity and Clemency, vouchsafe to give us Security and good Usage in your Dominions, while we attend your Answer, and that you would grant us a safe Conduct, till we come to the Lands and Seigneuries of the Kings our Masters. The Emperor promising to accord this, Guyenne reads a Cartell, sent from the King his Master, the substance whereof was, 'That because Charles would not condescend to an honest and fitting Conclusion of Peace, nor pay unto the King of England that which he ow'd him, nor put the Pope at liberty, nor leave Italy in Quietness; the King, my Master, hath commanded me to tell you, to his great Grief and Displeasure, as also of his good Brother the King of England, that he shall from henceforth hold you his Enemy, notwithstanding to you, that, from this Day forwards, he intends not to keep any Contract or Agreement that may be for your Profit and Advantage, but that he will do you, and your Subjects, all the Harm he can, by War or otherwise, until, upon honest and fitting Conditions, you restore his Sons, put the Pope in liberty, pay the King of England that you owe him, and leave in Peace and Repose all his Allies and Confederates. Nevertheless, he offers Forty Days respite for the withdrawing your Subjects out of their Dominions, requiring the like for his.

Dated November 11. 1527. and signed, Guienne, King of Arms.

Charles hereunto reply'd presently, 'That he had understood all he had said on the part of the King his Master, and that he did marvel much, that he should defie him, since, being his Prisoner of War, and having his Faith plight-ed to him, he was disabled to proceed in this manner. Besides, it seem'd strange to him, that he should defie him now; since he had made War with him a long time, and yet never defy'd him. Yet, that he trusted in God, he should be able to defend himself. As for that ye say of the Pope, none is more sorry than my self for what is pass'd, as being done without my Knowledge or Consent; but, for that, I must advertise you, that I receiv'd assur'd News yesterday, that the Pope is at liberty. As for the Sons of the King your Master, he knows well I hold them as Hostages, and his Ambassadors know as well, that

As for that you say on the part of the King of England, my good Uncle and Brother, I believe that he is not well inform'd of all the passages in these Affairs; otherwise, that he would not have sent me this Message. But I shall advertise him of the whole Truth, and do believe, that, when he knows it, he will be the same to me that formerly he was. I never deny'd the Money he lent me; and am ready to pay it, as by right I am bound. Notwithstanding which, if he will needs make War against me, I can do no less than defend my self, and pray to God, he give me not more occasion to make war against him, than I have given him against me. Speech to him.
Then Clarenceaux, not by writing, but by word of mouth, spake to this effect. 'Sire, The King my Supreme Lord and Master, considering the necessity of Peace in the Christian World, as well for resisting the Turk, (who having taken the Isle of Rhodes, and Fortres of Belgrade, intends yet further Conquests) as for repressing the Heresies and Sects that are newly risen; and finding that your Commanders and Army have lately sack'd the City of Rome, and taken our holy Father Prisoner, together with divers Cardinals, who have been also put to Ransom, and that the Churches have been sacrilegiously profan'd, and all manner of Religious Orders put to the sword; insomuch that by these Cruelties and Mischiefs, the Air and Earth have been infected, and the Anger of God drawn down upon us, if we procure no reparation for them: And, because the Root and Beginning of these Wars proceeds from the Contention and Debates between You and the most Christian King: the King my Master, for giving an end to these Differences, hath, by his Ambassadors, propos'd to you, several times, such honest Conditions, that you ought not to refuse, if you desir'd Peace; and the rather, because your unreasonable Demands would be an ill Precedent for other Kings and Princes, that may be subject to the like Fortune: And whereas he also, as a Prince, being bound many ways to the protection of the Holy See, hath desir'd you to give the Pope intire liberty; and hath, oftentimes, requir'd the Money he lent you in the time of your Necessity, which yet you have not paid him:

'For these Causes, the King my Master hath thought fit to take a final Resolution, to desire you, without further delay, to condescend to Equity and Reason; and to tell you, that, since you have refus'd it hitherto, he could do no less than conclude a League with the Most Christian King, and other Confederates, by force of Arms to constrain you to that, which by right you ought to do. Wherefore, the said King my Master, and the Most Christian King, require you this once for all, to accept the Conditions they have offer'd you for Peace; declaring, in case of refusal, they must (though not without great Grief and Displeasure) hold you for their Enemy, denouncing War unto you thereupon, both by Sea and Land, and defying you with all their Forces. Yet, if you desire to recal your Subjects out of all their Dominions, as they on their part likewise require, they offer you forty Days respite for this purpose.

This being said, he put on his Coat of Arms, and afterwards gave his Speech under his hand, signing it, Clarenceaux, King of Arms.

The Answer Charles made to this, little differing from what he made to Guyenne, I shall not particularly relate.

Then Charles, calling Guyenne aside, desir'd him, among other things, to tell the King his Master, That he thought he was not well advertis'd of something that he told in Granada to his Ambassadors, which did concern him much: And that he did hold him to be so gentle a Prince, that, had he known it, he would have answer'd him before now. Wherefore, that he should do well, to take information thereof from his Ambassadors, since thereby he should understand, that I Charles have better kept what I promis'd at Madrid, than he hath done; and I pray you fail not to tell this to the King; which Guyenne promis'd; and so, doing his Obedience, departed. After which, the said Kings of Arms were call'd upon by Juan Aleman, Principal Secretary to the Emperor, to receive the Answer he sent to the Cartels. That, made to the French King, having little in it more than what is formerly set down, I shall mention no otherwise, save only that a Day was requir'd for Treaty of repealing the Merchants on either side.

To Clarenceaux he answer'd, by the Pen of his Secretary: 'That the Progress of the Turk in Christendom, and the Captivity of the Pope, were not occasion'd by him; and that the King of England ought not to complain, that he ever refus'd to condescend to honest and reasonable Terms of Agreement, since for his sake only, he had releas'd much of that, which Francis, of himself, had freely offer'd unto the Viceroy of Naples. And all this before ever Henry did intermeddle with the said Peace. Also, that, for the same reason, he had accorded divers other Conditions, which no other Persons could have persuaded him unto. Whereas, on the other side, Francis had never done any thing to comply with him. As to the second Point, which is concerning the liberty of the Pope, he was assur'd already from Italy, that he was free. So that no more needs to be said thereof. And, for that which pass'd in Rome, as soon as ever he was advertis'd thereof, he writ his Justification unto our King; desiring (withal) his Counsel and Assistance in that which he thought might be most for the Service of God, and Good of Christendom, to which yet he never answer'd. Which argu'd, he did not so much desire the liberty of the Pope (which by his loving Advice he might have procur'd) as to pick a Quarrel against him. And as for the Title which your King pretends of being Protector of the Pope, and Defender of the Faith, he would not yield to him the honour of that Duty, but that he would say only, that if both had done what they ought, it would have been better for Christendom: Neither should those have been born out and favour'd, who have so manifestly broken their Promise, which yet, according both to Divine and Human Right, ought to be conserv'd inviolable, both towards Friends and Enemies. As for the third Point, which speaks of the Debts demanded, it is answer'd, That the delay of Payment was caus'd by the Treaty betwixt your King's Ambassadors and me, according to which, the said Debt should be assign'd on Francis to pay; and, since that time, the Non-payment was occasion'd by want of sufficient Power in your King's Ambassadors to discharge me thereof. And as for the Obligation of Indemnity, there being in Arrear four Years and four Months at the rate of 133305 Crowns by the Year; and for the 500000 Crowns to be paid as a Penalty for not having match'd with the Princess Mary, it is answer'd, that the Ambassadors, will be divorc'd from the Queen his Wife, and marry with another, (notwithstanding the Dispensations granted on that behalf.) Since besides all other Injuries done herein, it will be manifest, his Intention was to make the Lady (he pretended to give me in Marriage) a Bastard; which yet as he could not easily believe, in a Prince he esteem'd so much, so, if any such purpose were, he must lay the Fault thereof upon the sinister and perverse Information of his Cardinal, whose unmeasurable Ambition and Covetousness was such, that because he refus'd to employ his Army in Italy, for the making him Pope by strong hand, (which also he had procur'd the King his Master to write for, and himself had intreated by some Letters written by his own hand;) and because also he would not satisfy him in other his inordinate and unreasonable Desires, he had many times declar'd, that he would give that Disturbance and Impediment to all his Businesses, that for this hundred Years the like had not been seen; so that he would make him repent it, when the Kingdom of England should be hazarded thereby. And certainly, if the King your Master will believe the evil Counsel of the Cardinal, it will be the right way to bring that to pass which he said, and consequently to be the ruine of your King and Master's Dominions. All which being consider'd, he protested he was not the Author of the Evils might follow hereupon. Finally, for the Business of the Merchants, he refer'd him to a further Treaty.

Thus did Clarenceaux, instead of satisfaction for the Money, and Kindnesses done to Charles, return with a Reply full of Offence and Evasion, unto his King and Master. Of which our King yet made no other account, than such as became one, who holding himself free from all Causes of Suspicion and Calumny, despised whatsoever in either kind was objected against him; since, having inviolably kept his Intention and Oath of falling on that Prince, which most interrupted the Publick Peace, he thought it now his part to join against Charles. For though in the beginning he interceded only for a Peace betwixt him and Francis, (refusing therefore to be the Chief and Protector of the Clementine League) yet finding now that the Generals and Army of Charles proceeded to such an enormous Outrage, as to take and hold the Pope Prisoner, he thought he could do no less than use all means that might conduce to his delivery, and the repressing of the exorbitant Ambition of Charles, who was thought not obscurely to aspire to an universal Monarchy. As for the little Cavils and Punctilios concerning the receiving of Giovanni Joachim, or the giving a civil ear to a proposition of Marriage in Scotland, and the like, as they were not, before some Contraventions of the part of Charles, so no effect did follow thereof in those times when Charles most suspected them. Though when our King was inform'd that Charles did, after his Treaty at Windsor, give and receive Overtures of Marriage in more than one place, it could not seem strange if he took the same liberty. As for the opening of the Letters, our Cardinal by particular Dispatches to Doctor Sampson, Resident in Spain, had a good while since so clear'd his King from any sinister Intention therein, that it ought not to have been further mention'd. For though indeed a Stranger passing the Watch about London, 1528. at an undue time of Night, and in a suspected manner, had some Letters taken from him, which afterwards were open'd by Sir Thomas More, and deliver'd to the Cardinal; yet the said Letters, which (as it appear'd afterwards) came from Monsieur de Praet, (who departed secretly out of England, without taking leave either of our King or his Council,) and were written in Ciphers, and contain'd many dangerous falsehoods, were, in due time, posted to the Emperor, (whereby also he might perceive what ill offices his said Ambassador did,) and the fault laid on de Praet, who chose rather to use his own Authority than to demand a Pass, in a time when he knew they could not otherwise be convey'd; which likewise was the excuse for intercepting another Messenger, who carry'd Letters to the Lady Margaret in Flanders, of the same Tenor; which yet she receiv'd presently after. And for the excuses not to pay the Money requir'd of him, or the penalty above-mention'd, they were but Arts, by which others might learn to deceive him in the same kind, and which therefore might instruct Francis to do the like.

Our Cardinal being thus incens'd against Charles, thought fit, as well in despite of him, as for the assertion of his Kings proceedings, publickly to give account, in the Star-chamber, of the whole State of this business; adding withal, that our King was resolv'd to make War against Charles. In the delivery whereof, though he did exaggerate the actions of Charles, even to the making him criminal of whatsoever either by the Law of God, or Man he could be guilty; yet our Merchants, who thereupon, should neither vent their chief Commodities in the Low-Countries, and Spain, nor again receive from thence supplies of some Commodities they stood in need of, would no way approve this War; as that, from which they saw neither profit or honour likely to ensue; especially, when they heard, the Pope was deliver'd from his Imprisonment. Nevertheless, the Cardinal, pursuing his Intentions, (as the Emperor had done first in Spain to the English and French,) seizeth on the Goods of the Subjects of Charles, and shortly after on the Person of his Ambassador Don Hugo de Mendoza, upon notice given, that our Ambassador was staid in Spain. The Consequence of this, was, that our Merchants presently found the like measure in the Low-Countries, to the great prejudice of that Intercourse and Commerce, which for many Ages had pass'd betwixt both Nations. Upon news yet, that our Ambassadors were well us'd in Spain, Hugo de Mendoza was not only set at liberty, but perswaded by some, that the Defiance which Clarenceaux had made unto Charles, was by him hastened, at the motion only of the French Ambassador. For which presumptuous act, he should therefore suffer Death, as soon as he return'd to Calais. Hugo de Mendoza, glad hereof, sends a dispatch by Post into Spain, acquainting Charles with all these Particularities. But as the Courier pass'd by Bayonne, the Governor thereof open'd and copy'd these Letters, which afterwards he shew'd Clarenceaux, as he return'd homewards. Clarenceaux, at first, seem'd much astonish'd, but, at last, considering he had good warrant from the Cardinal, for all his Proceedings, he recollects himself, and continues his Journey. He did not think fit yet to come to Calais, but, taking Ship at Boulogne, and landing at Rye, he secretly posted to Hampton Court, where the King was; using such means there, that he obtain'd speedy access to him, shewing, among other things, three Letters from the Cardinal, Authorizing this Defiance to Charles. He assur'd him also of the good usage he had re-ceiv'd there; insomuch, that (notwithstanding all these Rough Passages,) he had been rewarded with a Chain of 700 Ducats. Lastly, he shew'd the Copy of those Letters the Governor of Bayonne had intercepted; which so startled the King, that he protested against the Cardinal, as one, that not only usurp'd too much upon the Regal Authority, but represented things much otherwise than they were, unto him. The King hereupon sent for the Cardinal, and lays these Insolencies and Presumptions to his charge in such a manner, that, howsoever the Cardinal excus'd himself, the King was observ'd to mistrust him ever afterwards. The matter hereupon was brought to the body of the Council; where, notwithstanding the Cardinal alledg'd that nothing was done, but what was conformable to the Kings Intentions, as he conceiv'd them; yet, because in a matter of this high Consequence, he had proceeded too singly, without advising with the King and Council, he was reprov'd. In sequence whereof also (notwithstanding this design'd War) some Overtures were made for keeping the Commerce betwixt us, and the Low-Country-men still open, if it could be fairly done. Therefore the Dutch-men were Licens'd to depart home, the Spaniards yet being not permitted to go, till it appear'd, how our Merchants were us'd there.

The Lady Margaret, Regent of the Low-Countries, being inform'd hereof, doth in exchange of this Courtesie, dismiss our English likewise, yet retaineth their Goods, until she might hear how the Spaniards were us'd in England, but together assures them, that when she is satisfied thereof, all things should be safely restor'd. And now our Merchants (who us'd not the Trade to the many Northern and remote Countries they now frequent) foreseeing the consequence of these Wars, refus'd to buy the Cloths that were brought to Blackwell-Hall in London; whereupon the Clothiers, Spinners and Carders in many Shires of England began to mutiny. For appealing whereof, the Cardinal commands our Merchants to take off these Cloths, at a reasonable price, from the poor Mens hands, threatening, otherwise, that the King himself should buy them, and sell them to Strangers. But the swollen Merchants, little mov'd herewith, said, they had no reason to buy Commodities they knew not how to utter. Therefore, whatsoever was propos'd for Staples at Calais, or Abbeville, our Merchants did not, or at least would not understand it. But this discontentment did equally extend to the Inhabitants of the Low-Countries, and especially to Antwerp, where the chief Mart was. The Lady Margaret considering this also, and fearing lest any Insurrection might follow, sends over, by the advice of the Emperors Council, the Provost of Casselles, and one other, to join with Don Hugo de Mendoza, for the obtaining, if nothing else, yet of a Truce and abstinence from War. These Ambassadors having obtain'd Audience of the King, March 29. 1528. Mendoza said unto him.

Sire, The Emperor's Majesty doth acknowledge himself so much bound to your Grace for the many favours receiv'd from you, ever since his Minority, that he will by no means take the Defiance given by your Herald, as a peremptory denunciation of War, till he hath heard further of your pleasure. Therefore, his Council hath appointed these two Noble Persons and my self, to know your determinate Answer, and final Resolution herein. The King, pausing a while, as one that in his heart lov'd Charles, and yet was bound, by his late Treaty, to oppose him, answer'd; Of War I am nothing joyful, And of War I am less fearful, I thank God, as having both Men and Money

His Answer.

1528. ney in readines, which I know other Princes lack, for all their high words; and therefore to War I could soon agree. Yet, before I make you a determinate Answer herein, I shall declare some part of my Mind to you, and tell you accordingly, that, although your Master be a great Emperor, and mighty Prince, I cannot, nor may not, suffer him to bear down and destroy the Realm of France, which is our true Inheritance, and for which our Brother and Ally, the French King, pays us yearly a great Pension and Tribute; wherefore we, of Justice and Equity, must maintain that Land, out of which we have so fair a Rent, and such a Profit. The Provost of Casselles replying hereunto, told the King; That the ancient Love and Friendship which hath been betwixt your Realm and the House of Burgundy, Flanders, and the Low-Countries, is now so confirm'd and rooted in their Hearts, that I assure your Grace, that, next their Sovereign Lord, they would soonest live and die with you. In which regard he hop'd, that no new Alliance could corrupt and change this so long settled and inveterate Amity. Which yet we say not out of Fear, as being well furnish'd for War, but out of that true Affection, which we have ever born you. Therefore, though we offer you choice of War, or Peace, yet the Emperor intends no more herein, than to leave you the arbitrement of both. And thus much I will confess out of my Instructions, that if you chuse War, we have yet Commission in fitting Terms to sue for Peace; and if you chuse Peace, we have likewise Commission to thank you for it, and to offer both us and ours at your Command. Hugo de Mendoza, to second this, said, that, of very right, the Emperor and his Dominions ought to have your love and favour before the French King and his Nation. Since the French had never apply'd themselves to you, but in the time of their necessity; whereas the love on our part hath been ever inviolable. This was an Age, in which much Honour, and some Good-nature was to be found. Therefore our King, returning to his former affection to Charles (and the rather, for that he found so much was deferr'd to his Mediation, in the affairs of Francis, as is above related) and, besides, having an eye on the businesse of Scotland (as will appear hereafter) and, howsoever, being desirous to conserve his Stile and Dignity of Arbiter, told them, that, as he well perceiv'd the intent of their coming, so he would be well advis'd, how to make them a fitting Answer; saying, that, in the mean while, he was content there should be a Truce for a time; wherewith the Flemish Ambassadors return'd home, well satisfy'd that they had obtain'd this respite. The King hereupon adviseth with his Counsellors; among whom, though those who adhered to Woolsey, did persuade a War, yet the greater part (who did secretly disaffect the Cardinal) told the King, That the Resultance of War in the Low-Countries could be nothing but a grievance to his Subjects, a decay of Trade, a diminution of his Customs, and addition to the greatness of Francis, who would have the advantage of all that was undertaken in this kind. Which being duly consider'd, it was thought fit to make an abstinence from War for eight Months, and until it appear'd (upon consultation betwixt the Emperors Ambassadors and his) how a General Peace might be made. Hereupon Letters were sent, not only to Spain and Flanders, but to France, manifesting the Reasons, why the King had, for a while, suspended this War. In which Estate also the businesse continued, till answer was brought from foreign Parts.

The Bishop of Bayonne, Resident here on the part of the French King, was no sooner advertis'd hereof but he demanded Audience; which being obtain'd, he saith, That, though he doubted not but his Highness did well remember the late League, concluded betwixt him and his Brother the French

King, which also was ratified and confirm'd by the three Estates of the Realm of France, by vertue whereof you have an Annual Pension and Tribute to a great value paid to you, in consideration whereof, you have promis'd to defend the said Realm against all Persons; yet, because it is well known to many, that the Emperors Ambassadors have labour'd the contrary, disposing your Highness (all they could) to infringe the said League, I thought it my part to put your Highness in mind thereof, assuring your Highness, for the rest, that, whensoever you should begin to make a War upon the Emperor and his Subjects, it would be a perpetual Obligation, not only on him, but on the whole French Nation. The King reply'd hereunto, that, though it were more easie to enter into Wars, than to end them with Honour and Profit, yet that he would preserve inviolable the League and Amity betwixt his Brother of France, and himself. So that the King, your Master, needs not doubt, but that I will defend his Country to the uttermost of my Power; though, I must tell you, that, when I could procure him an Honourable and Advantageous Peace, I should think I had deserv'd as well of him this way, as any other. Wherewith the Ambassador departed well contented, yet so, as he was in some more uncertainty concerning the intended War. Therefore he sollicitates the Cardinal, as his Masters best friend, to hasten the Forces, which our King had now in readines for a War with the Low-Countries: But, as the favour of the Cardinal began now somewhat to decline, so found he not that expedition which he was wont to receive in his Addresses. Howsoever, the War betwixt the French and Flemings continu'd. In which this memorable accident is recorded. That a French Ship lying at Margate, being set on by a Fleming, and finding her self too weak, the wind being fair for the River of Thames, packs on all her Sails, and makes for London. The Fleming, as eagerly pursuing her, overtakes and boards her near the Tower-Wharf; which Sir Edmund Walsingham, Lieutenant of the Tower, perceiving, calls his Men together, and seiz'd on them; where, though the Fleming boldly challeng'd his Prize, yet the Kings Council, considering, that (in this place) both of them were under the Kings Protection, it was thought fit to dismiss them freely on either side.

It appears before how Guyenne, King of Arms, charg'd himself with a Message from Charles the Emperor unto the King his Master, containing an Affront and kind of Challenge, which the said Charles had formerly declar'd to the Archbishop of Bourdeaux. Guyenne having now perform'd his part, Francis could no longer forbear to take notice of it. Yet, because it seems he did not sufficiently apprehend the relation which the said Archbishop of Bourdeaux made thereof, he requires of him more ample and clear information. The Archbishop hereupon writes to Charles, and craves, that, under his hand, he would set down what he told him by word of Mouth; for the rest, making some excuse, that he did not remember it better. Charles answers him, and repeats the words; shortly after which, Francis dispatches Guyenne with a Cartel; in the delivery whereof I shall set down the forms were us'd, the example being so rare.

Guyenne having obtain'd a safe conduct from Charles, who also commanded one Montalvo, a Gentleman, for his more security, by the way, to accompany him, comes to Monzon in Arragon, where Charles then was, 7th of June 1528. Having gotten Audience the next day, Charles sitting in his Throne, and being well attended by his prime Nobility and Prelates, expects him. Guyenne coming hereupon to the lower end of a great Hall, puts on his Coat of Arms, and after 1528. five low Obeysances made, casts himself on his Knees before Charles, and speaks thus.

K. of Fr. Sire, I beseech your Majesty, that, continuing the good usage I have receiv'd hitherto, you will give me leave to perform that, that belongs to my Office, and that, this being done, I may have leave safely to return. Charles answer'd, King of Arms, do thy Duty, and my Will is, that thou be always well Treated. Then Guyenne, rising up, said;

Sire, The King my Master, being advertis'd of the words you commanded me to tell him, and of that which, before and after, you have spoken against his Honour, desires so much to justifie it, before all the World, (as in truth he may,) that he hath commanded me, for answer, to present you this Writing, subscrib'd with his own Hand, which when your Majesty shall please to peruse, you will find, how intirely he satisfies all. Moreover, your Majesty will be pleas'd to give me leave to return to the King my Master, for I have no further Commission. This being said, he seem'd to offer a Paper unto Charles. Before yet Charles would take it, he said, King of Arms, hast thou Commission from thy King to read this Writing thou bringest? Guyenne answer'd, that he had. Then Emperor's Answer. Charles said, King of Arms, I have heard that which you have said, and will look on the Writing which you have brought, and will do in such sort, that my Honour shall be preserv'd. And, for the King your Master, he will have enough to do to keep his, it being a thing in a manner impossible; as for that which concerns my Justice, my Chancellor here shall deliver it. Then the Chancellor said, His Majesty, holding himself to the Protestations made heretofore on his part, protesteth here again, that, for any thing that either now, or hereafter, he shall say, or do, he doth not intend to prejudice or derogate from the Rights that belong unto him by the Capitulation of Madrid; and that, notwithstanding any breach on this particular occasion, it shall remain in full force and effect. And that this Protestation shall be understood, as distributed and reparted in all the proceedings, that shall hereafter pass in this matter.

When the Chancellor had spoken this, the Emperor said; King of Arms, although, for many Reasons, the King your Master be not capable of doing any Act in this kind, either against me or any else, yet, for the good of Christendom, and avoiding of more effusion of Blood, and for giving an end to these Wars, and for no other reason, I do enable him for this purpose; wherewith he took the Paper that Guyenne held in his Hand. Then Guyenne said to him; Sire, If the Answer that your Majesty shall send to the King my Master be the security of the Field, or Fighting-place, and that you please to give it me, I have Commission to bring it, and nothing else. Therefore your Majesty will be pleas'd not to force me to any thing else, but the said security of the Field, in which the King my Master will assuredly present himself, with those Arms with which he intends to defend himself. And for me, your Majesty will be pleas'd to let me depart. Charles answer'd, Your Master ought not to prescribe me what I am to do; I will do what I have said; for which cause, as well as that something may be in this Paper, to which I may reply by some particular Messenger, I charge you to procure him a safe Conduct, since you would not come without mine; which Guyenne promis'd; wherewith the Emperor calling Juan Aleman, his Secretary, charg'd him to Record all that had been done there. After which Guyenne (who seem'd to have taken his leave) said, Sire, I have another Paper to present your Majesty by the hands of Seigneur Aleman your Secretary, if your Majesty be pleas'd to command him to receive it; which Charles likewise permitted. Whereupon all the principal Persons present, and lastly Guyenne also, subscrib'd their Names unto the Record. This being done, the Emperor commanded his Secretary Aleman to read in an high voice the Cartel deliver'd by Guyenne.

The Cartel of Francis the French King, to Charles the Emperor.

1528. WE Francis by the grace of God King of France, The Chal-Lord of Genoua, &c. To you Charles, by the same grace, chosen Emperor of the Romans, King of Spain. We let you know that being advertis'd, how, in certain Answers given to our Ambassadors and Kings of Arms, (which for negotiating a Peace we sent unto you) you, desiring without reason to excuse your self, have accus'd us, saying, that you have our Faith plighted to you, and that hereupon contravening our promise, we are departed out of your hands and power. For defending of our Honour, which herein is, much against truth, impeach'd, we have thought fit to send you this Cartel; by which although we say, that no Man under restraint can plight his Faith, and that, though this excuse is very sufficient, yet, as we desire to give satisfaction to every one, and as well to our own honour, which we have kept, and will keep (God willing) to the death; We let you know, that, if either you have already, or shall hereafter lay to our charge any thing which may touch our Faith, or Liberty, or that we have done any thing, which a Cavalier that loves his honour ought not do; We say unto you, that you have ly'd in your Throat; and that as many times as you shall say it, you Lye; being resolv'd to defend our honour to the last period of our Life.

And since, against Truth, you have laid this Imputation on us, write not to us any more, but assure us the Field, and we will bring the Arms; Protesting that, if after this Declaration, you write to any part, or speak any words against our Honour, the shame of delaying the Combat shall be yours, since, being come to these terms, all cause of writing ceaseth.

Dated in our good Town and City of Paris, Mart. 28. Martii .8.
1527. before Easter. 1511.

Underneath which was plac'd the little Seal of Francis in Wax.

This being the substance of Francis his Cartel, Henry's was communicated beforehand to our King, who advic'd him only (as I find in our Records) not to give the Emperor that harsh word of the Lye. In the Paper deliver'd to the Secretary Aleman, a Relation was made of some passages between Francis, and the Seigneur de Granvele Ambassador of Charles, residing in the French Court, Sandow.
in which Francis pretended to excuse his breach of promise, by the constraint and necessity he was in, saying, among other things, that he yielded not himself to the Emperor, and therefore that he could not accuse him of breach of Faith. It was also declar'd there, how Francis caus'd the Cartel above-mention'd to be * read publicly before * Mart. 28.
the Emperor's Ambassadors. Moreover, Francis labour'd to avoid the imputation laid on him by Charles for defying him now, when yet he had made six or seven years War without sending any such Defiance. To which therefore he answer'd, That the Ambassadors of Charles had defied him first, at Dijon, and therefore it would not seem strange if he defended himself. The rest was little more than some Protestations against the late Imprisonment of the Pope, the detaining of his two Sons for Hostages, some Complement of Henry King of England, and some Excuses for not having answer'd this business sooner; among which, the following, being somewhat extravagant, seems worth the relating: For, whereas Charles objected against him, that he kept his promise in Madrid better to Francis, than Francis had done to him, he said he did not remember to have promis'd any thing there; for, concerning the Concord of Madrid, he said, it was set set

1528. set down in Writing; howsoever that he held himself sufficiently discharg'd from it, in regard he was not at liberty when he Sign'd it, nor afterwards set free upon his word, (which, in that case only, he thought himself bound to observe:) for the rest, professing he could call to mind nothing that might oblige him, but only that he said he would in Person assist Charles against the Turk, which he was ready to do likewise with all his Forces; assuring farther, that Charles should not so soon have his foot in the Stirrup for this purpose, but he would be before him in the Saddle. To all which the said Ambassador reply'd, he had no commission to hear, or treat of these Business, and therefore desir'd leave to depart, and safe conduct, the Emperor his Master having recall'd him. Whereunto Francis answer'd, that the Emperor his Master had forc'd him to these courses, and that he did esteem him so gentle a Prince, that, when he should understand this answer I make him, he would answer thereunto like a Gentleman, and not like a Lawyer: Because, if he did otherwise, he would send a Reply to his Chancellor, by an Advocate, a Person of his Quality, and an honest Man than he. For your particular, I have thought fit to let you know, that I shall cause you to be accompany'd to the Frontiers of my Dominions, to the intent that I may receive my Ambassadors at the time that I dismiss you. This was Sign'd by Robertet, Secretary to Francis.

The Spanish Ambassador's reply to these excuses.

Hereupon Charles resolves, by Burgundy his King of Arms, to send his Reply unto Francis, bearing date June 28. 1528.

The Cartel and reply of Charles the Emperor, to Francis the French King.

Charles's Answer to Francis's Challenge.

CHARLES by the divine Clemency Emperor of the Romans, King of Germany and of Spain, &c. I do let know to you Francis, by the Grace of God King of France, that, upon the 8th of this Month of June, I receiv'd by Guyenne, your King of Arms, your Cartel, dated Mart. 28. which from a remoter place than Paris might have come hither in a shorter time; and conformable to that which on my part was said to your King of Arms, I answer to that which you say, That in certain answers given by me to the Ambassadors and Kings of Arms, whom for negotiating a Peace you sent unto me, in which you alledge, that, for excusing my self, without cause, I have accus'd you, I reply, that I have not seen any King of Arms on your part, but him that came to Burgos, to denounce War against me. And as for my self, having err'd in nothing, there is no need to excuse my self. But for you, it is your own faults that accuse you. And whereas you mention the plighting of your Faith to me, you say true, when you understand thereby the Capitulation of Madrid; where it appears, by certain Writings subscrib'd with your own Hand, that you would return to be my true Prisoner, in case you did not accomplish all, which by the said Capitulation was promis'd. But, that I should say, as you mention in your Cartel, that you, having plighted your Faith unto me, did contrary to your promise, go away, and escape my Hands, and Power, they are words which I never said, because I never pretended to hold your Faith, so, as not to go away, but to return in the form that was agreed. And if you made this good, you should neither be wanting to your Children, nor that which you owe unto your Honour. And to that you say, that, for defence of your Honour (which in this case should, much against truth, be impeach'd) you have thought fit to send your Cartel, by which you say, that although no Man under ward or restraint can plight his Faith, and that this excuse is very sufficient; Notwithstanding, as you desire to give satisfaction to every one, and as well unto your own Honour, which you say you have kept, and will keep (God willing) unto the Death, and thereupon do let me know, that, if either I have already, or shall hereafter lay to your charge any thing which may touch your Faith or Liberty, or that you have done any thing which a Cavalier that loves his Honour ought not to do, you say that I have Ly'd in my Throat, and, as many times as I shall say it, that I Lye. And that you are resolv'd to defend your Honour to the last period of your Life.

To this I answer, that, considering the form of the Capitulation, your excuse for being under restraint can have no place; but, since you make so small account of your Honour, I do not wonder that you deny your self to be oblig'd to accomplish your promise; for your words cannot vindicate your Honour. Therefore I have said, and will say (without Lying,) that you have done Lachement and Meschamment, in not keeping the Faith you gave me, according to the Capitulation of Madrid. And, in saying this, I do not charge you with things secret, or impossible to prove, since they appear by Writings, sign'd by your Hand, which you can neither excuse, nor deny: And if you will affirm the contrary, (since I have releas'd and enabled you only for this Combat) I say, that for the good of Christendom, and for avoiding the effusion of Blood, and for putting an end to this War, and to defend my just Demand, I shall, in my Person maintain against yours, that, that which I say, is true. But I will not return to you the Language you give me, since both your Actions (without that I or any else speak of them) make you a Liar, and that it is more easy afar off to talk in this manner, than near at hand. And, as for that which you say, that, since, against truth, I have laid this Imputation on you, that from henceforth I should write no more, but that I should assure you the Field, and that you will bring the Arms, I say, you must have patience a while, till I have laid your Actions open to you, and until I have writ you this Answer, by which I say, that I accept the appointing of the Field, and that I am content to assure it on my part, by all the reasonable ways that can be devis'd; and, for this effect, and for the better expedition thereof, I do now name the place for the said Combat, to be upon the River, which passeth between Fuentarabie and Andaja, in that part, and after that manner, which by agreement on both sides, shall be thought most secure and convenient. And, it seems that in reason you ought not to refuse this, or say it is not secure enough, since there you were set free, upon giving your Sons for Hostages, with your Faith and Promise to return. And considering as well that in the same River you did entrust your Person, and your Children; you may be confident now to hazard your own only, since I will as well hazard mine. And means shall be found out, that, notwithstanding the Situation of the place, neither of us shall have advantage of the other. And for this purpose, as well as for the election of Arms, (which I pretend of right to belong to me and not to you) and because in the conclusion of this business no trifling or delay may be admitted, we may send Gentlemen on both parts to view the said place; with sufficient power to treat and agree, as well concerning the security of the Field, as the choice of Arms, the day of Combat, and the rest that belongs hereunto. And if, within the space of XL. days after the delivery hereof, you neither answer nor advertise me of your intention herein, it will sufficiently appear, that the delay is on your part, which therefore shall be imputed, and laid to your charge, together with the default of not having accomplish'd that which you promis'd in Madrid. And whereas you protest, that if, after this Declaration, I say or write words contrary to your Honour, that the shame of delay of Combat shall be mine, since when matters are brought to these terms, all cause of writing ceaseth; your Protestations might have been well spar'd, since you cannot forbid me to say truth, though it grieve you. And that as well I am assur'd that the shame of delaying the Combat will not rest on me, 1528. me, since all the World may witness the desire I have to see an end thereof.

At Monzon in Arragon, June 28. 1528.

This also was certified under the Hand and Seal of Burgundy, King of Arms, who, together carry'd, in a Paper, the fourth Article of the Concord of Madrid. And, moreover, in a publick writing, declar'd that his Imperial Majesty commanded him, with all speed, to enquire an Answer thereof. And that he should offer his service for bringing of it, if Francis so thought fit. Yet if the said King would not send it but by another, then that he should assure Francis, on the part of his Imperial Majesty, that the said Messenger might come securely; and that a safe Conduct should be made him if he desir'd it; although his Imperial Majesty did not think it necessary for a King of Arms, as being a privileged Person. And, besides this, that he the said Burgundy should give to Robertet, Secretary to the King of France, or any other, whom the said King should appoint, an Answer, in writing, to that which Guyenne gave in presence of his Imperial Majesty, and, by his consent, to the Secretary Alemain. The tenor of which Writing being long, and containing little in it, but what is formerly set down, I shall pass over. And the rather, for that it took no more effect. Nevertheless, I must not omit to say that the excuse of Francis was not generally approv'd, nor his Cartel thought just. For if a Prisoner of War may avoid his promise, because he is under constraint, it would follow, that few or none would be taken, but rather kill'd upon the place; which would make the War not only more bloody and barbarous, but even destroy a principal part of that Jus Gentium, which in these cases hath been inviolably observ'd in all times. So that if Francis had excus'd his not returning by being a publick Person, and had said that his Obligation by Oath, when he was Crown'd, unto his People and Kingdom was a greater tie than that of his particular Honour; and, together, had alledg'd, that he could not obtain their consent, either to perform his Promise for restitution of Burgundy, or otherwise to go single out of his Kingdom; it was thought, by some, he might have vindicated himself in great part, and, indeed, laid some imputation on Charles, for demanding things impossible to perform. But I come to that which ensu'd; according to an Act which Burgundy gave under his Hand and Seal, as Authentick, for the justifying of the Emperor his Masters Reputation.

Burgundy arrives on the Frontiers of France.

This Burgundy, coming to Fuentarabie, sends a Trumpet 1. July 1528. to Monsieur de St. Bonet Governor of Bayonne, for the safe Conduct which Guyenne had promis'd. The Governor excus'd himself, as not having Commission; yet as Burgundy persisted in his Demand, the said Governor, about eight days afterwards, sent him word, that his safe-conduct was ready, if he brought security of the Field to Francis; requiring further to know if his Commission extended to any thing else. To which Burgundy answer'd, about seven days after, that the Emperor his Master had commanded him not to declare his Message to any, but Francis: And that, therefore, he had dispatch'd a Courier to his Imperial Majesty to know what answer he should make: who hath commanded me, hereupon, to let you know, that I do bring the security of the Field, and other things that concern the Combat, and Answer to the Cartel of the King your Master. To which, the next day following, the Governor answer'd again, that, if he brought the security of the Field, and nothing else, he should advertise him, and he would presently send a Gentleman to conduct him to the King his Master. To which about nine days after, Burgundy answer'd, that he did bring the security of the Field, and the rest did concern only the Combat, and the hastning thereof; which being so, he said he ought not to be deny'd, or prohibited to do his Office, since it was a thing never known that any should speak to one, and yet not hear his Answer; as if it were enough, for defending of ones Honour, to send a Cartel, without doing, or suffering any thing else. For which reason, and because the Emperor is desirous to shew that he is in earnest, he did require him this time for all, that, without more delay, he might receive his safe-conduct, as Guyenne had in the like case, and that, if he were delay'd, he protested that he had done all that was convenient for the discharge of the Dignity of the Emperor his Master, which you know of what Importance it is; and so expected his speedy Answer. No answer being return'd hereunto in the space of nine days more, (notwithstanding that the Governor had promis'd to send a Trumpet with an Answer) Burgundy thought fit to remember him of that promise, and therefore sends a Trumpet again; to which (as the Spanish History hath it) St. Bonet made no other Answer, but bid him return no more, and that Fuésse conel diablo, yet, as Burgundy would not depart, so at last the Governor of Bayonne sent him a Letter dated August 17. 1528. which declar'd, that the King his Master was offended with him, for having deferr'd the giving him safe-conduct so long, which therefore he promis'd to send him when he desir'd it; which Burgundy requiring out of hand, the Governor sent him. Whereupon Burgundy (who put on his Coat of Arms as soon as he was in the French Territories) came to Bayonne, where he protested to the Governor, that the demanding safe-conduct should be no derogation to his privilege belonging to him as King of Arms; and so, continuing his Journey, he came to Estampes, 2 September, where Guyenne attended him; staying yet there seven days, before he was permitted to go to Paris, (the King passing all that time in Hunting.) Being at length conducted to Paris, he would have worn his Coat of Arms, but was not suffer'd, it being told him, it was Cosa de un San Nicholas de Aldea, which I interpret, a thing not to be shew'd but upon Holy-days, or in a Country-Church.

But Burgundy protesting against this usage, (as being contrary to the Privileges of his place) those who conducted him went to the King, who, after some space, return'd, bringing with them two Notaries, to record what pass'd; before whom they said, that, if he desir'd to enter into Paris in his Coat of Arms, he would be in great danger of the People; and therefore if any inconvenience follow'd, he must not lay it to their charge. Notwithstanding which, some Persons being sent to secure him, he put on his Coat of Arms, and, the next day, obtain'd Audience of the King; who in a great Sale (or Hall) sat on his Throne, being attended by many Princes, Prelates, and Gentlemen; our Ambassadors also being present, to whom (as I find in our Records) he then shew'd the Order of the Garter upon his Leg, saying to them, that, seeing he went about an Act, wherein consisted the Honour of Knighthood, he thought he could not use a better Remembrance, than the said Garter. Burgundy now beginning to make his Obedience, the King, without giving him time to speak, said, King of Arms, hast thou perform'd thy Office as thou ought'st hitherto? Thou knowest what thou hast written in thy Letters; dost thou bring me the security of the Field

The King answer'd hereunto, No, unless you give first a Patent sign'd with your hand, that may contain the security of the Field, and nothing else. For thou knowest well the Contents of thy Safe-conduct. The Herald there beginning to speak, and saying, Sire, The Sacred Majesty of the Emperor— The King interrupted him, and said, I tell thee, that thou must not speak to me of any thing, because I have nothing to do with thee, but with thy Master; yet when thou shalt have given his Patent, and that the Field may be well assur'd me, then will I give thee licence to say what thou wilt, and not otherwise. Then he said, Sire, It was commanded me that I should read it, and afterwards give it you, if you be pleas'd to give me leave so to do; or that having given it you first, I should afterwards do what I am commanded. Then the King rose suddenly from his Throne, speaking angrily; What? Does thy Master think to establish new Customs in my Land? I will none of these Hypocrisies. He answer'd then, Sire, I am assur'd that the Emperor will do all that a brave and virtuous Prince ought to do. The King reply'd hereunto, That he thought so well of him, he did believe he would do so. Where-with Monsieur de Montmorency, who was the Grand Maître, began to say somewhat to the King, which the said King of Arms understood not; but the King passionately reply'd, No, no, I will not give him leave, unless I have the Surety of the Field; without which (he said) he should return as he came; and so bids the King of Arms speak no more unto him. Yet he reply'd, Sire, If you will not suffer me, I cannot do my Office, nor give you the Cartel of the Emperor, without your leave, which once again I ask; and if you will not give it me, because I may not err in my relation, I pray you give me by writing, that you deny it, reserving me yet your safe Conduct to return. Then Francis said, I will that it be given you; wherewithal the Herald departed. He then solicited Montmorency, the Grand Maître, to obtain leave for him once more to deliver the Emperor's Cartel. Notwithstanding which, he receiv'd no other Answer, but that the King would grant him no Audience, since his Commission was expir'd: Therefore that he might depart when it pleas'd him. Then Burgundy protested that the Fault was not in him, and much less in the Emperor his Master, and that the Emperor his Master would publish this in all places where he thought fit. Then the Secretary offer'd him a Relation of the business, which yet he wou'd not receive, in regard some Passages were omitted, and particularly the harsh Words, which the King gave him. Wherewith Burgundy return'd, and, at his coming to Court, deliver'd this Relation to the Emperor under his Hand and Seal. Which also I have follow'd, not that I would shew any Partiality to either side, but that it is the most particular, that I could meet with, among the several Relations that are extant, and for the most part agreeing with them.

Charles now considering what remain'd to be done for discharge of his Honour, brought the business to his Council of State and War; who all agreed, That the Refusal of Francis to hear the Reply to his Cartel had given end to this business; and, for the rest, that it was sufficient to certify certain principal Persons, both at home, and abroad, of all these Passages.

And this was the end of the Cartels and Points d'honneur betwixt these two great Princes; not for want of Courage, (in which both undoubtedly abounded) but for not being able to agree sufficiently between themselves concerning the Laws of Duel; of which therefore Men spake, in that Age, diversly, according to their several Affections; yet so, as few disinterested Persons denied, but that (notwithstanding the Punctualities of Francis) Charles had behav'd himself like a gentle Cavalier.

Whilst our King and the French were in that good Intelligence which is above-mention'd, it might seem probable that Scotland should be quiet: Their best Support ever coming from that Country. Yet such was the Power of the Douglasses at that time, that they seem'd to sway all things. For as they held a strict guard about the King, they made use of his Authority for their own ends. And particularly the Earl of Angus their chief. Nevertheless, as Queen Margaret had lately obtain'd at Rome a Divorce from the said Earl, and thereupon marry'd Henry Stuart, (shortly after created Lord Melfin) she drew many of the prime Nobility against him. Who yet attempting the King's delivery by force, were defeated near Lithgen, and the Earl of Lennox slain. Howbeit the King by Night slipping away from Angus, to the Castle of Sterling, resolves to summon a Parliament, and exauctorate the Douglasses; sending a Letter also to our King, to this purpose, (as our Records tell us) That the Earl of Angus, being made one of the chief about his Person, had wrought the exclusion of the rest, and got the whole guiding of his Person for two Years; in which time many evil Adventures happen'd. Moreover, that he conspir'd his Slaughter. This being done, he appoints the Parliament to be held September 4. Where the Douglasses being now depriv'd of their Publick Offices and Places, not only refus'd to come, but endeavour'd by all means to dissolve this Meeting. Therefore, hearing the King was departed out of Edinburgh, they sent some Troops of Horse to seize on it; which likewise they had perform'd, but that Robert Maxwell by the King's Command prevented them. Hereupon Angus retir'd to his own Castle, being about thirteen Miles distant. The King understanding hereof, comes to Edinburgh; Sept. 4. where, by vote of the Parliament, the Earl of Angus, George his Brother, Archibald his Uncle, and Alexander Dromond their dear Friend, were condemn'd, and their Goods confiscate, and Proclamation sent forth, that whosoever receiv'd them in House, or otherwise reliev'd them, should be subject to the same Punishment. Shortly after which, William (another Brother of the Earl, and Abbot of Holyrood) languish'd, and at last dy'd of Grief: Into whose place succeeded a Man, who, to avoid the Crime of being a Simoniac, us'd this notable Trick, as Buchanan hath it; for, hearing that the said William was at the point of Death, he lays a great Sum of Money, as a Wager, with the King, that he should not have the Donation of the next Abby that fell. The King (though young) understood his meaning; and as he wanted Money at that time, was content to win the Wager, and lose the Abby. The Douglasses despairing now of Mercy, spoil and forage the Country even to the Gates of Edinburgh; nor was all their Prey by Land; for a Ship, laden with precious Merchandise, being driven by a Tempest on that Coast, was rifled by them, and the chief Merchandise taken away; among which, some quantity of Cinnamon, which was left in the bottom of the Ship, being taken, the vulgar sort, not knowing the use thereof, burnt it for Fuel in their Houses, as Buchanan hath it. The more discontented sort of the Kingdom hearing that the Douglasses were thus in Arms, join with them. The King understanding this, and together finding that their Numbers and Power did daily increase, advis'd to raise Forces for taking a Castle of the Douglasses, (for which purpose

Octob. Our King hearing of these Stirs, sends some Ambassadors in October, 1528, to treat of an Accommodation. Neither was Francis averse, as desiring to dispose our King to a War against Charles. The Difficulties yet were such, that all that could be obtain'd, was a Truce for five Years more, upon condition, that the Douglases should deliver their Castles up, the King giving them some other Conditions; which yet being not in all points observ'd, they were forc'd to forsake their Country, and fly into England, where our King entertain'd them with a Pension, and, at all occasions, mediated their Restitution; which at last (but not till the Death of James V.) he effected, (as will appear:) Howbeit Alexander Dremond was receiv'd into favour; though, whether for his own Merit, or to divide him from the Douglases, is uncertain; for James Colvill, one of their Friends, and the late Abbot of Holyrood, (notwithstanding his bought Tide) were banish'd from Court.

The Affairs of Ireland.

The Business of Ireland passed thus. The Earl of Kildare formerly mention'd, being restor'd to his Place of Deputy, was yet still prosecuted by the Earl of Offory, upon pretext of favouring the Earl of Desmond; who, upon the Treaty he made first with the French King, and afterwards with the Emperor, to attempt Ireland, was declar'd Traitor. This prevail'd so far, that Kildare was sent for to the Council-Table, 1527, where the Cardinal, his old Enemy, declaim'd against him. But he wittily and boldly defended himself, as our History, and especially Campion, hath it at large. Howbeit he was committed, and more Accusations produced against him; and particularly, that the Invasion his Brethren had made upon the Earl of Offory, now the King's Deputy, proceeded from him; whereof also being convict, he was condemn'd, and repriv'd in the Tower. At which, the Cardinal offended, sends the Lieutenant a Warrant for his execution. But the Lieutenant, favouring Kildare, acquainted our King therewith; who thereupon not only respited his Death, but some while after pardon'd and sent him home to his Country; checking the Cardinal in the mean time not a little, for his Presumption.

The King checks the Cardinal for his Presumption.

Luther's Letter of Apology to K. Hen.

I shall now return to speak of the Affairs of Religion in Germany, which Luther more than any of the other Reformers did govern; which Credit also that he might dilate and conserve, he had a good while since written to our King a kind of Apology for the disrespectful Answer made to his Book; offering, for satisfaction, in some publick writing to acknowledge (together with his own Presumption) the King's singular worth. In this Letter, among other things, he says he understood that the King was not the Author of the Book, which, under his Name, came forth against him; but certain Sophisters, who, to insinuate themselves into his Favour, had put forth the Work under his Name; and then calls the Cardinal, Anglia Pestem. He added also, that he was informed, to his great Contentment, ipsum & fastidire genus illud perditorum hominum, & ad veri cognitionem animum adicere: After which, he inserts a brief Remonstrance of his Doctrines, and begs a favourable Answer. Our King having receiv'd this Letter, answers it sharply, laying Inconstancy and Levity to the charge of Luther, and defending his own Book, and the Cardinal, whom, he saith, he should love the better henceforth; and then objects to him his late incestuous Matrimonium with a Nun. This Answer also being sent the Pope, and printed, Luther, who took nothing so ill at this time, as that he shou'd be thought to change any of his Tenets and Opinions, lays the Fault on Christiern King of Denmark, who had given him hope, that our King, being treated gently and respectfully, would embrace the Reformed Doctrine; but now that he repented himself of this easy Language, though it were not new to him to lose his labour in this kind; for having written submissively and humbly heretofore to the Cardinal Cajetan, George Duke of Saxony, and Erasmus, he had found no success thereof, but that they were so much the fiercer against him. Howsoever, as his Doctrines had made no little progress in Germany, and that divers who did not manifestly declare themselves his Followers, did yet concur secretly in many of his Opinions, Charles, for repressing those Tumults, (which alteration of Religion doth commonly produce) thought fit to call an Assembly of the Princes of the Empire, to be held at Spire. For though the Decree made at Worms (where Luther was condemn'd) did yet stand in force, the Determinations did not yet appear so conclusive and satisfactory, that either side seem'd quieted therewith.

The Princes meeting at Spire in June 1526, the Emperor's Letters (dated from Sevil, March 23) were read to them. Wherein he declared, That he would shortly go to Rome to be crown'd, and talk with the Pope concerning a Council: In the mean time forbidding them to innovate ought in Religion, but conform themselves to the Decree of Worms. But the Reformed Cities answer'd, That the execution of the Decree of Worms would hazard a Sedition among the People; and that the Pope now gathering Forces against the Emperor, there was little hope of obtaining from him a General Council. Therefore, they desir'd the Emperor to permit a National Council of Germany, for the settling of Religion; or, if not, at least to suspend the Decree of Worms till a general Council be call'd. Things thus tending to an open Dissention, the Turk invading Hungary on the one part, and the French and Italians confederating against Charles on the other, Ferdinand (the Emperor's Deputy in this Diet) thought fit to condescend to a Decree to this effect: That there was great need of a Council, either general, or of the German Nation; and that it should begin within a Year, which the Emperor was to be intreated to grant. As concerning Religion, and the Decree of Worms, that, till one of those Councils be call'd, every Prince and State so behave themselves, as they may give a probable account of their Actions to God, and the Emperor. After this, a violent War betwixt the Emperor and French, the sacking of Rome, and Captivity of the Pope, (as is before related) discomposing all things, the Lutherans (or as they stil'd themselves the Evangelicks) increased in Germany, without that Charles thought it convenient to endeavour their suppression. Till at length, returning to good Terms with the Pope, and an Overture being made for an Accord with the French, he returns to the care of Religion, and, by Letters dated at Valledolid, August 1. 1528. appoints a Diet at Spire, to commence in February 1529. where though (he said) he could not, for his great Occasions, be present, yet he had intreated his Brother Ferdinand, Frederick the Palatine, and some others to appear for him. This Diet yet did not begin till March following; to which the discreet and peaceable Melancthon was, with much Honour, brought by the Elector of Saxony. Many other Princes and great Persons also came thither; among which not a few were unresolved enough in either Belief, till Controversies in Religion were better disputed, whereof yet they could find no end. For as long as in any Angle of the World there was either a new Opinion to examine,

At last the former Decree of Spire, 1526, was examined; in which, because it was then agreed, that, as concerning the Decree of Worms, and matter of Religion (in the mean time) till one of these Councils were held, every Prince and State should so behave themselves, as they may give a probable reason of their Actions to God and the Emperor; the Emperor now alledging it was misunderstood by divers, and desiring that this might be interpreted, propos'd the settling thereof in this manner.

The Emperor grants liberty of Conscience.

That all, who have obey'd the Emperor's Edict at Worms hitherto, should continue to obey it, until a Council were call'd, which was promis'd with all speed possible. That they who had so far entertain'd any new Doctrine, that they could not without danger leave it, should yet stay there, without multiplying Opinions, or printing new and offensive Books, (according to the Decree at Noremburg, 1524.) That the ancient Tenent about the Eucharist and the Mass should be held. That they who would go to the Mass should not be hinder'd. That Preachers follow that Interpretation of the Scriptures which the Church hath receiv'd and approv'd; abstaining from controverted Points, which should be determin'd by the Council. In the mean while, that difference of Opinion in matters of Religion should not be a breach of Peace, or occasion of wrong on either side. That no Prince should receive the Subjects of the other into his protection. That they who did otherwise should be under the Bann, (or proscrib'd.) But the Anabaptists were more shrewdly dealt withal, it being agreed, that they, who with Pertinacy did maintain that Doctrine, should be put to death.

April 19. 1529. German Princes protest against the Emperor's Order.

Many things yet were dislik'd herein by the Electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, the Dukes of Lunenburg, the Landgrave of Hessen, and divers others. Therefore they protested against it; and first they said, That the former Diet of Spire was more favourable, as permitting every one the exercise of his Religion, till a Council in Germany, or, otherwise, a General Council were call'd; and that there was no reason to vary from it, unless another more convenient were accorded. That, in the Assembly of Noremburg, they had deliver'd many Grievances to the Pope's Legat, for which yet no Remedy was given, nor indeed could be expected, until the said Council were call'd. As for the Mass, that it was sufficiently convicted by the Ministers of their Churches, and the Eucharist after the true manner restor'd. Wherefore, that they could by no means admit, that either they or their Subjects should be present at the Mass; since, when the use thereof might be receiv'd in their Churches, yet if two Divine Services, so discrepant, should be celebrated in the same place, much ill Example and Scandal must follow. And for the Point of the Eucharist, that though there were difference among the Reformed, yet that none ought to be condemn'd unheard. As for the Article, which prescribeth the Gospel to be interpreted according to the ordinary and receiv'd Doctrine of the Church, that it was well stated, when the true Church were first defin'd, until which, they would labour to interpret one place of Scripture by the other. That the last Decree at Spire was made for the sake of Peace and Concord, but not this; and therefore, that they altogether protested against it. In the mean while (until this General or Provincial Council for Germany were call'd) they promis'd to do nothing, that might justly be reprov'd. As for keeping of Peace, the taking of that which belongs to others. Anabaptists, and printing of Books, they said, they knew very well what was to be done.

This Protestation of the Princes being communicated to the chief Towns of Germany, (among which Strasburg, Noremburg, Ulm, Constance, Roteling, Winseim, Memingen, Lindaw, Kempten, Hailbrun, Norlingen, Sangal, and divers others are number'd) they all join'd so together, that the Name of Protestants took thence its original; which Name therefore (properly taken) seems to imply no more, than one resolv'd to embrace the above-mention'd Tenets, till some lawful Council, either General or Provincial, determin'd the contrary. Ferdinand, finding matters thus not to sort to that effect he desir'd, departs out of the Assembly betimes, though much entreated by the Elector of Saxony and the rest to stay, which he refusing, they appeal'd to the Emperor, and future Council.

1528. The Name Protestant first us'd.

Let us now see what was done in Italy this while; the Pope, though escap'd, was not yet suddenly provided with Counsel or Money. For as the Obligation he had to comply with the League, form'd in his defence, as well as desire of Revenge, made him correspond with Lautrech; so fear of returning again to Imprisonment, caus'd him to proceed so warily, that one might doubt his Intentions. Therefore he kept Lautrech still in much suspence; saying one while he desir'd an Universal Peace, then excusing himself for want of Men, Money, and Authority. Nevertheless, if the seat of War might be transferr'd out of the Patrimony of the Church, he said he would advise what was to be done. But here also, he knew not how to resolve. For as the War of Milan was in a manner ended, so himself had an eye upon the Kingdom of Naples; and for Florence, it was his native Country. Besides, he was sufficiently inform'd, that Francis, when he might have hope to recover his Children by fair means, would not assist him. All which reasons made him to temporise, even to the giving suspicion of deserting the League, whereof himself was Author. Hereupon Lautrech staid at Bononia, attending both Men to reinforce his Army, and further Instructions. But as Charles and Francis came to no Agreement, so he was commanded to proceed with his Army; in which Sir Robert Ferringham, Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber both to King Henry and Francis, had the Command of 200 Horse, paid by our King. Whereupon the Imperialists, knowing how much it concern'd them to defend the Kingdom of Naples, retir'd thither with a small remnant of their Army: Where they had enough to do, both as they were to resist the French, and as the People, desirous of Novelty, (after their giddy manner, when either they think themselves oppress'd, or that otherwise they hope for a milder Government) were ready to revolt, which also appear'd so much, that, long before Lautrech came to divers Towns, they yielded themselves; sending their Keys a days journey before them. The first that made head against them was the Prince of Aurange. But as his Forces were much inferior to the French, he at last retir'd to Naples; where yet he was so hated by Hugo de Moncada, and the Spaniards, that he was in danger of having the Gates shut against him. Lautrech now, pursuing his good Fortune, besieges Melfi. But as a number of Labourers and Husbandmen, unapt for War, were shut in it, so their Fears and Noises, while the Soldiers defended the Walls, made them retire to the Castle, as thinking they had other Enemies within. Whereof the French taking advantage, enter'd and sack'd the Town, making the Prince of Melfi, his Lady, and Children Prisoners. After which, divers other places yielded to the French, till they came to Naples, which was April 17, or as others say, May 1. 1528. And now their Army seem'd terrible, both as it was reforc'd by some Regiments of Swiss, and as the Inhabitants of Naples favour'd them. While that of the Spaniards was no greater, than what the Walls of Naples, and some little places in the 1528. Confines thereof did hold. Howbeit, as Lautrech consider'd that divers brave Commanders for the Imperialists were of this number, he did not think fit to invest the Town by Land, till he had blockt it up by Sea. Therefore Philippino Doria, Lieutenant to Andrea Doria, was commanded, with eight Gallies, to ride before the Haven. This troubled much the Besieg'd, for all the hope they had either of Victuals or Relief, was on that part. Hugo de Moncada, considering this, puts forth with a few Gallies in that Port against Doria, and begins a furious Fight; the Success whereof was, that he lost, at once, both Victory and Life, and about 700 more with him; Alonso de Avalos Marquis del Vasto, Ascanio de Colonna, and some others of Note, being taken Prisoners. This as it added great Courage to the French, so it occasion'd some Benefits to the Imperialists, both as it took away the Competition betwixt Moncada and the Prince of Aurange, (who now commanded in chief,) and as it open'd a way (as shall appear afterwards) for gaining Andrea Doria unto the Emperors Service.

The Siege continu'd yet four Months; Lautrech, as being Master of the Field, desiring rather to take the City by Famine, than by the Sword. And now the Victuals were almost all consum'd; when the Prince of Aurange thought fit to send Hernando de Gonzaga with about 5000 Foot, and 700 Horse, with divers Carts, to forage and get Provision, but they also were defeated, and the Carriages taken from them. Howbeit Naples held out still.

This while Antonio de Leyva recovers Pavia, Navarra, and Baigras, and divers other places, taken by Lautrech; and so joyn'd with the Duke of Brunswick, who came with 15000 Germans, and 500 Horse, to serve the Emperor. These two agreeing together to besiege Lodi, found such gallant resistance, that they were at last constrain'd to desist, and the rather, because they heard, the Count de St. Paul, with a strong Army of Swiss and French, was on his way to relieve it. Besides the Germans, who came with Brunswick, having not their pay at the time appointed, did for the most part return, so that the French, by joyning with the Duke of Urbino, made themselves quickly masters of the Field, recovering again all the places Antonio de Leyva had taken, and together with them the fatal Pavia. But see upon what Engines fortune now turn'd! Philippino Doria, victorious and triumphant, being come to Survento, to cure his hurt Soldiers, and repair his Gallies, Lautrech sends Giovanni Joakim to require the Prisoners, as being taken in the Name, and for the Service of the King his Master. Philippino, though receiving this Message with great Indignation, yet dissembled it for the present, saying only, he could determine nothing, without acquainting his Uncle Andrea Doria, whose Lieutenant he was. But this was only to get time: For he expected a Reward, before he would leave his Prisoners. Which also, or at least the hope of it, Lautrech should have given, before he demanded them. This error therefore cost dear. For Philippino, who took pay chiefly to give proof of his Vertue, and therefore would serve but for a time (now almost expir'd) was not to be treated in this fashion: As the French found soon after. For, employing his thoughts at this present more how to gain his own liberty, than to leave his Prisoners, he found means to retire himself to a place of more Surety; where, upon private Conference with his Prisoners, he found, that he could make more profit of them from the Spanish, than the French side. In conclusion, Andrea Doria also being solicited by the Prince of Aurange to change Master (as soon as his term was out,) he begins to listen; and the rather, for that so good Conditions were offer'd him from Charles; and, particularly, an Estate in the Kingdom of Naples. He would not yet leave the French abruptly, nor before he had gotten some pretext for it. Therefore he sent to the French Court, to demand satisfaction for the Ransom of the Prince of Aurange, taken before Marfeilles, and others during the Siege of Pavia. He also requir'd that Genoia might be restor'd to its Superiority over Savona. Which demands being brought to the Chancellor du Praet, and dislik'd, it was thought fit to send Antoine de la Roch-Fouchault, with Commission to seize on the Person and Gallies of Andrea. Notice whereof being secretly given him, Doria, leaving the French Gallies to their new Commander, withdrew himself with his own, to the Emperor's Service; who, for obliging him the more, promis'd to restore Genoia his Native Country to its former liberty, and to make him General of the Imperial Navy. Thus did the French lose Doria, only because they knew not how to use him according to his Condition, it behoving them, as he was generous, to have dealt more gently with him; and as Mercenary, more cautiously; especially, when he might make so much benefit by revolting to the other side.

While this Treaty was on foot, Piedro Lando, June 10. with thirty Venetian Gallies, blocks up Naples by Sea: So that now it seem'd impossible for it to hold out: Yet the hand of God is above all: For a kind of Pestilence, (which Sandoval calls Saudou Nigra or Black) so universally seiz'd on the French, that they diminish'd daily in great numbers, and among them * Sir Robert Ferningham: whose * Apr. 25. Company therefore was given to Master John Carew, his Lieutenant, who yet dy'd there of the same Disease. At last also Lautrech himself, (a brave Commander, but withal noted to be so opinionative, that he would, alone, have the glory, or shame of all his Actions) dy'd of the Disease, and huge numbers of others; which so disheartned the French, that the weak remainders, wanting (besides their Health) Money, Victuals, &c. rais'd the Siege, and retir'd home-wards. And thus successively were two great Armies consum'd with the Plague, without other force; as it usually happens, when People, not acquainted with the Temper, Wines, and Fruits of a Country, live licentiously. They could not yet retire so quietly, but that the Imperialists follow'd them, and took divers Prisoners, and, among others, the old and weak Piedro Navarra. The Marquis Saluzzo, who undertook (after Lautrech) the Government, yet held Aversa for some while; though, at last, he was constrain'd to yield it together with himself. In sequence whereof all other places the French held in those parts were surrender'd, save a few the Venetians fortified. Genoia also was constrain'd to yield it self, and shake off the French yoke, by the means of Andrea Doria, who hearing that the Plague had chas'd almost all the Inhabitants thence, enters it by Sea, and forceth Theodoro de Trevulci to a Composition, by which he was to forsake the Town. The Genoiesi, hereupon, were restor'd to their former liberty, and Savona, not long after, taken by them. The Count St. Paul, finding affairs thus to go ill on the French side, thought to repair them by surprising Milan, upon intelligence with certain Citizens there. But bringing provision of Victuals only for twenty four hours, and no Artillery, he gave off his Enterprize, and retir'd to Alexandria, with intention to pass there the rest of the Winter, 1528.

As the Plague destroy'd the French in Italy, the sweating Sickness consum'd very many in England; it seeming to be but the same Contagion of the Air, vary'd according to the Clime. It was first known in England, 1486. then 1507. then 1517. and now 1528. when it so rag'd, as it kill'd ordinarily in five or six hours space, invading even the Kings Court, where not only Sir Francis Pointz, Sir William Compton, and Mr. William Cary (two of the Kings Bed-Chamber,) dy'd of it; but the King himself was not without danger.

In Germany also it did much harm, killing many, and, particularly, interrupting a Conference at Marburg, betwixt Luther and Zuinglius, concerning the Eucharist.

Divorce.

I shall now come to the business of the Divorce; so much vexed by our Writers, that, for satisfaction of the Reader, I have extracted a Relation thereof out of those Originals, and Authentick Records, that I shall presume to recommend it, for more than an ordinary piece of History.

Our King had now, for many years enjoy'd the Vertuous Queen Katharine, without that either scruple of the Validity of their Match, or outward note of unkindness had past betwixt them. Nevertheless, as, presently after the Birth of the Princess (who alone of all their Children surviv'd) Luther and others, controverted the Authority, and extent of the Papal Jurisdiction, so in this Kingdom, the Dispensation of Julius II. for the aforesaid Marriage being privately question'd, many of our Learned Men concluded it void, as being granted in a Case prohibited Jure Divino, and therefore indispensable. This again, whisper'd in the ears of many, begot such a muttering, as, being brought to the King, made him think what he was to do. For though he knew that a keeping of the Succession doubtful was one of the ill Arts by which Princes conserve themselves, yet, as a desire to have Posterity, which might succeed him in the Crown, prevail'd over all other Considerations, he resolv'd to clear this Point by all fitting Degrees; and the rather, in that he knew the same Objections had been made (though wrongfully) to Edward IV, and his Children. And certainly

(as it appears to me by many Circumstances,) it was, in the beginning, as much as he could, in favour of the Princess his Daughter. So that, although the Bishop of Tarbe (being sent by Francis 1527. to conclude the Alternative formerly set down,) did object openly against her Legitimation, as being got by the King upon his Brothers Wife, it did not much move him. But, seeing it now grown a publick doubt, he thought it more notorious than could be suppress. Neither did he believe that Charles would be greatly scandaliz'd at it; since, to avoid the Treaty of Windsor, himself had alledg'd some things to this purpose. All which again (as Polydore relates) was secretly fomented by Longland Bishop of Lincoln (his Majesties Confessor,) at the instigation of the Cardinal; who both hated the Emperor, and was averse from the Queen, by reason of her reproving his loose, and inordinate Life. Though (whatever Polydore saith,) it will appear hereafter, that Woolsey endeavour'd not, finally, the Divorce. Howsoever, on some or all of these causes, the King was much perplext, as knowing how deeply this affair concern'd himself, his Posterity, and Kingdom. And because it was easie to collect of what Consequence any Rumor of this kind might be, he not only sent to our Ambassadors in Spain, as is said before, to silence the noise thereof, but us'd all means possible both to appease those violent Jealousies the Queen had conceiv'd, and to satisfy his People, at least until himself had look'd further into the Business. In which certainly his Intentions privately were to proceed; for besides his dispatching his Secretary William Knight, Doctor of Law, to Rome, (whom yet he commanded to advise with our Cardinal by the way, being then in France,) he took information sometimes about his present Condition, and sometimes (it is probable also) about such Ladies as might furnish him a choice for a Genial, and second Bed. In which number the Dutches of Alanzon, Sister to Francis, is the first I find mention'd, whose Picture (as Hall saith) was sent over, about this time. Neither did the Cardinal, being certified of these Passages, omit to comply at least in appearance with him, and therefore writ to the King, that the best way to obtain his desire, was, to tell the Emperor plainly, that unless he set the Pope free (at this time in Prison, as is formerly mention'd) he would proceed in the Divorce upon his own, and his Clergies Authority. After which, he sent for John Clark, Bishop of Bath, (then resident Ambassador in France) and commended him to the King, as a Person to whom he might discover himself; and, together, deliver'd his Opinion: First, That, because the Party would appeal, the business could not be determin'd in England, unless the Pope would give him absolute Authority, in omnibus Casibus, (a Minute whereof to be sent to Rome, I have seen.) Secondly, That she should be persuaded, ad ingressum Religionis. And, lastly, if neither of those could be effected, it should be thought of, Quid posset clam fieri quoad forum Conscientie? Concerning which Points, the Bishop of Bath at his return speaking, (as I find in an Original from the said Bishop to Woolsey) the King reply'd, My Lord of Bath, the Bull is good, or it is naught; If it be naught, let it be so declar'd, and if it be good, it shall never be broken by no by-ways for me. Whereupon, the Bishop represented, that the Popes Captivity hinder'd all Suits in that Court, and, howsoever, that the Process would be so slow, as it could not be determin'd in six or seven years. Besides, that there must be three distinct Sentences given in it, by three divers Judges, the two last to be chosen for the adverse Party. Lastly, that after all this, the Sentence may be recall'd; Quia sententia contra Matrimonium, nunquam transit in rem Judicatam; Adding, in Conclusion, as the knot of the business, that the Party would Appeal. To which the King answer'd, he thought she would not appeal from the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and the Bishops of Rochester, Ely, and London: As for the tediousness of the Suit, since he had patience eighteen years, that he would stay yet four or five more; since the Opinion of all the Clerks of his Kingdom, besides two, were lately declar'd for him; adding, that he had studied the Matter himself, and written of it, and that he found it was unlawful, de Jure Divino, and indispensable. Businesses standing thus, and no probability of the Queens fruitfulness since the Princess Mary's Birth, appearing; and the rather, that Spanish Women are observ'd to be seldom Mothers of many Children; he resolves to have recourse to the Pope; comforting himself, for the rest, that no other difficulty appear'd in removing all these Inconveniences, than the obtaining a Dispensation to dissolve that Marriage, which a Dispensation only had at first made. He knew the same key that lockt, could unlock. Therefore he thought fit to send to Rome, both to represent the dangerous Condition of himself, his Issue and Kingdom, and to solicit the Pope for a Licence to marry another. And the rather, for that so many Circumstances had made the Bull and Breve, upon which the first Marriage was grounded, to be suspected. The profe-

1528. curing whereof therefore (in a Dispatch dated 25th of December, 1527.) was recommended, by the Cardinal, to Sir Gregory Casalis, an Italian; which also he was requir'd to urge so far, as to say, that our King could impute the punishment God had laid on him in taking away his Issue Male, upon nothing so much, as the unlawfulness of this Marriage; which learned Men did also generally so detest, as they held it to be more than the Pope could dispence with (as I find they declar'd afterwards in a Book, which was sent thither.) Wherefore, that he should procure a Commission for hearing and determining this Cause, to be directed to the Cardinal; or, if that were refus'd, to Bishop Staphyleus, Dean of the Ruota, who had been lately in England. And that he should furthermore say, that he doubted not, but the Pope would easily grant it, though against the will of Charles; since he had granted Charles a Dispensation and Absolution from the Oath which he had taken to marry the Princess Mary, without so much as demanding the consent of our King. For facilitating of which business, Letters of Exchange, to the value of ten thousand Ducats were sent him; as also certain Instruments for the Popes signing, which were, First, a Commission, in ample form, to hear, and determine the Cause in England. Secondly, a Decretal, wherein the Pope, upon probation of Carnal knowledge between Arthur and Katharine, should pronounce the Marriage void. Thirdly, a Dispensation for the King to marry another. Fourthly, a Pollicitation, that the Pope will not recall any of these Acts. But it was an ill time for Sir Gregory to negotiate with the Pope; he being (as I find by an Original dispatch of Doctor Knight, dated from Rome, September 13. 1527.) so aw'd by Hernando de Alanzon, that he durst neither give the said Knight a publick Audience, nor so much as admit a private Message from him, but by the Intervention of the Cardinal Pisani. So that, what Wisdom or Piety soever our King might pretend herein, the Conjuntura certainly was no way auspicious. And the rather, because the Pope, during his Imprisonment in the Castle of St. Angelo, had been requir'd in the Emperor's Name (as I find by a Dispatch of Doctor Knights from Orvieto) not to grant any Act concerning the Divorce, nor so much as suffer the cause to be heard before any Judge in our Kings Dominions. I find also in the same Letter that Lorenzo Pucci, Cardinal Sanctorum Quatuor, being chosen by the Pope for dispatching our Kings businesses, had told Doctor Knight, that the Commission penn'd here in England, for the Popes Signing, might not pass, but that he had minuted another, which the Pope (though with some Reluctation) had granted; earnestly intreating our King nevertheless, not to put it in execution, till the Spaniards, and Almains were gone out of Italy, and himself left in his full liberty. To confirm which grant also, the same Doctor Knight, by a Letter (dated Jan. 9. 1528.) did certify, that the King's Dispensation was obtain'd under lead, as amply as the Minute sent from England did contain; and the Commission for the Lord Legate likewise was granted sufficiently, though not according to the form propos'd; and that it was drawn by the Cardinal Sanctorum Quatuor. Moreover, he tells (as in the Popes Name) that if Monsieur de Lautrech were come, the Pope thinketh he might, by good Colour, say to the Emperor, that he was requir'd by the English Ambassadors, and Monsieur de Lautrech to proceed in the business. All which Particularities I have the rather set down, that it might appear how the difficulties that the Pope made in this business, seem'd to proceed chiefly from Humane Considerations. Which also is much confirm'd by a Dispatch from Gregory Casalis 13 Jan. 1528. where (on the Popes part, and in his Name) he saith, that if the Kings Conscience be satisfied (which he alone can best tell) his Course were, Ut statim Committat causam, aliam uxorem ducat, litem sequatur, mittatur pro Legato, &c. and, that this was the only way for the King to attain his desires: Though yet he intreated this advice might be taken, as proceeding from the Cardinal Sanctorum quatuor, and Simonetta, and not from himself. And this, certainly, as it may be thought a politicke Advice, so would it have prov'd safer and easier for both, than a Commission for two Legates; which as it took up more time on the Kings part, so it caus'd a like danger and inconvenience to the Pope. Howsoever, it appear'd afterwards, that the King, either out of tenderness of Conscience, or Consideration of the hazard he should run, if the Pope would not confirm this Act, thought not fit to allow thereof; but chose rather to demand a larger Commission than that which Doctor Knight obtain'd; the procuring whereof also he committed to Stephen Gardiner, Doctor of Law, and Secretary to Woolsey, and Edward Fox, Provost of Kings Colledge in Cambridge; not neglecting in the mean time, both to instruct the Pope in his cause, and do him all the good offices he could with Christian Princes, and States, and particularly the Venetians, concerning the restitution of Ravenna and Cervia; though yet it took not such effect as was hoped. Neither did our King forget, by a Letter of Cardinal Woolsey's to the Protonotary John Casalis, to desire him to acquaint the Pope with some domestick and private Passages; which (though out of the respect I bear to that vertuous Queens Memory) I must not mention somewhat unwillingly, yet must not omit, both for the sake of that truth that ought to be in History, and as it seems to contain some Motive of the Kings Intentions. I shall set down the words in Latin as they are extant in our Record. Sunt nonnulla secretis Sanctissimo Domino nostro exponenda, & non credenda literis, quas ob causas, morbosq; nonnullos, quibus, absque remedio, Regina laborat, & ob animi etiam conceptum scrupulum, Regia Majestas nec potest nec vult, ullo unquam posthac tempore, ea uti, vel ut Uxorem, admittere, quodcumq; evenierit. There are besides some particular Reasons to be laid before his Holiness in private, but not proper to commit to Writing, upon which account, as well as by reason of some Distempers which the Queen lies under without hopes of Remedy, as likewise thro' some scruples which disturb the Kings Conscience, insomuch that his Majesty neither can nor will for the future look upon her, or live with her as his Wife, be the Consequence what it will.

Gardiner and Fox, receiving their Instructions in Feb. 1528. repair'd first to Francis, from whom they readily obtain'd a promise to co-operate puissantly with the Pope, for effectuating the Kings desire, as also a persuasory and menacing Letter in case of refusal to the Pope; for complying wherewith also the Bishop Staphyleus was sent by him to Rome not long after. Our Ambassadors having given the King account hereof, proceeded in their Journey to Italy, and coming at last to Orvieto, where the Pope then was, they found him lodg'd in an old and ruinous Monastery, his outward Chamber altogether unfurnish'd, and his Bed-chamber-hangings, together with his Bed, valu'd by them (as the Original Letter hath it) at no more than 20 Nobles. The Pope yet receiv'd them lovingly; though not without the anxiety of one who could neither safely grant, nor deny the request of a King, to

Their Instructions for the present, were only yet, to thank him for the Commission and Dispensation granted in this business to Doctor Knight, and after intrusted to Gambara his Agent here (Successor unto Melchior Langus, who was first authoriz'd by the Pope, to give Queen Katherine notice of this Affair, together with the Popes secret intention therein.) They added further, that by Gambara, as also by Sir Gregory Casalis, our King had gladly understood, how all defects, upon due Remonstrance, should be supply'd and amended. They were charg'd also, from the Cardinal, privately, to protest in his Name, that he was no Author of this Counsel. After which they were desir'd, by him, to proceed to the merit of the Cause, and Qualities of the Gentlewoman (being, as I take it, Mistress Bolen.) The perplex'd Pope, who knew well how much the Spaniard was interest'd herein, heard them at this time with more fear, when at another time he would have granted their request. Therefore, together with an ambiguous Answer, which he gave them by word of Mouth, he sent in Cipher a Letter to our King, of so much Irresolution, that it needed no other cover. Howsoever, as the Commission of our Ambassadors was to stay till further order was given, they seem'd to take all in good part. At last our able Negotiators, urging the aforesaid and many other Motives to the Pope, and he again finding the French and Confederate Army Puissant and Victorious in the Kingdom of Naples at that time, made no difficulty to grant a full Commission to two Legates, to hear and determine the Cause in England, being (according to the Kings desire) Woolsey and Campeius (not long since made Bishop of Salisbury.) Besides, it seems he granted this following Pollicitation, or Promise, Dated at Viterbo, July 23. 1528. which yet, being no Original-piece, but an ancient Copy, extant among Sir Robert Cottons Records, I shall mention but according to the credit it may deserve from the equal Reader; only I must not omit to say, that, as divers Original Dispatches, both before and after, give some touches of it, and that the Date for the rest is added, so it may challenge better credit than to be thought a Minute, and much less a Counterfeit and suppos'd piece, which also is the more probable, in that the Pope granted ampler Testimonies than this, in favour of the Divorce; howsoever they were either controll'd again, or detain'd in the hands of his Ministers, after that sort, that our King might well take notice, but neither Copy nor advantage of them.

Ita est Clemens Papa septimus antedictus.

WE Clement, by the Providence of God the seventh Pope of that Name, having duly weigh'd with how much Justice our well belov'd Son in Christ, Henry VIII. King of England, Defender of the Faith, and Lord of Ireland, hath laid before us as a thing Notorious, publicly known, and of evil Report, his case concerning the nullity of a Marriage, which he did both contract, and de facto, consummate with our most dear Daughter in Christ, Katharine, Daughter to the most Catholick King, Ferdinand of Spain, of Glorious Memory, contrary to the Laws both of God and Man, which he thereby grievously trans-

1528. transgress'd; and having thereupon issu'd out our Commission in form and manner there express'd (which Commission we do hereby confirm and ratifie, as much as if here again express'd and inserted) to our beloved Sons in Christ, Thomas and Laurence, by the Divine Grace, Cardinals, Sanctæ Cecilie, and Sanctæ Mariæ in Transiberim, our Legats de Latere in the Kingdom of England, from the Apostolical See; whereby we did constitute and appoint them (as we do by the tenor of these Presents, most fully and effectually constitute and appoint them either together or asunder) in our stead to examine, and finally to determine as competent Judges in this Cause; that we may give the more manifest and evident token of our Tenderness and Affection to the aforesaid King Henry, in speedily administering Justice, and freeing him by our immediate Sentence, from that tediousness and vexation wherewith the most just Causes (by the corruption of the present Times) are so far embarras'd, as scarce to be finish'd, and finally determin'd in an Age: And being desirous that the Process carry'd on, or to be carry'd on according to the tenor of the said Commission, may be firm, valid and irreversible, we do engage, and upon the word of a Pope promise, that we will never by the Entreaty, Request or Instance of any Person, or from our own mere Motion, or otherwise, at any time grant any Letters, Breves, Bulls or Writs of any sort, either under shew of Justice, as acts of Grace, or on any other pretence whatever, to inhibit or revoke the matter of the Commissions heretofore in the above-mention'd cause issued out, of the foresaid Commission, or of the Process by these our Delegates, according to the tenor of the former Commissions, or said Commission either yet form'd and made, or to be form'd and made hereafter, whereby any prejudice, hindrance or interruption may be given to the full, perfect, final and effectual execution of the said Commissions, Commission or Process, or whereby all or any of them may in any wise be revok'd, oppos'd or retarded in the whole, or in any part of them; but we will preserve entire, ratifie, confirm and defend to all purposes with our utmost Power and Authority, most effectually the Commissions and Commission granted by us to our foresaid Delegates, and the Process which the said Delegates according to the tenor of the said Commissions or Commission, by their plenary Power and Authority have or shall form and carry on. Lastly, We will effectually make valid, and without refusal, delay, or any difficulty whatever, grant all such Letters, Breves, Bulls or Writs, which may serve any ways to strengthen or confirm the execution of the said Commissions, Commission or foremention'd Process, or to ratifie and establish any things by virtue thereof, by our foresaid Delegates decreed, determin'd or adjudg'd. And we do furthermore engage and promise, upon the word of a Pope, that we will in no wise (unless by force and violence compell'd, or by fraud and treachery surpriz'd) injure all or any of the foresaid Particulars, or act or attempt any thing contrary to them, or any of them directly or indirectly, tacitly or expressly, mediately or immediately, upon any colour or pretence whatsoever; but will support and preserve all and every of them firm, valid, fix'd and inviolable. And farther, if (which God forbid) we should act or attempt any thing in any wise against the Premises, or any of them; We do hereby for that time, will and declare as effectually as if this our Declaration were at that time made, that every such Act and Attempt shall be null and void; and it is hereby made null and void, and is declar'd, pronounc'd and adjudg'd to be of no force and efficacy. 1528.

Clement V.

This while, the Queen, who understood well what was intended against her, labour'd with all those Passions which Jealousie of the King's Affection, sense of her own Honour, and the Legitimation of her Daughter could produce; laying, in Conclusion, the whole fault on the Cardinal; who yet was less guilty than the Queen thought, or Polydore would make him. I will not deny yet, but, out of due regard to his Master's Interests (so nearly concern'd in this great Affair,) as well as care of giving satisfaction to his Conscience, which seem'd much troubled, he might comply with the Kings desires; but to be the single Author of a Counsel, which might turn so much to his prejudice, when the King should die, is more than may easily be believ'd of so cautious a Person as Woolsey. And this Innocence, perchance, was the reason that he neither suspected himself to be so much abhorr'd of the Queen, nor to stand in that danger of her Practices, which yet procur'd at last his ruine. The first who gave the Cardinal notice of the Queen's Displeasure (as I find by a Letter of his dated at Faversham 5 July 1527. then in his Journey towards France,) was the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury; the consequence whereof he so much apprehended, that he thought fit to use all means for satisfying her. Therefore he presently labour'd with the Archbishop to persuade the Queen, that whatsoever she heard in this kind, was intended only for clearing the surmises of the Bishop of Tarbe, formerly mention'd. He writ also to our Ambassadors in Spain, to quench all rumours there, upon the same pretext. But the Queen had sent those Agents abroad, (and amongst them, one Abel, her Chaplain) who both inform'd her of all that pass'd, and engag'd the Emperor to assist her to the uttermost of his Power. Therefore the Pope stood more and more suspended. The pace of Campejus (the promis'd Legate) also appear'd staggering and slow; and all that might frustrate the King's Intentions, was secretly practis'd. This while the Cardinal, (who out of the King's designs would ever produce and subrogate some particular end of his own, whereof, either in point of Glory or Profit, he might make Advantage) had so dispos'd this of the Divorce, as thereby to mediate the Pope's entire Delivery, not only from the Guards, but even fear of the Emperor. Again, as, during the Popes restraint, he had, (under pretence that it was the best expedient for the King's propos'd Divorce) projected a meeting of Cardinals at Avignon, for settling the government of the Church, where he himself intended to be present; so, now, since the King lik'd not that course, and that the Pope was free, he persuaded him to erect some Cathedral Churches in England, at the price of throwing down more Monasteries. Whereby it appears, both how busie this Cardinal was, and how much he studied his own ends. For as he knew this would please the King (who began to think that Religious Persons might serve God as well in defending the Kingdom, as praying for it,) so he assur'd himself the Authority thereof would be deriv'd on him chiefly; and the Pope, in the mean time, obnoxious, while he could not but fear how far those Innovations might extend. When this Project therefore was mov'd to the Pope,

Queen surpriz'd at these Proceedings.

Hates the Cardinal for it.

July 5. 1527.

Engages the Emperor in her Interests.

The Cardinal advises to erect Cathedrals by dissolving some Monasteries.

1528. Pope, I find by a Letter of the Protonotary John Casalis, Octob. 30. 1528. that he answer'd, gravely, he lik'd the design well; but that he would proceed deliberately, because it was ad perpetuam rei memoriam. Therefore he desir'd the two Legates (for Campejus was by this time come) might be joyn'd in determining this business, and that all the Revenues of the Monasteries, might be conferr'd on the new Bishops; and that the two Legates, having advis'd with the Pope hereof, should afterwards nominate them. So that it seem'd the Pope held it fitting to comply with the King a little at this time, since Gardiner told him plainly, that he had in his Instructions these Words to tell him, Necesse est supprimi pro serenissimi Regis Collegio Monasteria cujuscunque ordinis: In conclusion, a Bull was granted for applying the Revenues of some small Monasteries for maintenance of the King's Colleges in Cambridge and Windsor Castle; the Copy whereof is extant in Sir Robert Cotton's Library. It may be doubted yet, whether these Apprehensions, that were now, in more than one kind, given the Pope of our King's declining the absolute Authority of the Church of Rome, did dispose the Pope more to oblige or disoblige him. For, though the Pope had reason to fear, lest he should lose his ancient Jurisdiction in this Kingdom, if he deny'd; yet he might doubt as well, that in adhering too much to that side, he might offend the Emperor so far, as to hazard the loss of his own. He therefore, at once, treats with the Emperor of a perfect Peace and Amity, and together of recovering Cervia and Ravenna, and of effecting certain other Designs which he had in Florence; and grants (as is above said) in appearance a large Commission to Woolsey and Campejus; yet, in effect, so restrain'd, as the Emperor might see it was not out of his Power to check or revoke it. And this was all that Sir Gregory Casalis and Stephen Gardiner, after much Importunity, could obtain. They mov'd the Pope also to canonize Henry VI. (which I find was formerly propos'd to Alexander VI. by Henry VII.) to which the Pope answer'd, That if the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Bishop of Winchester (who had examin'd the matter in partibus) did send the Process thither, as their Commission requir'd, the Canonization should follow shortly after. Businesses standing thus, our King thought fit to send Sir Francis Bryan Knight, and Peter Vannes (an Italian, and his Secretary, for the Latin Tongue) to Rome; their Instructions in general, being sign'd with the King's own hand) were to dissuade the Pope from entering into any League with the Emperor, whose Design was (he said) to divest the Pope of his Means and Authority, by the forcible bringing in of one Angelo Cordelier to be Pope, who should not intermeddle with Secular Jurisdiction, and the Patrimony of the Church; which therefore the Emperor would take to himself and usurp. For preventing whereof, the King wish'd him to keep a Guard, offering in his own and Francis's Name, to contribute thereunto. They were commanded also, to search privately for a certain pretended Breve, in Rome, (said to be a Supplement or Confirmation of the Bull of Julius II. and authorizing the Marriage with Queen Katharine) since it was not to be found in the King's Records. Furthermore, they were requir'd to discover (in the Name of a third Person) whether, if the Queen enter'd a Religious Life, the King might have the Popes Dispensation to marry again, and the Children be legitimate, and what Precedents were for it? Secondly, whether if the King (for the better inducing of the Queen thereunto) would promise to enter himself into a Religious Life, the Pope might not dispense with his Vow, and leave her there? Thirdly, if this may not be done, whether he can dispense with the King to have two Wives, and the Children of both legitimate? Since great Reasons and Precedents, especially in the Old Testament, appear for it. All which they were to do with that Secresy and Circumspection, that the Cause might not be publish'd, propounding the King's Case always therefore as another Man's. Lastly (as in all other Instructions) some kind of Menaces were to be added. But Persuasions and Terrors wanted not on the other side; which did so much more prevail with the Pope, as the Danger was more immediate and pressing on the Emperor's part, than on our King's. Therefore our Ambassadors were so far from obtaining any thing, but what was formerly granted in the Commission to Cardinal Woolsey and Campejus, that they found the Pope now more than ever dispos'd to favour the Emperor: Infomuch that they observ'd daily new Delays and Restrictions in him. Some whereof (besides the Evidence in our Records) Sanders doth confess, while he saith, that the Pope, by four several Messengers to Campejus (now on his way) gave him in charge: First, that he should make easie Journeys. Secondly, that when he came to England, he should labour all he could to reconcile the King and Queen. Thirdly, that if this could not be effected, he should persuade her to enter a Monastery, and take on her a Religious Life. Lastly, that when this could be obtain'd, he should give no definitive Sentence for the Divorce, without exprels commandment from him, & hoc (saith he) summum & maximum sit tibi mandatum. Campejus thus instructed, protracts all things; whereat tho' our King seem'd scandaliz'd, as suspecting it came from Unwillingness, yet, being an active Prince, he made use of that time to negotiate in Spain for recovering the Breve, (of which above) commanding the Bishop of Worcester, and Doctor Edward Lee, by all means to procure it. At length (and not before the beginning of October, 1528) Campejus coming thro' France, and being conducted thence into England, by John Clark, Bishop of Bath, our King's Ambassador there, came to London: Where being by our Cardinal presented to the King, he publicly acknowledg'd in the Name of the Pope, Cardinal, Clergy, and People of Rome, that our King was Liberator Urbis. Shortly after, obtaining Audience of the Queen, he took occasion both to acquaint her with her Danger, and to persuade her thereupon to renounce the World, and enter into some Religious Life. For which many Pretexts wanted not, (as I find in our Records) she having been observ'd, since the Commission obtain'd, to allow Dancing and Pastimes more than before. And that her Countenance not only in Court, but to the People, was more chearful than ordinary; whereas (it was alledg'd) she might be more sad and pensive, considering the King's Conscience was unsatisfy'd, and that he had refrain'd her bed, and was not willing the Lady Princess, her Daughter, should come in her company. But the offended Queen replying peremptorily, That she was resolved both to stand to that Marriage the Roman Church had once allow'd; and, howsoever, not to admit such partial Judges as they were, to give sentence in her Cause. Campejus writes to Rome, both to inform the Pope hereof, and to desire farther Instructions: The Answer whereunto the Pope yet so long deferr'd, that very near six Months pass'd before the two Cardinals sat in their Commission.

This while the Bishop of Worcester, and Doctor Lee, having given the Emperor an Overture of the Divorce, did (by a Letter dated at Saragosa, April 5. 1529.) return our King this Answer, on the

the Emperor's part. That he was fery to understand of the intended Divorce, adjuring our King (for the rest) by the Sacrament of Marriage, not to dissolve it. Or, if he would needs proceed therein, that the hearing and determining of the business yet might be referr'd to Rome, or a General Council, and not be decided in England. Adding further, That he would defend the Queen's just Cause. Wherewith, the pretended Original Breve was produc'd, and a Transumpt or Copy thereof (sign'd by three Bishops) offer'd them, to send to England; but the Breve it self was deny'd, for fear (as he said) of miscarrying. To which our Ambassadors answer'd, That our King was a Prince of that Piety, that he ought not to be adjur'd; and for the Breve, that it was a Jewel belonging to the King and his Queen only, and not to be detain'd by any other from them. And for appealing to Rome, it needed not; since Authority of determining that business was already given from thence to Cardinal Wolley and Campejus. Besides that, in Causes Matrimonial, the presence of the Parties to be examin'd, being requir'd for the most part, the Emperor might easily imagine how unfit it was for the King and Queen personally to go to Rome, especially at that time. After this, the Emperor commanding the Breve to be read, the Ambassadors requir'd a Notary to be allow'd them, for setting down the whole passage of this business, together with their Protestations. But no Notary but the Emperor's being permitted, the Ambassadors were forc'd to accept him, desiring notwithstanding their Allegations might be set down apart. Hereupon the Emperor told the Ambassadors, that he would send an expresse Messenger to our King, to intreat him to continue his Match, and, in case of refusal, to protest against the Divorce. Our Ambassadors yet persisted still in urging the Emperor, for his own sake, to send the Breve for England; lest the Judges, wanting sight thereof, should proceed against the Queen, or otherwise, that he would send the said Breve to the Pope. The Emperor reply'd, that therefore he would not send it. For if it miscarry'd, the Judges might then proceed as they would; but for sending it to the Pope he would advise. And that, if matters were now as they were heretofore, he would not fear to send it to England. By a Letter also, the twentieth of April 1529, they certifie the King, That the Emperor intended to send both to England and Rome, to make his Protestations against this Divorce; and that he would not send the Original Breve. Furthermore, that he requir'd our King, according to an Article of a former Treaty, to fall upon Francis, as a Perturber of the Publick Peace. Lastly, because the said Ambassadors had heard, and consider'd, at large, the Breve, they sent their Objections against it. Which, being one of the grounds of the King's proceeding in this great Affair, I have thought fit punctually to set down, as they are extant in the Original Letter, written in Cipher, and thus to be read, as I find it decipher'd in our Records.

Worcester's and Dr.
Lee's Objections to the Pope's Bull for the Marriage.

That where it is pretended the Bull and Breve to be impetrate in one day, either they were impetrate in one Suit, and by one Man; and then it is not to be thought, but that this Suit, being of so great importance, was committed to such a one, as could perceive, that the Bull, not containing so large Dispensation as the Breve, is superfluous, (supposing the Breve to be necessary.) If the one were impetrate after the other, and the Suits made by one Man, it is hard to think that one Man, being instructed in the Suit for both, would put the Dispensation of less moment in a Bull, and of greater moment in a Breve, seeing the one might be as easily impetrate as the other, and that the Dispensation in Lead is more durable to remain; and, that the two Kings were bound to impetrate Bulls, and not Breves, whereof he or they that had such Commission (as it seemeth) could not be ignorant. And if these Suits were made by divers Persons, and by several Commissions, there is no reason can be alledg'd, (the Impetration being in one day) why to two several Persons several Commissions should be given herein, the thing requiring no haste, the Marriage following five or six Years after; but more likely it is, if the Breve were then obtain'd indeed, that it was procur'd by secret Practices not known to all Parties quorum intererat scire & consentire; for, both the Parties consenting, I think there can be no sufficient Cause alledg'd, why, the thing being done by common consent, the Breve rather than the Bull should have larger Dispensation; for what need'd two divers Suits, with divers Commissions, if both the Parties were agreed upon the Suits? Especially the Impetration of both being in one day.

Secondly, supposing it to be true, that Master Abel saith, the Queen to have sworn, quod nunquam fuit cognita a Principe Arturo; the Cause of the Impetration for so much is vain, (viz. quod Regina cum Arturo principe matrimonium carnali copula consummaverit.) If this be true, it appeareth that he that su'd the Breve had no Commission of the Parties, for they would not give him Commission to impetrate Dispensation for Cause not true.

Thirdly, supposing it to be true, that Master Abel saith to me, that the Queen never heard of such Breve, before the Emperors Orators there presented it to her; how can it stand, that is reported in the Breve, quod impetratum est Breve ad Regine instantiam?

Fourthly, if your Highness had made instance and supplication for the same Breve, it is not to be thought that it should be so far out of your remembrance, the Causes of Impetration being such, as your Highness might and could, anon, reduce it to the same.

Fifthly, if it were impetrate at the instance of your Highness, and of the Queen's Grace, no Cause is why it should be sent into Spain to King Fernando (as the Emperor's Folks first said, but now swerve) and not to your Highness, and the Queen's Grace. If any will suppose that it was done by your Consent, no Reason agreeth why you should consent thereto, and not rather keep it in your own hands, than send it to the Custody of another. And yet, if you did consent, it cannot be thought, but that it should remain in your remembrance, as the firmity of your Marriage, and discharge of your Conscience, with other things, touching highly your Succession, standing therein: And it may be supposed moreover, that some writing of the Deposite thereof should remain there, which is not found.

Sixthly, considering that the King of most noble memory, your Father then alive, your Highness not being at the date of the Breve past xv, or xvi Years of Age, [for so the Cipher is; though as King Henry was then but xii, and something more, I conceive these Figures were Ciphers only, signifying his true Age: Unless perchance the Cipherer or Decipher did otherwise mistake it;] it may be well supposed that your Highness was not then much to sollicit the impetration of such things. And that, if any such Breve should have been impetrate that time, that rather it should have been done at the instance of the King your Father, than of your Highness. And although then it might have been impetrate in your Highness's Name, yet it could not have been done there without Knowledge and consent of the King your Father, and also 1528. at his setting forth. And, if any his Intervention and Consent had been in this matter, he would not have bound King Fernando, and likewise have been bound himself, to get Bulls of Dispensation. And surely it may be thought, that, if the King your Father consented, Don Fernando of Spain did the same, so that it cannot be doubted, but that as they say here, they have two Bulls reserv'd in their Archives, so should also this Breve have been, which indeed was not there found, as hereafter shall be shew'd, nor any such is found in your Highness's Archives. Wherefore it may be well reckon'd, that there was no such obtain'd by the Consent of the King your Father.

And so, Seventhly, maketh the Breve suspect, that the Emperor's Folks first said, that it was found in Archivis Regum Hispaniarum, as appeareth in my Lord Cardinals Graces Letters; and now, forgetting themselves, the Emperor's Chancellor and Perinot have confessed to us, that it was found among the Writings of Doctor de Puebla, which was Orator of Spain, in England, in the King's days of most noble memory your Father. Which contrariety maketh to appear that they do not upright. Of a Nephew of Doctor Puebla's being there, I have written in our common Letters the fifth of April, and now do again; by whom peradventure some light might be had.

Eighthly, whoso considereth the high renown'd Wisdom of the King your said Father, and his great sage Council, Men of singular Wisdom and Learning for all purposes, may well conceive that, or ever any Dispensation for Marriage to be had between your Highness and the Queen were sent for, that her Grace was examin'd an esset cognita à principe Arthuro an non? And that, si falsa est, that the two Kings would have provided therefore Dispensationem in Bulla, as they were bound. And on the other side, si negavit se fuisse cognitam, nihil erat opus Breve quoad, &c. And for the second part of the Breve, I cannot suppose that your Highness, in that time which the date of the Breve pretendeth (your Highness being then not much more than xii or xv Years of Age, and the King your Father living) need any Dispensation in that party. And if none needed then, why should your Highness then make instance for any, which is suppos'd in the Breve?

Ninthly, if this Breve were impetrate in the days of Doctor de Puebla; the being thereof so long in his hands, and the manner of keeping of the same, giveth new Conjecture that it is a thing cassat; for the thing being of so much importance, touching so nigh your Highness and the Queen, why should he keep it; specially so long? for he lived in England after the date of the Breve five or six Years, and dy'd there, not long after the King your Father. Who can think that such a King, and such a Council, would have suffered the Breve to be out of their hands, in his hands, all that time, if the Breve had been known to them necessary for this Matrimony, and of any value? And, as I said, the manner of keeping thereof seemeth to confirm the same; which manner of keeping I conjecture of two things: One, that it was not kept in a Case of Tin, after the manner of Breves; for only in a Paper they did exhibit it to us twice. Another, that in the Superscription it appear'd slubber'd, by reason of often handling, peradventure lying among so many his Writings and old Letters; wherefore, although it were then impetrate, yet it seemeth that he took it as cassat, and void, peradventure as surreptitiously obtained of his own head, without any Commission or Consent of the Parties.

Tenthly, another Suspicion is, that, although the Emperor's Chancellor and Perinot say, they have divers Letters and Writings of the said Puebla's, concerning both the first Marriage, and second of the Queen's; yet, because they utter'd not that they have any thing specially concerning this Breve, (which they would not have forgotten to say, for so much as it maketh for their purpose, if there had been any such) moved upon that Suspicion, I demanded of them, and divers times to the same, whether they had any special Letters concerning the Breve? They could not, ne did say that they had; but the Emperor's Chancellor answer'd, That the Breve was enough. Whereupon may be gather'd, that his Answer imply'd, that they have none other.

Eleventhly, if any such Breve were impetrate at that time, by the Knowledge and Consent of both the Kings, likely is, that either of them should have one. Let them then here bring forth the Breve ex Archivis suis. If they will say, this is it; What likelihood is it, that it should be sent into England, to come into Spain? For this Breve, if it were in Doctor de Puebla's Custody, came out of England after his death, with other his Writings; which I think his Nephew there (if he confess that it was found amongst other his Uncle's Writings) will also confess. I say, why was it sent into England? It is not to be doubted, but Don Fernando had an Ambassador in the Court of Rome, which might easilier and nearer way have sent it into Spain. Wherefore, if they cannot, out of their Archives, bring forth any such Breve, their Diligence in custody of such things suppos'd, and well deprehended in the custody of two Bulls, (for some of the secretaries said to me that they have two) they may, of this, gather (themselves) that there is no such, ne any otherwhere, of any effect and value.

The Twelfth Suspicion against the Breve is in it self; that, whensoever it was impetrate, it was not duly impetrate, may be gather'd of divers things in the same, and about the same; the hand of some Learner, and of one exercised in writing of such things, and some Defaults in the writing; such as my Lord of Worcester saith, he hath not seen committed in any Breve. And, as he trusteth to prove, the Dore shall utterly condemn the Breve. And these Exceptions were, as I find in another Letter, dated from the same Ambassador to the Cardinal: First, that there were Rasures in it. Secondly, divers Hands. Thirdly, Names false written, as Artherus pro Arthurus. Fourthly, the Date false; as being Decemb. 26. 1503. which, according to the Date of Breves, beginning Decem. 2. was almost a Year before Julius II. was Pope. It was observed likewise, that the Seal swelled in the middle, and appear'd like some old Seal newly clap'd on. And thus much out of these Dispatches of those able Negotiators, the Bishop of Worcester, and Edward Lee the King's Almoner; who, sending the Transumpt of the Breve to the King, April 23. by a Letter the twelfth of June following, also certify'd our King of the sending of Gonzales Fernando, the Emperor's Chaplain, to the Earl of Desmond in Ireland, (which hath relation to that I have formerly said of him) together with the return of a Chaplain of the said Earl's in his Company; the Emperor seeming to take this intended Divorce so much to heart, that he thought fit to give our King this Jealousy. Shortly after which, I find also the Bishop of Worcester repeal'd.

This while, the common People, who with much anxiety attended the success of this great Affair, seem'd, betwixt Pity to Queen Katharine, and 1528. and envy to Anne Bolon, (now appearing to be in the Kings favour) to cast out some murmuring and seditious Words; which being brought to the King's Ears, he thought fit to protest publickly in an Assembly of Lords, Judges, &c. call'd to his Palace of Bridewell, That nothing but desire of giving satisfaction to his Conscience, and care of establishing the Succession to the Crown in a right and undoubted Line, had first procur'd him to controvert this Marriage; being (for the rest) as happy in the affection and virtues of his Queen, as any Prince living. To confirm which also, he caus'd Anne Bolon to depart the Court, in such an abrupt and discontented fashion, that she determin'd to absent her self altogether. Neither could she be induc'd (as Sanders hath it) to come to the King any more, till her Father was commanded (not without threats) to bring her thither. Who by representing the common danger to them both, obtain'd at length (though not without much difficulty) the consent of his unwilling Daughter to return; where yet she kept that distance, that the King might easily perceive how sensible she was of her late Dismission.

But is recall'd.

Pope orders the Bull to be burnt.

It was now mid-May 1529. when our King, understanding how the Pope intended a strict League with the Emperor, and judging wisely also, that Francis, upon the restoring of his Children, might easily be drawn from him, did resolve, without relying any longer on either of their Promises, to take the best course he could, for giving a conclusion to this business. And the rather, in that matters seem'd daily more and more indispos'd for that conclusion de desir'd. For though Campejus, according to the order he had from the Pope (as I find by a dispatch of John Casalis, Dat. Dec. 17. 1528.) did both persuade the Queen to a Divorce, and dissuade the King from it, as having either way the end he propos'd: yet he fail'd in both. Nor would he (as I find in the same dispatch) let go out of his hand the decretal Bull mention'd before, being the absolute decision of the Cause, (the Dispensation being relative to the Queens entering into Religion, or other dissolution of the Marriage;) in regard (as the Pope pretended) it was got by the importunity of Cardinal Woolsey, with intention that it should be shew'd to the King and Cardinal only, as an arrba or token of his good will, and afterwards burnt; protesting nevertheless to the said Casalis, that he desir'd the Cardinals should proceed according to their Commission, but that the Bulla Decretalis should by no means be shew'd to any of the Kings Counsellors, or other Person whatsoever, though upon Oath of Secresie; it being sufficient that the King and Cardinal had seen it already, in Campejus hand. How our King yet was satisfied with this evasion of the Popes, appears not to me by any Record, more, than that he still solicited the Pope, that it might be exhibited publickly. Howbeit the Pope, who had far other thoughts, told our Agents, that he kept the Bulla Decretalis secretly, as well from all his Cardinals; as fearing lest the Emperor should call him to a Council for it. For the more caution, taking order that the Memory of it should be raz'd out of all his Archives. And, not staying here, (as I find by our Records) he commanded one Francisco Campana (his Servant) into England, on pretence to confer with the King and Cardinal, but indeed to charge Campejus to burn the Decretal. For colouring of all which, he finally objected to our King, that he had not kept promise with him, about the Restitution of Cervia and Ravenna. Our King conceiving hereupon, that all these difficulties the Pope made, proceeded from the fear which he had of the Emperor, sends to

Sir Francis Bryon, and Peter Vannes again, to renew his offer of a Guard of a Thousand or two Thousand Men, to be kept at the cost of the French King and his, whereof the Comte de Turenne, and Sir Gregory Casalis should be Captains; and, in the mean while, that a General Peace should be treated of. But whether the Pope, as being late enough offended with the Guard which the Emperor put on him, would not now accept them from any other Prince; or that he thought them too slender to defend him; or that it would argue partiality to do any thing on these terms; or that otherwise he had made his private Peace with the Emperor, (which certainly was the truth;) I do not find the Pope accepted this offer. Howsoever, he seem'd still to fear the Emperor; Infomuch, that by a Dispatch from Gregory Casalis, dated January the third, 1529. I find the Pope for the better making both his own, and a General Peace, especially betwixt Charles and Francis, (which also follow'd at Cambray this year,) declar'd to Cardinal Woolsey, he thought it necessary to go himself in Person into Spain, and that Cardinal Woolsey should go along with him: not yet as Pope and Cardinal, but as two Legates, or Ambassadors, for concluding a Peace. But this Journey (if at least it were really intended) was interrupted by the sickness of the Pope, which was thought so desperate, that our Cardinal Feb. 7. Feb. 7. wrote to Stephen Gardiner (then at Rome) that, by all means, he should procure the Papacy for him, being (as affairs then stood) the most indifferent and equal that could be found in Christendom. To which purpose also, besides our Kings Recommendations, the Cardinal had obtained the French Kings Letters, written with so much earnestness for him, that though the Convalescence of the Pope did frustrate this design, Stephen Gardiner yet was wish'd to keep the Letter in omnem eventum. I find also, Order was given, that if Woolsey could not be chosen, the Cardinals which were for him (being a third part of the whole number) should put in a Protestation, and departing the Conclave, should in some secure place proceed to an Election, notwithstanding any to be made at Rome. But, whether the Pope having notice of this untimely ambition of our Cardinal, were now offended with him, or that otherwise his ingagement to the Spaniard (whereof, in a Dispatch from the Pope to the Emperor July 21. 1528. that came to our King's hands, there is mention) did hold him off; I find after this time the Pope more averse than ever. Therefore, notwithstanding a design of his, that Cardinal Woolsey and Campejus, having finish'd the business of the Divorce, should afterwards go to conclude an Universal Peace, yet all that past in this affair afterwards (on his part) was little more than illusion. Which Sir Francis Bryon discovering, in a Dispatch to our King, plainly told him, no good was to be done; which our King also believing, had commanded Gardiner to threaten the Pope with his Sollicitation of the Princes of Almaine. Among whom I find particularly George Duke of Saxony (the Lutherans in vain opposing it) to have persuaded the Divorce. Gardiner, hereupon, useth more than one menace; though so much in vain, that, for a Conclusion, he advis'd our King to proceed upon the Commission given to the Legates, the Pope being (as he alledg'd April 21. 1529.) so aw'd by the Cesareans, as he had rather suffer much in anothers Name, than do any thing in his own. To encourage him the more also, Gardiner calls the Breve false and counterfeit, as being not to be found in the Registers at Rome. Moreover, for seconding this advice,

 May 4. there was danger of recalling the Commission given to Woolsey and Campejus; which was con-firm'd by divers other Letters from our Agents.
 June 13. Whereof Gregory Casalis, in a Dispatch of 13 June following, gives a reason, in these words of the Pope; who, being at that time more slackly reliev'd from the Confederates than he expected, and divers of his Subjects (for the rest) in Arms against him, said, Malle sese in præceptis dari, & Cæsari à Stabulo, nedum à Sacris inservire, quam in-feriorum hominum, subditorum, Vassalorumq; rebellium injurias sustinere. The Remedy whereof he expected only from the Emperor. So that not only fear, but even hope making him obnoxious, he did, for more than one Reason, encline to the Emperor. Our King also, being well in-form'd hereof by certain excusatory Letters from Rome, and that a Treaty betwixt the Pope and Emperor (whereof there shall be mention) was already upon term of Conclusion, and an Interview appointed; gave order first to recal Gardiner and Bryan; yet so as he neglected not, at May 20. the same time, to send William Bennet, Doctor of Law, to Rome, to hinder the Advocacion of the Cause; whereof he was so jealous, that he intercepted not only those Dispatches which were sent to Rome from Campejus, or any else, but even those intelligences which Queen Katharine should give to her Aunt the Lady Margaret, Governess of the Low-Countries. So that now our King, finding his Conscience unsatisfied, his Nobility in suspense, and the People murmuring at these procrastinations in an affair that so much concern'd the Succession, charg'd the two Cardinals to proceed; as being satisfied by a particular Discussion of this business before Archbishop Warham, and divers the learnedst Men of both Universities, at Lambeth, that his cause was fair,

And now, publick notice of a solemn hearing being given, the Court was appointed to sit; the Queen chusing Archbishop Warham, and Nicholas West Bishop of Ely, Doctors of the Law, and John Fisher Bishop of Rochester, and Henry Standish Bishop of St. Asaph, Doctors of Divinity, her Council, &c. according to the permission the King gave her in that behalf. The passages whereof, out of an Ancient and Authentick Record in Parchment, subscrib'd by the three Notaries (us'd in this business, and remaining in the Custody of that great Antiquary, Sir Henry Spelman, Knight,) I shall set down, with as much particularity, as the context of my History will suffer.

The place appointed for hearing and determining the Cause, was a great Hall in Black-Fryers

Clement Bishop, Servant of the Servants of God, to our belov'd Sons Thomas Archbilhop of York, Cardinal Sanctæ Cecilie, and Laurence Campejus Cardinal Sanctæ Mariæ in Transiberim, our Legats de latere from the Apostolical See to the
 Vol. II. P 2 King-

1529 Kingdom of England, Health and Apostolical Benediction. The Relation of very many Persons of undoubted Credit hath reach'd our Ears, concerning the Validity of that Marriage which our belov'd Son in Christ Henry King of England, Defender of the Faith, and Lord of Ireland, (a Dispensation of the Apostolical See being first had) was known to have contracted and consummated with our dearly belov'd Daughter in Christ Queen Katharine, from whence in those parts a Controversie hath arisen which hath so perplex'd the minds of Men, and held them in suspense and expectation, what Justice and Equity will determine in a case of so peculiar a Nature, and of so great Moment, not yet try'd in any publick Court of Ecclesiastical Judicature, that it is but necessary to proceed to some quick and speedy determination herein, to avoid that danger which must unavoidably ensue upon deferring it. But since we, whom God has appointed Servant of his Servants, to administer to all Men Impartial Justice in Judgment and Truth, are not able in our Person to inquire into the truth of the Fact, and examine this Cause our selves: Considering likewise that the Fact, concerning the right of which the present Debate is, may with more certainty, speed and expedition be inquir'd into and examin'd, there than here; farthermore, being desirous, that in that Kingdom, which has always shewn the greatest Affection and Obedience to the Apostolical See, all matter of Dissention may be taken away, the Bond of Peace and Love be strengthened, and the blessed harmony of Mutual Charity, which has so many years continu'd, may still flourish, and be convey'd down to Posterity; and a Decision may be made of the above-mention'd Cause, concerning the foresaid Marriage according to the rules of Justice, Judgment and Truth, whereby this Dispute may, as 'tis most expedient it should, obtain a firm, valid, certain and speedy Conclusion and End. For these purposes, we do hereby give and grant a plenary Authority, and most ample Power and Commission to your Eminences in our own stead, either both jointly, or in case of unwillingness, or any other Impediment, to either of you singly; that, being subject to the Authority and Jurisdiction of no Court or Person whatever, nor liable to any Appeal or Question concerning your Jurisdiction; you do hear and examine all and every thing which may relate to the Validity or Invalidity of the said Marriage, or of any Apostolical Dispensation whatever, to be exhibited and produc'd before you, and all other Things, Matters, Circumstances, Allegations and Causes, which may any ways relate to, and concern the said Marriage, and the said Dispensation: And that you do proceed judicially, without Tumult or Disturbance, summarily and plainly to examine all Parties concern'd and knowing in the case of the said Marriage, and of the validity of the said Dispensation; and if it shall to you appear, that any such Apostolical Dispensations shall be sufficient, effectual and valid, or invalid, ineffectual, insufficient, surreptitious or arrepitious, or on any account null and void, such you shall pronounce and declare finally that they are, and ought to be held; and in like manner concerning the said Marriage, you shall, if by either Party requir'd, define, determine, and finally sentence the same to be valid, just, lawful and firm, or on the other side unjust, invalid, and unlawful, and thereupon that it is and ought to be void and null, and is therefore by you there declar'd invalid, unjust, unlawful, void and null, on either side pronouncing Sentence, as shall appear most just according to the Laws of Reason, and the Dictates of your own Consciences; and if it shall thus appear that the Dispensation is invalid, and the Marriage Null, that you do judicially, deliberately, summarily and clearly, as aforesaid, pronounce a Sentence of Divorce, and grant a Faculty and Licence in the Lord to the foresaid King Henry and Queen Katharine to marry again. And we do hereby create and depute you jointly, or (if as aforesaid any ways hindred) separately in our stead to execute, finish, fully and finally to determine all or any of the things contain'd in this Commission in so ample a manner, that whatsoever we by our Power and Authority could have done in the Premises, all that you are hereby enabled to do as fully and effectually. We do likewise of our own certain knowledge, by our Apostolical Authority, and by the Tenor of these Presents, grant you Power and Authority to pronounce, sentence and publish, if it shall to you seem convenient, that the Children by the first Marriage as well as by the second are Legitimate; and that you do confirm and establish the Legitimacy of both sorts, either by Censures and Ecclesiastical Punishments to be inflicted on the Gainsayers, or by way of Decree and perpetual Sanction, or by any other more valid and effectual Method or Form that can be thought of, or contriv'd to strengthen, and effectually support the same: Any General Councils, Apostolical Canons, publick Ordinances or Decrees whatsoever to the contrary notwithstanding.

Given at Viterbo in the year of our Lord 1528.
6th of the Ides of June, in the fifth year of our Pontificat.

After the Commission was read, our Chronicles say, the King was call'd, and appear'd Personally in Court, at whose feet the Queen protested her self, demanding Justice, Right, and Pity, &c. But now to come to the Authentick Record. I find the King and Queen were by Bishop Longland, the Kings Confessor, cited to appear upon 18 June next ensuing. The King (for observing his time,) gave Richard Sampson, Dean of his Chappel, and John Bell, Doctor of the Decrees, a Commission Seal'd in green Wax, and dated at Greenwich, 15 June; by which he constituted them his Proctors, with Authority to refuse or accept the Court and Judgment of the two Cardinals, and, if need were, to Appeal; allowing them also to substitute other Proctors; binding himself finally sub Hypotheca & obligatione Bonorum, to ratifie what they should do. But the Queen using a shorter way, appear'd in Person, protesting yet against the Cardinals, as incompetent Judges; requiring further, that this her Protestation might be Recorded, and so departed presently out of the Court. This while the Cardinals, who took into their Commission John Longland, Bishop of Lincoln; John Clark, Bishop of Bath and Wells; John Islip, Abbot of Westminster; and Doctor John Taylor, Master of the Rolls; sent unto the Queen Letters Monitory; declaring, if she appear'd not, they would notwithstanding proceed to execute their Commission; for which purpose the above-mention'd Bishop of Bath and Wells, was employ'd; but she, refusing, is pronounc'd Contumacious.

Certain Articles were then put in by the Legates, against our King and Queen Katharine, the principal Substance whereof was, that Prince Arthur did marry, and carnally know Queen Katharine, confirming also this Marriage by Cohabitation with her till his Death. After which, King Henry being his Brother, did marry the said Lady

June 28. This being done, the Queen is cited a second time to appear; which she refusing, is pronounc'd again contumacious. This hinder'd not the Court yet to proceed, and appoint Doctor Taylor, Archdeacon of Buckingham, to examine the Witnesses; while themselves calling for the Dispensations that were alledg'd in favour of this Marriage, a certain Bull and Breve were exhibited, which I have thought fit to set down at length as they are extant in the same Record.

The Bull being sub plumbo, more Romanæ Curie, was an Original; but the Breve was only a Copy subscrib'd and sign'd with the hand of Juan Vergara, a Canon of Toledo, and Publick Notary, Auctoritate Apostolica; and with the Seals of Baltazar de Castiglione the Pope's Nuncio, and of the Reverend Father in God Alvensus de Fonseca, Archbishop of Toledo.

The Supreme Authority of the Pope exercises its Power granted from above, as it shall seem most wholsome and expedient in Christ, according to the difference of Persons, Things and Times. Your Petition lately exhibited to us did set forth that You, Daughter Katharine, and Arthur (eldest Son of the most Illustrious and our most beloved Son in Christ Henry King of England) since decess'd, for the better preserving and continuing the Leagues and Treaties of Peace and Friendship between our most dear Son in Christ Ferdinand, our most dear Daughter in Christ Elizabeth, most Catholick King and Queen of Spain and Sicily, and the foresaid King and Queen of England, did lawfully contract a Marriage in Words de præsentī, and did perhaps 1529. consummate it by Carnal Knowledge, which Prince Arthur dy'd, leaving no Issue by the said Marriage; Now whereas your Petition did further set forth, that to the end that the said Amity and good Friendship may be still strengthen'd and continu'd between the foresaid Kings and Queen, you did desire that a Marriage might be contracted between you, in order to which you did supplicate that we wou'd of our Apostolical Grace and Favour grant you a sufficient Dispensation on account of the premises; We therefore out of our hearty Inclination and earnest Desire that Peace and Concord should ever flourish and remain among all the Faithful in Christ, but more especially among all Catholick Kings and Princes, hereby absolving you and either of you from all Sentences of Prohibition, Suspension, Excommunication, and all other Ecclesiastical Censures and Penalties on any Occasion or Pretence whatever, either by any Person or Law inflicted upon you, or that in the Case foremention'd may be, by Suit yet depending; and as we do hereby judge you absolved, so in compliance with your so reasonable Request, by our Apostolical Authority, out of our meer and special Grace and Favour, by the Tenor of these Presents, we do dispence with you, so that any Impediment thro' the foresaid Affinity between you, any Apostolical Constitution, Ordinance or Pretence whatsoever notwithstanding, you may lawfully contract Marriage together per verba de presenti, and when it is so contracted, altho' it should already have been either publicly and openly, or privately and clandestinely contracted, and perhaps by Carnal Knowledge consummated, that you therein may lawfully continue and remain, and we do by the same Authority absolve and free you and either of you from all Censure and Sentence of Excommunication, which you may have incur'd by having de facto enter'd into this Contract of Marriage before this Dispensation; and we do further pronounce all the Children legitimate, either already or yet to be born from the said Marriage, either now or to be hereafter contracted. Provided that you (Daughter Katharine) have not by force and violence been hereto compell'd; provided also, that if you have already actually contracted the said Marriage, your Confessor, to be by you both or either of you appointed, do therefore lay upon you some wholesome Penance, which you are hereby oblig'd to do. Let therefore no mortal Man presume to infringe this our Sentence of Absolution and Dispensation, or with rash Boldness to contradict our Will herein; and if any one shall be so presumptuous as to attempt any thing contradictory hereunto, let him take notice that he shall therefore incur the Vengeance of the Almighty God, and of his blessed Apostles St. Peter and St. Paul.

WE Balthazar de Castiglione of Mantua, Notary of the Apostolical See, and Nuncio of the said See, in the Kingdom of Spain, and all other Territories and Places subject to the Temporal Dominion of their most Serene Majesties Charles elected Emperor and Joan, most Catholick King and Queen, and Alfonsus de Fonseca, by the Grace of God, Archbishop of Toledo, Primate of Spain, and High Chancellor of the Kingdoms of Castile, to all and every one to whom these Presents may come, and whom the Knowledge thereof may any ways concern, Health in the Lord. Know ye that we formerly received with all due reverence the Letter of our most holy Father in Christ, Pope Julius II. of happy memory, in form of a Breve, under the Seal of the Fisher; which Letter was shewn us in the presence of his most Sacred, most Imperial, and most Catholick Majesty Charles, by the Grace of God, elected Emperor of the Romans, being whole and entire, no ways viciated nor cancell'd, nor on any account or in part of it to be suspected, but free from all manner of suspicion or colour of Deceit. The outward Superscription of which Letter was in this manner: To our beloved Son Henry, Son of our most dearly beloved in Christ Henry King of England, and to our beloved Daughter Catherine, Daughter of our most dearly beloved in Christ Ferdinand and Elizabeth, most Catholick King and Queen of Spain and Sicily. And the Contents of the Letter within was to this effect: Julius II. Pope, sends you, Dear Son and dear Daughter in Christ, Health and Apostolical Benediction. The Supreme Authority of the Pope exercises its Power granted from above, as it shall seem most wholesom and expedient in Christ, according to the difference of Persons, Things and Times. Your Petition lately exhibited to us did set forth that you, Daughter Catherine, and Arthur (eldest Son of the most Illustrious and our most beloved Son in Christ Henry King of England) since deceased, for the better preserving and continuing the Leagues and Treaties of Peace and Friendship between our most dear Son in Christ Ferdinand, our most dear Daughter in Christ Elizabeth, most Catholick King and Queen of Spain and Sicily, and the foresaid King of England; did lawfully contract a Marriage in Words de

1529. presenti, and did perhaps consummate it by carnal Knowledge; Now because Prince Arthur dying without Issue by this Marriage, in all likelihood this bond of Peace and Amity between the said Kings and Queen would not last so firm, as if strengthen'd and supported by a new tie of Affinity: You therefore, for these and certain other Causes, desire lawfully in Words de presenti to contract Marriage; which desire as you may not in the Premises fulfil without our Apostolical Dispensation therein first had, You therefore have made it your humble request, that we would of our Apostolical Grace and Favour vouchsafe you our Dispensation in the Premises. We therefore, out of our hearty Inclination and earnest Desire that Peace and Concord should ever flourish and remain among all the Faithful in Christ, but more especially among all Catholick Kings and Princes; these and other Reasons us thereunto moving, in compliance with your Request herein, do by these presents of our Apostolical Authority dispence with you, so that it may be and is lawful for you, any Impediment arising from your Affinity by reason of the Premises notwithstanding, to contract Marriage together, and in it so contracted lawfully and freely to live and continue: And, inasmuch as perhaps you may have already publicly or clandestinely de facto contracted Marriage, and consummated it by Carnal Knowledge, we do in such case by the same Authority free and absolve you or either of you from Censure and the Sentence of Excommunication, which you may thereby have incurred, and we in like manner dispence with you herein, that you may be empower'd freely and lawfully to live and continue in the Marriage de facto thus contracted, or to contract it anew; and we do declare and pronounce that all the Children born or to be born from this Marriage contracted or to be contracted, be, and be accounted legitimate. But our Will is, that if this Marriage was contracted de facto before this Dispensation, that a Confessor, to be appointed by both or either of you, do therefore injoin you some Penance, which you are hereby bound to do. Given at Rome at St. Peters under the Seal of the Fisherman, December 26. 1503. in the first Year of our Pontificat.

Sigismundus.

Which Letter being by us Balthazar de Castiglione as Apostolical Nuncio, and Alfonsus de Fonseca, as Ordinary of the place, diligently read over and carefully examin'd, and because we found it as is aforesaid perfect and intire, without any Colour or Suspicion of Deceit, therefore by the express Desire of his said Imperial and Catholick Majesty, both in his own, and in the Name of the most Serene Catherine Queen of England his most dear Aunt and Cousin, in as much as it greatly concerned both himself and the said Queen, for the perpetual remembrance thereof, that the foresaid Original may not be consumed by time, and that certain knowledge may be had of the Tenor and Contents of it as often as it shall be necessary, and in such places as by reason of Wars or the hazard of Carriage it may not be safe to transmit or trust the Original Dispensation, in compliance with the so reasonable and just request of his said most sacred Majesty, we caused the said Letter to be copied, transcribed and publickly attested; willing and decreeing that to this Copy thus faithfully transcribed and publickly notify'd as unquestionable Credit shall, in all places where it is thought fitting to produce it, be given as to the Original Letter it self. To all which both of us do give our Authoritative Decree and Sanction. And for the fuller and more certain confirmation of the truth of these Premises, we have both to this present Instrument set our Hands and Seals.

In the presence of these most Noble and most Illustrious Lords, Henry Count de Nassau. The Marquis de Zenete, Lord High-Chamberlain. Don Juan Manuel, Don Laurence de Gorreudo, Knights of the Golden Fleece. Charles de Popeto, Lord of Chaulx. Ludovicus à Flandria, Lord of Prato. Nicholaus Perrenot, Lord of Grandville. All of the Privy-Council to his said most Sacred, most Imperial and most Catholick Majesty, who were specially called and appointed Witnesses hereto. Balthazar de Castiglione, Nuncio and Apostolical Collector; Alphonsus, Archbishop of Toledo. I Johannes Vergara, Canon of Toledo, Professor in Divinity, and by the Apostolical Authority appointed Publick Notary, who was present at the signing and sealing of all the Premises, and saw the said Witnesses subscribe their hands, have signed this Publick Instrument, and set my Name to it, in testimony of the Truth, being thereunto called and requir'd by his said Imperial Catholick Majesty.

Against these Dispensations the following Objections were us'd. July 9.

- I. That the Peace and Unity betwixt England and Spain was firm before the granting of the Dispensation, which yet was alledged as a Cause. Objections against the Bull and Breve.
- II. That the said Dispensation, as being grounded on this Pretext, must be held surreptitious, Henry VIII. being then not above thirteen, and consequently unable for Marriage, which also if the Pope had known beforehand, or that otherwise it had been represented to him, he would not have easily granted any such Dispensation.
- III. Because it was pretended that Henry VIII. had desir'd the Match only for maintaining Peace betwixt the two Kingdoms; whereas, (being then not above thirteen) he must be thought incapable of such Thoughts.
- IV. That though this Dispensation might once be thought to have his Force and Vertue, yet seeing the Motive of granting it was grounded upon the above-mention'd Peace, and that one of the said Princes dy'd before the solemnizing of the said Marriage, the Cause of the Dispensation must be held void.
- V. That, supposing the Objection of Affinity were taken away by vertue of the said Dispensation, yet the Objection de publica honestate was not clear'd.
- VI. That the Breve above-mention'd appears by the Tenor of it to contain many Falshoods and Suspicions, and particularly that the Stile, Inditing, 1529. Inditing, as also many Clauses and Circumstances differ from the Bull, so that it may be thought forged since the time of the Questions moved concerning this Matrimony; as by comparing them together may be manifestly gather'd.

Reasons against them.

This also was urged by these Reasons:

1. That in the Register-Book of the Breves at Rome, no such Breve is found, or any Argument that such a Breve was made.

2. That likewise neither in the Chartophylacio, or Paper-Chamber of the King, no such Breve is extant, nor otherways, in the private Treaties of the Marriage, any mention is made thereof.

3. That in the Date of the said Breve, as it is exemplify'd, the Year of our Lord is discrepant from the vulgar account; for whereas the Stile of the Court of Rome begins always from the Nativity of our Lord, this seems to be a Year before Julius was made Pope.

All which Objections were deliver'd to the King's Proctor, that he might answer to them.

Whereupon Witnesses being summon'd to appear July 12.

Thomas Duke of Norfolk, Charles Duke of Suffolk,
Thomas Marquis Dorset, George Earl of Shrewsbury, Thomas Viscount Rochfort, Robert Viscount Fitzwater, John Bishop of Carlisle,
Sir David Owen,
Sir John Hussey,
Sir Richard Weston, Knights, with divers others, presented themselves to be examin'd, by the Archdeacon of Buckingham, above-mention'd.

In the mean while, these two Articles were added to the former, as serving to strengthen the Objections above-mention'd.

1. That the Year for Pope's Breves begins December 26. and the Year for Bulls the 25th of March.

2. That in all Marriages contracted within the Kingdom of England, the Form hath been in Words, De presenti, ego accipio te, &c.

Businesses being thus ripe for examination of Witnesses, the Depositions of two antient Ladies, who excus'd themselves by their Infirmary from appearing in Person, were publickly read.

1. The first, being Mary Countess of Essex, said little, but in general terms.

2. But Agnes the old Dutches of Norfolk, who was present at the Marriage at St. Paul's in London, declar'd the Age of Prince Arthur at the time of his said Marriage to be about fifteen; and moreover, did positively affirm, that she saw Prince Arthur and the Lady Katharine, alone, in bed together, the next Night after their Marriage. Which therefore, as also a following Deposition of the Viscountess Fitzwater, may serve to answer Sanders's Tale, where he saith, a grave Matron was put into the same bed with him, to hinder the Prince from knowing her carnally.

3. George Earl of Shrewsbury depos'd, the Marriage was celebrated at St. Paul's, Decimo septimo Henrici Septimi, 1501. adding further, that Prince Arthur was born at Winchester, secundo Henrici Septimi; and that he believ'd the Prince knew his Lady carnally, both as being able so to do, as also because himself knew his Wife being not sixteen.

4. William Warham Archbishop of Canterbury, being examin'd, protests not to reveal any Secrets of the Queen, as being her sworn Counsellor. For the rest, as he answer'd warily to the Questions propounded him concerning the Validity of the March, insomuch that he refer'd himself therein to the Judges, who were to determine it; so yet he made no difficulty to confess that he approv'd it not at first; which also he declar'd, not only in a Contestation which he had with Richard Fox Bishop of Winchester, who perswaded it, but in certain Words to King Henry VII. himself, whom he told plainly, that the Marriage seem'd to him neither honourable, nor well pleasing to God. Adding further, that because the said King Henry VII. appear'd not much inclin'd to the Marriage, that he the said Deponent intreated him to persuade his Son Prince Henry to protest that he would not take the Lady Katharine to Wife, and that he should renew this Protestation when he came to the Crown; which also he the said Deponent believeth was made. Notwithstanding, that when the Bull of Dispensation was granted, that he the said Deponent contradicted it no more; and that the murmuring of the People on that occasion was quieted, till the King's Conscience being troubled, reviv'd it again.

5. Sir William Thomas, Knight, depos'd, Prince Arthur and the Lady Katharine liv'd five Months, partly about London, and partly at Ludlow, in household together as Man and Wife; and that he heard Sir William Wodall, who was at the Prince's Christning, say, that he was above fifteen at the time of his Marriage, and the Lady Katharine elder.

6. Sir Anthony Poynes, Knight, depos'd, that Prince Arthur was above fifteen at the time of his Marriage.

7. Thomas Marquis Dorset depos'd, he saw a Register of the Nativity of the King's Children; by which he found the Prince Arthur born September 20. 1486. and that at the time of his Marriage (which was upon a Sunday, in November, decimo septimo Henrici septimi) he was of a good and sanguine Complexion, and able as he suppos'd for that purpose.

8. Robert Viscount Fitzwater depos'd, the Prince was then about fifteen, and Queen Katharine elder; and that, the next day after being in bed together, (which he remember'd after they enter'd to have been solemnly blest'd) he waited at Breakfast on Prince Arthur, where Maurice St. Johns did carve, and he the Lord Fitzwater gave Drink: At which time the said Maurice demanding of the Prince how he had done that night? The Prince answer'd, I have been in Spain this night.

9, 10, 11. Thomas Lord Darcy, William Lord Montejoy, and Henry Guldeford, Knight of the Garter, said little, but by way of publick report.

12. Charles Duke of Suffolk depos'd, that he was in the Bishop of London's Palace the morrow next following the day of Marriage, and that he waited there upon the Prince at Breakfast, confirming moreover in effect the Words of Maurice St. John, before set down. Furthermore, he added, that the Shrovetide following the Marriage, (which was in November preceding) the said Prince began to decay, and grow feeble in body; which grew, as the said St. John related, by reason the said Prince lay with the Lady Katharine.

13. David Owen depos'd, that Prince Arthur was born at Winchester, secundo Henrici septimi; which he knew, because he was at the Christning.

14. Thomas Duke of Norfolk, Lord Treasurer of England, depos'd, that he being the day of the Marriage in the Bishop of London's Palace, and the morrow after, at the Prince's Breakfast, 1529. heard the Prince's Words to Maurice St. John, when he said he had been that night in the midst of Spain; by which Words, as also because Prince Arthur was a Gentleman of a good Complexion and Nature, and above fifteen, he believes that he carnally knew his Lady; because himself also at the same age did carnally know and use: And he believes this the rather, that he heard from credible Persons, that the said Prince Arthur did lie with the said Lady Katharine five or six nights afterwards.

15. Anthony Willoughby, Knight, deposed, that being the morrow after the Marriage in the Prince's Privy-Chamber, the said Prince spake afore divers Witnesses these Words, Willoughby, give me a Cup of Ale, for I have been this night in the midst of Spain: After which he said, Masters, it is a good Pastime to have a Wife; which Words he repeated also divers other times. Moreover, he heard say they lay at Ludlow together the Shrove-tide next following.

16. Nicholas Bishop of Ely said, he could depose nothing concerning the carnalis copula, but that he doubted of it, because the Queen often sub testimonio conscientie sue said to this Deponent, that she was never carnally known of Prince Arthur, though otherwise he must confess them both to be legitime atatis at the time of their Marriage. He doubted further, whether the Cardinals were competent Judges, an Appeal being made from them.

17. Richard Sacheverel, Knight, deposed, the People said commonly, that it was unfit one Brother should marry the other Brother's Wife.

18. Thomas Viscount Rochefort, deposed, that he heard divers of Prince Arthur's Followers confirm the Words he used, of his having been in Spain the night of his Marriage. Moreover, he heard say, that King Henry VIII. was persuaded by his Confessor, about two Years since, to abstain from the Bed of the Lady Katharine, lest he should offend his Conscience.

19, 20, 21, 22, 23. Sir Richard Weston, and Sir John Hussy, Knights, deposed, the Age of King Henry VIII. was thirty eight upon the Eve of the Feast of St. Peter and St. Paul last; which Viscount Rochefort also confirm'd, saying the place of his Birth was Greenwich, and the Year was 1491. and Day the twenty eighth of June; which Robert Viscount Fitzwater confirmed also, adding that King Henry VII. died two Days before the Feast of St. George, twenty Years since; with whom David Owen, Servant and Counsellor to King Henry VII. agreed, save only, that he said it was three Days before the Feast.

24. Thomas Duke of Norfolk deposed, that Pedro de Ayala or Allea, and Doctor de Puebla, Ambassadors from Spain, were much in favour heretofore with Henry VII. and that Henry VII. died before the Marriage betwixt his Son Prince Henry and the Princess Katharine; and Queen Isabel or Elizabeth her Mother died also before that time.

25. William Warham Archbishop of Canterbury, and Counsellor to Henry VII. and Henry VIII. for thirty six Years last past, deposed, that he conceived Henry VIII. to be under thirteen, at the time of Dispensation granted; because King Henry his Father told him that he was impubes, after that time. Whereupon this Deponent reply'd to the King, that any Protestation he should then make, would be of no force, and therefore he should make it again one or two Days after his coming to annos pubertatis.

26, 27. Charles Duke of Suffolk, and Thomas Marquis Dorset, examined again, said little but what was formerly set down.

28. Pedro Mates, Utriusque Juris Doctor, Native of Barcelona in Spain, who had lived in the Court of Rome thirty Years, in exercitio causarum, deposed, that the Date of Years there is computed after three divers manners; so that Judgments, Contracts, and last Wills, bear date from the Nativity 25 Decembris; Littere Apostolicæ sub plumbo xxv of March; Littere Apostolicæ per Breve sub annulo piscatoris, ceræ rubæ impresso scribuntur simpliciter & absolute absque expressione ipsius Domini aut Nativitatis, aut Incarnationis, sed solum Anno M. D. &c. Yet so that he conceiv'd it began always à Nativitate, scilicet xxv Decembris; neither doth he know any thing to the contrary, except the Pope's Secretary alter the Style.

29. Nicolaus Rusticus of Lucca in Italy, saith, that Annus Domini in Brevibus Apostolicis is computed from the Nativity of our Lord.

30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36. Thomas Viscount Rochefort, Henry Guilford Knight, Thomas Marquis Dorset, Thomas Duke of Norfolk, William Falke Notarius Publicus, John Taverner, and John Clamport, being examined, deposed, that the Forms of Marriages are always in verbis de presenti, in England.

37. The Lady Elizabeth, Wife to Viscount Fitzwater, deposed, that she saw the Lady Katharine and Prince Arthur in bed together, which was blest, and that she left them alone together.

Hereupon the Depositions were published, and July 17. the King's Proctor summon'd to receive those Acts and Writings he deliver'd into the Court; but he not appearing, is pronounced contumacious.

The Commissioners yet proceeded to require the sight of the Archiva, and Record concerning this business; for which purpose Thomas Wriothesley, and Thomas Teng King of Arms, had been employ'd: These Men certified that Prince Arthur died in the Castle of Ludlow the second of April, 1502. and that his Brother Henry was born the twenty eighth of June, 1491. and that the Marriage betwixt Prince Arthur and the Lady Katharine was the fourteenth of November, 1501.

This being done, a Deposition of Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester, taken by Doctor Woolman, April 5 and 6. 1527. was read. The most substantial part whereof was, that he conceived Doctor Puebla did first motion this Match, and that more than one Bull was impetrated for dispensing therewith, whereof two remained in England, one or two were extant in Spain, but all of the same Tenor, and gotten without asking the consent of Henry VIII. Furthermore, that he did not remember that Henry VIII. when he came to age, did expressly consent to, or dissent from the intended Marriage, yet that he believed that a Protestation was made in the Name of Henry VIII. to this effect: That notwithstanding any Contract or Tokens mutually sent, or Cohabitation in the House of King Henry VII. he would not hold himself bound to ratifie this Act done in his Non-age; and that this Protestation is to be found inter protocolla Magistri Ryden, then Clerk to the Council, before whom it was made. As for the Person by whom this Protestation was made, Coram Magistro Ryden Notario publico; credit quod vel ipsemet, vel Magister Thomas Rutha tunc Secretarius Domini Regis, & postea Episcopus Dunelm. vel Mr. Doctor West tunc consiliarius ejusdem domini Regis & nunc Episcopus Eliens. fecit eandem protestationem nomine domini nostri Regis Henrici Octavi moderni; presentibus tunc ibidem Comite de Surrey tunc Thesaurario Angliæ & postea Duce Norfolciæ ac domino Doctore Peobela, & coram saepe dicta clarissima Domina Catharina, ut recolit, ac infra Aedes Episcopi Dunelm. vulgariter nuncupat. Duresine-place. Adding further, that our King was not present there, that he remembers. Furthermore, that upon conference

1527. Apr 5 & 6. Bishop of Winchester examined.

1529. ference had betwixt Henry VII. and himself, he found it was the intention of that King, that his Son Henry should marry the said Lady Katharine, although he deferr'd the Solemnization of this intended Matrimony, by reason of some discord which was at that time betwixt him and the King of Spain, for the calling back of the Dowry. He added moreover, that King Henry intended not (that he knew) to marry the Mother of Charles V, but his Aunt Margaret, Dutchess of Savoy.

This Examination being compleat, and set down by Andrew Smith Notary, the said Doctor Woolman requir'd him to subscribe his Hand; which was refus'd by the said Bishop, both because he was blind of both eyes, as that he was not admitted to take any Counsel or Advice about it. But Doctor Woolman pressing him on the Kings part, that he should subscribe his Name, he at last assented, out of the reverence he bore to the King, and that he never contravened him in any thing. Whereupon he subscrib'd his Name April 8. the year above mention'd, being 1527. After which also another Instrument of this tenor was produc'd.

Augustinus Spinola ut Sancti Cyriaci in thermis presbiter Cardinalis, Sanctae Romanae Ecclesiae Cameraarius, Universis & singulis praesentes literas Inspecturis Salutem in domino. Rationi convenit & congruit honestatibus de his quae a Romanis Pontificibus processerunt, & quae in eorum archivis & registris scripta, & registrata sunt, cum ab aliquibus petitur, testimonium veritatis perhibeatur; hinc est, quod nos Universitati vestrae tenore praesentium fidem facimus & attestamus, in libris & Registris camerae Apostolicae, viz. in libro Registri Brevium Anni primi, secundi, & tertii felix recordationis Julii Papae secundi, vidimus & legimus quasdam literas Apostolicas, in forma Brevis ejusdem Julii Papae secundi (ut moris est) Registratas, quarum tenor successively sequitur; & est talis. Accepimus literas tuae serenitatis, in quibus nobis gratias agis, quod Oratoribus tuis honorifice obviam proditum sit, quod nos eos benigne audierimus, ac liberali responso opportunisque gratis & favoribus prosecuti fuerimus: facis (fili Charissime) pro solita pietate, ut ea etiam tibi sint grata, quae a nobis praeteriri non solent. Declaravimus nostris bonis in te mentis affectum verbis & rebus quibus potuimus, Declarabimus & quotidie magis, ita exigente tuae serenitatis in nos & sanctam Apostolicam sedem devotione & observantia singulari. De dispensatione matrimoniali nunquam negavimus, nec ullam suspicionem praebuimus, quo minus eam facere vellemus, ut aliqui minus vere dixerunt. Augustinus Spinola Priest, Cardinal St. Syriaci in Thermis, and High Chamberlain of the Holy Church in Rome, to all and singular to whom these presents may pertain, Health in the Lord. It is not only agreeable to Reason, but a point of Honesty, that when enquiry is by any Persons made into the Processes of the Popes which have been written, register'd, and enter'd into their Books, and preserv'd in their Archives, that a true and just account of them should be given: For which reason we do make known and testify to every of you, by the tenor of these Presents, that in the Books and Registers of the Apostolical Chamber, to wit, in the Book of the Register of the Breves of the first, second and third years of Pope Julius II. of happy Memory; we have seen, and read a certain Apostolical Letter in form of a Breve of the said Pope Julius II. Register'd according to Custom, the tenor of which is to this effect. To our most dear Son in Christ, the most Illustrious King of England, Health and Apostolical Benediction. Most Dear Son in Christ, we have receiv'd your Highnesses's Letters, in which you give us thanks for so graciously receiving your Ambassadors, for granting them such ready Audience, giving them such kind Answers, and bestowing upon them other marks of our Grace and Favour. To esteem so highly, most dear Son, which light favours is the effect of that Piety and Gratitude you have never fail'd to shew. We have indeed already made manifest both in our Words and Actions, as far as we were able, our good affection to you, nor shall we ever be backward to manifest the same in more instances, it being but reasonable and just so to do, on account of your Highness's great Zeal for, and particular Devotion towards us, and the Apostolical See. As for the Dispensation in the point of your Marriage, it has never been by us deny'd, nor have we ever given any just cause to suspect that we would deny it, as some have basely suggested: On the contrary our answer has been, that we wait only till a more seasonable and proper time shall offer it self, that it may be done more to the reputation of both Parties, and to the Honour of the Holy See than now. When we shall find this more proper season to grant the Dispensation, as we have determin'd to grant it, We do purpose to send it (as a thing of great Trust and Moment) by our Beloved Son Dr. Robert Sherbon Dean of St. Paul's London, one of your Ambassadors, who together with his extraordinary Learning, has given evident proofs of his Modesty, Fidelity and Diligence; and this we choose to do on two accounts, both that it may by him be convey'd with Secrecy and Privacy; and besides that, we may farther recommend one of his great Capacity and Integrity, as a Person whose Fidelity and Services may be of further use to your Highness at home, since the disagreeableness of this Air to him, and the excessiveness of the heat make it impossible for him to continue longer at Rome without hazard of his Life.

The rest, having little material, save that mention is made how the Cardinal Sancti Petri ad vincula, the Popes Nephew, was made Protector of the English, I have purposely omitted, that I may insert another Letter of the Popes of 22 of February 1505. the Tenor whereof is this:

Charissimo in Christo filio nostro Henrico Angliae Regi illustri. Charissime in Christo fili noster, Salutem & Apostolicam benedict. Intelleximus a dilecto filio G. Cardinali Sancti Petri ad vincula tui Regnique tui protectore, nostro secundum carnem nepote, & a venerabili fratre nostro Silvestro Episcopo Wigorn. tuae serenitatis apud nos oratore, literas dispensationis matrimonialis tantopere ab eis, nomine tuae serenitatis, petitas, ex hispaniis ad te missas fuisse. Sed cum claræ memoriæ Elizabeth Hispaniarum Regina Catholica finem hujus mortalis vitæ sibi instare cerneret, impensa & maxima cum instantia per oratorem suum nobis humiliter supplicasset, ut pro consolatione sua duplum dictarum literarum ei concedere dignaremur, quod hanc consolationem sibi dare vellemus ut de hujusmodi dispensatione certior facta æquiori animo ab ipsa vita migraret: Nosque pietatis Christianæ & nostræ in illam charitatis paternæ esse putavimus non defraudare ipsam Reginam jam-jam morituram desiderio hujus rei, in qua etiam subditis & Regnicolis illis bonam spem conjunctionis tuæ serenitatis posset afferre, præsertim quod idem orator rem hanc secretam futuram pollicebatur, (quod ab eo non servatum molestissime fecimus) Bullam igitur Originalem apud nos servatam serenitati tuæ, una cum Ense, quo te pro tua singulari virtute, & in sanctam sedem Apostolicam pietate donandi, merito ducimus, per eundem Episcopum Wigorn. nobis probatum & clarum decrevimus mittere, à quo serenitas ipsa tua uberius intelliget causas ejusdem Bullæ hæcenus apud nos retentæ, & nonnulla alia sibi per nos commissæ negotia. Nec miretur majestas tua, si de hac re nihil cum ipsis Cardinali & oratore communicavimus, nunquam enim putavimus fore, ut ab oratore dictæ Regine deciperemur, & literæ dispensationis prædictæ ad te ex Hispaniis mitterentur, quas ut solum Regine tam periculose ægotanti pro solamine suo ostenderentur duplicari concesseramus. Nam, præterquam tuæ serenitati de nobis & sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ benemeritæ gratificari cupimus, ipsis Cardinali & Episcopo oratori tuo meritam fidei & diligentie laudem in tuis negotiis promovendis dare debemus. Feb. 22.

To our most beloved Son in Christ, the most Illustrious Henry King of England, Health and Apostolical Benediction. We have been inform'd by our beloved Son in Christ, the Cardinal St. Petri ad Vincula, the Protector of you and your Kingdoms, and our Nephew according to the Flesh; and by our venerable Brother Sylvester Bishop of Worcester, your Highness's Ambassador here, that the Letters of Dispensation in the point of your Marriage, which they have so long solicited in your Highness's Name to procure, have already been sent to you from Spain. Know therefore, most dear Son, that at the instance of the foresaid Cardinal and Bishop, but in respect wholly to your self, we did grant the said Dispensation, and in consequence appointed our Bull under the Seal of Lead to be got ready to be sent your Highness in due time by the foresaid Cardinal and Bishop. But whereas Elizabeth, of Glorious Memory, most Catholick Queen of Spain, perceiving her self to be now finishing the course of her mortal Life, did with great Earnestness, and most pressing Instances by her Ambassador, most humbly entreat us, that we would vouchsafe for her Consolation, to grant her a Copy of the said Letter, that being by us fully satisfy'd of this Dispensation, she might to her great comfort depart this life in Peace; We thought it a piece of Christianity, and an indispensable part of our paternal Love and Affection toward her, to comply with the Queen's earnest request at a time she was expiring, in communicating to her the knowledge of a thing, which even to the commonest and meanest of her Subjects, would give comfortable and chearful hopes from the prospect of so near an Alliance with your Highness; especially when her Ambassador promis'd

the greatest faithfulness and secrecy herein (which promise we are greatly griev'd and troubl'd that he hath broken.) The Original Bull we judg'd meet and convenient, to keep by us till we have an opportunity to send it you, by the same our most dear and most faithful Bishop of Worcester, together with the Sword which we thought fit to present your Highness for your singular Piety, and filial Obedience to the Holy Apostolical See, at which time your Highness will receive more perfect information, as well of the reason of our delaying hitherto to send the Bull, as also in some other affairs with which we have intrusted him. Nor ought your Majesty to wonder, that we have not communicated before any thing hereof to our Cardinals, or your Majesties Ambassador, since we could never have thought it possible, that the Ambassador of her said Majesty should have herein thus deceiv'd us, and that the said Letters of Dispensation should be transmitted to you from Spain, the Copy of which we granted only for the consolation of the said Queen, who thus lay at the point of Death: And not denying them to your Highness for want of Inclination, which we with great reason have, to gratify your desires herein, who have so well deserv'd of us, and of the Holy Catholick Church, nor out of distrust or disrespect to the said Cardinal or Bishop your Ambassador, of whose Fidelity and Diligence in promoting your Affairs, we are abundantly satisfy'd.

1505. in the second year of our Pontificate.

And that these are true Copies, Augustinus Spinola, at the instance of King Henry VIII, and by the commandment of the Pope, did certify under the Hand and Seal of his Office the twenty seventh of January, 1529.

In sequence whereof, the Commissioners took Oath of the Kings of Arms, that the Copies they deliver'd were true, appointing further the next Wednesday, ad concludendum. Upon which day (being 21 July) the Commissioners being late, John Hughes, Promoter, appear'd before them, and signified that there is found a certain Protestation made by our King, when he came to ripe years, in the presence of Notaries and Witnesses, and subscrib'd with the hand of the said King (at that time Prince of Wales) and some Counsellors of King Henry VII, which he said were much to the purpose of the business then in question. Whereupon the Commissioners receiv'd the said Protestation in præsentia dicti Magistri Ricardi Sampson Procuratoris Regis, & in contumaciam Regine; Commanding further, that it should remain penes acta sua. The tenor of which Protestation is thus:

In Dei nomine Amen. Coram vobis Reverendo in Christo Patre & domino domino Ricardo Dei & Apostolice sedis gratia Episcopo Wintoniensi, Ego Henricus Walliæ Princeps, Dux Cornubiæ, & Comes Cestriæ, dico, allego & in his scriptis propono, Quod licet ego minorem ætatem agens & intra annos pubertatis notorie existens, cum Serenissima domina Catharina Hispaniarum Regis filia, Matrimonium de facto contraxerim, qui quidem Contractus quamvis obstante ipsa minore ætate mea de se jam invalidus, Imperfectus, nullius efficaciæ aut vigoris extiterit; Quia tamen annis pubertatis & matura ætate mea jam supervenient, contractus ipse per tacitum consensum, mutuum cohabitationem, munerum aut intersignium dationem seu receptionem, vel alium quemcunque modum Jure declaratum forsan existimari seu videri poterit apparenter validatus aut confirmatus; Ea-propter, Ego Henricus Walliæ Princeps

Henry Marny.

In the name of God, Amen. In the presence of you the Reverend Father in Christ, by the grace of God, and favour of the Apostolical See, Richard Lord Bishop of Winchester; I Henry Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester, do say, alledge, and by this writing set forth; that although in my Minority and Being not as yet arriv'd to ripeness of Age for giving my Consent, I have de facto contracted a Marriage with the most serene Lady Catherine, Daughter of the King of Spain, which Contract, although it be of it self invalid, imperfect, and of no effect and force, by reason of my said Minority; yet because this Contract when I shall come to age and years of Consent, may appear and seem valid, and confirm'd by tacit Consent, mutual Cohabitation, giving and receiving Tokens and Gifts, or any other determinate way; for these Causes, I the foresaid Henry Prince of Wales, now nearly arriv'd to maturity of Age, and being, just at years of consent, do hereby Protest, that by any thing said or to be said, done, or to be done, I do not intend to ratify, confirm, or make valid the said pretended Contract of Marriage; but by these Presents, being thereunto mov'd neither by force, craft, nor intreaty, but voluntarily, freely, and without any compulsion whatever, I do renounce and disclaim the said Contract; and do resolve and intend by the most powerful means, in the most significant terms, and most effectual manner I can to renounce, disclaim, and dissent from the said pretended Marriage Contract, as the same is hereby renounc'd, disclaim'd, and dissented from. And I farther protest, that by any Word, Deed, Action or Behaviour, said or done by my self, or by any other in my Name, or to be said, acted, done or perform'd by any Person at any time, or in any manner whatsoever, I do not consent to the said Marriage Contract, or receive the said Lady Catherine as my lawful Spouse and Wife; To all which Premises, this my Testimony is given, set forth and publish'd by me,

Henry Prince of Wales.

The above written Protestation was made and read by the most Serene Prince the Lord Henry, before the Reverend Father in Christ, Richard Lord Bishop of Winchester, who then sat Judge, and before me the under-written Notary Publick, who took it in Writing, in the presence of the under-written Witnesses, in the year of our Lord 1505. in the eighth Indiction, in the second year of the Pontificat of our most Holy Father in Christ, by the Divine Providence Julius II. Pope, on the 27th day of June, on which day his most Serene Highness the Prince, was entering upon years of Maturity and Age of Consent, as he there asserted, in a certain ground Room, under the Royal Palace of Richmond, situate in the Western part of the said Palace. Concerning all which, and singular the Premises, his said most Serene Highness the Prince, instantly order'd and demanded of me the said Notary, to draw up this publick Instrument, and the under-written Witnesses thereto to bear Testimony. In Proof and Evidence of all which things, and every of them, his said most Serene Highness the Prince, and the Witnesses, as is aforesaid, being thereunto call'd and requir'd, set their Names subscrib'd with their own Hands. The truth of all which, I John Read testifie, by setting thereto my Hand and Seal Manual.

G. Daubney, C. Somerfet,

Thomas Rowthale, Nicholas West,

Henry Marny.

Among whom Nicholas West, above-nam'd, now Bishop of Ely, in presence of the Commissioners, acknowledg'd and confess'd, that this Protestation was subscrib'd with his own Hand. Whereupon the Commissioners, in contumaciam Reginae, did, in the presence of the above-mention'd Protector, continue and Prorogue the Court, till Friday next following, warning the said Protector also to be there. Upon which day, being the twenty third of July, the Court being set, the July 23. Promoter above-mention'd signify'd unto the Commissioners, that all that was requisite for the instruction and information of their Understanding and Consciences, had been judicially propos'd and exhibited to them, and remain'd in their custody, and that therefore this day was assign'd, and appointed for concluding the business. Notwithstanding because Cardinal Campejus alledg'd and protested in verbo veri Prelati, that a certain general Vacation, which he term'd Ferias generales messium & vindemiarum, was observ'd in the Court of Rome every year, before the said Friday;

1529. day; and because he and his Colleague were bound to follow the stile of the said Court in the Process of the above-mention'd Cause; therefore the said Judges, in the presence of the Kings Proctor, and in contumaciam Regine, did prorogue the conclusion of this business, until the first of October next following, warning the Kings Proctor then to appear, and receive a conclusion of this business as should be according to Justice. All which pass'd in the presence of Thomas Duke of Norfolk, the Bishop of Ely, and divers other Persons.

And thus much out of the Record formerly mention'd; which I have with more particularity set down, in that it is so rare and unusual a case to find a Prince submit himself, in his own Kingdom, to the Judgment of two Persons, whereof one was a suspected Stranger, the other, in Birth but of the meanest of his Subjects and after all this, to receive no other fruit hereof, but delay and insatisfaction; as appears not only by this abrupt Dismission, but by a sudden Advocacion of the Cause, to the Pope, inhibiting further proceedings here (as will appear shortly after;) the consequences whereof extended further yet than our King then thought, or the Pope could easily have imagin'd.

These Proceedings were subscrib'd by the Notaries William Chyburgh, Doctor of both Laws, Protonotarius Apostolicus, Florianus Montinus, and Richard Watkins, who acknowledg'd the rasures, interlineations and lines in the Margin, together with the number of the leaves in the Parchment Book (being 69.) To which also Letter-testimonial from Nicholas Wotton, Doctor of the Laws, and the Bishop of London's Official, having the Seal of the Office, were annex'd. After all which, a Dispensation, written by a later hand, and in loose Paper, was found in the said Book. Though that alone should not have induc'd me to publish it, had I not seen it already printed in a Book call'd Anti-Sanderus, and met in our Archives some dispatches that make it probable.

The Tenor of the Bull is this.

Bull for a new Dispensation.

Clemens Episcopus Servus Servorum Dei, Charissimo in Christo filio nostro Henrico Angliæ Regi Illustri, Fidei defensori, Salutem & Apostolicam benedictionem. Clement Bishop, Servant of the Servants of God, to our most dear Son in Christ, the most Illustrious Henry King of England, Defender of the Faith, Health and Apostolical Benediction. You have caus'd to be laid before us, that heretofore you, and our beloved Daughter in Christ Catherine Widow of  your own Brother, knowing the Relation that was between you, of the first degree of Affinity, did de facto contract Marriage in Words de præsentis, and did consummate the said Marriage by carnal Knowledge, and from thence had Children born, having no sufficient canonical Dispensation granted you to that effect, incurring therefore the Sentence of Excommunication: And whereas your Majesty who cannot without Sin live in the said Marriage, does desire to continue no longer in the said Sin, nor lie under the sentence of Excommunication; but by some competent Ecclesiastical Judge, to receive the benefit of Absolution from the said sentence of Excommunication, and that the Marriage it self should be declar'd to have been, and still to be null and invalid, and that it is, and may be lawful for you to marry any other Woman, any Canon to the contrary notwithstanding, and that in consequence of such Declaration of the nullity of the said Marriage, you may be dispens'd with, lawfully to marry any other Woman, and with her in Marriage freely to live, and lawful Issue by her to have, although she may be one who has already contracted Marriage with some other Person, provided she hath not consummated it by Carnal Knowledge; and although she may be related to you in the second or more remote degree of Consanguinity, or first degree of Affinity, either from lawful or forbidden Wedlock, provided she be not the Widow of your said Brother, and although she may be related to you by any other legal or spiritual Affinity, whereby an impediment may otherwise lie against you therein, in the common course of Law and publick Justice. And whereas your Majesty has further laid before us, that it is evident from the Chronicles of your Kingdom, that many grievous Wars have often arisen in your Kingdom, that all Christian Peace and Concord hath been violated and disturb'd by traiterous and malicious Men, out of their detestable Ambition, and wicked desire of Power, but under pretence that some of the Children, born in just and lawful Marriage of some of your Predecessors and Forefathers, were illegitimate, on account of some impediment in the said Marriages, by reason of Consanguinity or Affinity, whom under pretence of the said Illegitimacy, they have gone about to exclude from the Succession, from whence has follow'd most miserable Destruction and Bloodshed, both of Princes and Nobility, as well as of the common People; on which account your Majesty has supplicated us, that of your Apostolical Grace and Favour, we would vouchsafe herein to consult the peace and quiet of your Kingdom and Subjects, to obviate these great Miseries, and apply fitting Remedies to the aforesaid Grievances. We who favourably listen to, and as far as with a safe Conscience we may, cheerfully comply with all Petitions, especially those which concern the safety of their Souls, which we at any time receive from Christian Princes, especially from your Majesty, by reason of the manifold marks of Affection and Kindness you have always shewn both to us and the Apostolical See, over which by the Divine Permission we preside, which you have not ceas'd most courageously to maintain and support, as well with your Power and Sword, as with your Learning and Pen, from the most wicked attempts of nefarious Men, who partly by force and open Violence, partly by craft and subtle Doctrines, endeavour'd to undermine and overthrow it; for the foresaid, as well as some other reasons us thereunto moving, in compliance with your Petition, we from our Apostolical Authority, by our certain Knowledge, and out of the plenitude of our Apostolical Power, by the tenor of these Presents do dispence with you, that if your contract of Marriage with the said Catherine, shall be declar'd to have been, and still to be null and invalid, and you to be lawfully freed from the bond thereof, that then it may, and is lawful for you to marry any other Woman, and any other Woman to marry you, provided she be not thereto by you compell'd, although she should be one who has already contracted Marriage with some other Person, provided she hath not consummated it by Carnal Knowledge, and although she may be related to you in the second or more remote degree of Consanguinity, or first degree of Affinity, either from lawful or forbidden Wedlock, provided she be not the Widow of your said Brother; and although she may be related to you

1529. you by any other legal or spiritual Affinity, whereby an impediment may otherwise lie against you therein, in the common course of Law and publick Justice: And if such Marriage is contracted, that you may lawfully continue and remain therein, although it should be so, that this Marriage was contracted de facto, by you either openly or clandestinely, and by Carnal Knowledge consummated before this Dispensation was granted, determining further, that all the Children born, or to be born, from this Marriage, be, and be accounted Legitimate; any Prohibitions of the Divine Law, Constitutions or Ordinances whatsoever, declaring the contrary notwithstanding, which we do, as far as by our Apostolical Power we may, disannul and rescind so far as they may affect this special particular Matter now before us only, leaving them in all other regards, and to all other manner of purposes in their full force and power. Strictly enjoining, and in virtue of their Canonical Obedience commanding, under the threat of Divine Vengeance, and under penalty of Anathema, and other Ecclesiastical Sentences, Censures and Punishments, which we do now for that time pronounce and publish, by the tenor of these Presents, that no Person whatever shall presume or attempt to alledge, propose or object either in open Court or in private Discourse, any impediment in the Marriage which by the tenor of these Presents you shall contract, or to speak or act, or attempt any thing in Word or Deed against the Legitimacy of the said Marriage, or the Children which shall be born of it on any insinuation or pretence of Marriage præcontracted, Consanguinity in the second, and more remote Degree or Affinity as aforesaid in the first, or any other spiritual or legal Affinity in the common course of Law and publick Justice judg'd an Impediment. Let no mortal Man therefore presume to contradict this our Writ of Dispensation, Decree, Ordinance, Inhibition and Command, or with presumptuous boldness in any wise to gainsay it. And if any one shall presume herein, let him know that he shall incur the vengeance of the Eternal God, and of his Holy Apostles St. Peter and St. Paul.

While these things pass'd thus in England, the Queen found means to inform the Lady Margaret, Regent of the Low-Countries, of the whole Process, who thereupon sends word of it to Charles and Ferdinand, intreating them to assist their Aunt; which they accorded, dispatching their Orators to the Pope, whom also the Queen constituted her Proctors in the Court of Rome; giving them Commission to tender to the Pope a Copy of the Bull, Breve, and her Declaration that she was never carnally known by Prince Arthur. Shortly after which, the said Orators in the Queens Name, made a Protestation against the two Legates now in England (every page subscrib'd with Queen Catharines own hand) intreating the Pope to advoke the Cause, to annul the proceedings in England, to warn the King to desist his Suit, or at least to try it at Rome, &c.

or, otherwise that they would seek their Remedies elsewhere. The Pope being thus press'd at Rome, and having now concluded the Treaty with the Emperor at Barcellona, July the third, July 1529. about three Weeks before the Cause was prorogu'd by Campejus, could no longer, either with the safety of his Person or Dignity, favour our King; so that what excuses soever (in the frequent Dispatches he made about this time) were given to our King, yet were they little more than Complement and Evasion, till, finally, declaring himself more openly for the Emperor, he sign'd an Advocation of the Cause to himself, inhibiting further Proceedings under great Penalties. And herein (as our Agents did observe) the Popes principal Ministers did not a little concur; that the benefit of deciding thereof might fall upon them. In vain therefore did our Agents (being Sir Gregory Casalis and Doctor Benner) both by representing the defection of our King from the Roman See, and the ruine of the Cardinal of York, labour to stay these Proceedings. For the Inhibition was brought into England, about the beginning of September, the King then being in his Progress; and because it was sent to the Queen to make her benefit of it, the King (by Stephen Gardiner, now his Secretary) sends to Woolsey, to persuade the Queen to let this Inhibition (or as he calls it, a Citatory Letter) sleep, it containing matter prejudicial to his Person, and not to be publish'd to his Subjects: And that it will be sufficient for the Cessation of the Process that the Pope by Letter to Woolsey (July 19.) hath signified his Advocation of the Cause. Nevertheless, if the Queen will needs have the Inhibition executed, then that it should be privily executed upon the two Legates, (rather than be divulg'd in Flanders;) which it seems was done accordingly. Howbeit, shortly after the Advocation was granted, the Pope, conceiving that the Censures and Penalties mention'd in the Inhibition would not be well taken by our King, dispatch'd a Breve to him of August 29. which for the better satisfaction of the Reader, I have thought fit to transcribe out of the Original and insert here.

Pope desires to hear the Cause himself.

To the King of England.

Most dearly beloved Son in Christ, Health, &c. A Cause heretofore depending between your Highness and our dearly beloved Daughter in Christ, Catherine Queen of England, of and concerning your Marriage Contract;
We at the earnest request of your Ambassadors, committed the said Cause to be determin'd by our beloved Sons, Thomas Lord Bishop, and Cardinal Sanctæ Cecilie, and Laurence Cardinal Sanctæ Mariæ in Transtiberim our Legats de latere from the Apostolical See, in which Cause perhaps some Process has been made; since which at the instance of our most dear Son in Christ, Charles most Catholick King of Spain, and elected Emperor, and his most Catholick Queen, as well as for some other Reasons us thereunto moving, we order'd the said Cause to be brought before our own selves, and refer'd the Determination and Decision thereof to our selves, and the sacred College of our most venerable Brethren their Eminencies the Cardinals; on which account perhaps an Inhibition has been given. Now whereas we have heard that this Inhibition has been executed, and that therein are mention'd several Censures and Penalties; we whose intention it never was, nor is to subject your Highness's Person, who have so well deserv'd of us, and of the Apostolical See, to any Censures or Penalties whatsoever; do hereby signifie to your Highness, that those Censures were inserted into the said Inhibition by our Judge or Commissary without our Knowledge, and contrary to our Inclination: Which Censures therefore, and Penalties so far as they may concern your own Person, we do hereby rescind, declaring them to be null, of no Power, Efficacy or Validity. As for the Cause it self, we will that it be suspended till Christmas-day next ensuing, and it is by these presents till then sus-could with a safe Conscience, in favour and affection to your Highness, that as we are assur'd that you have for Conscience sake propounded your Case, you may have time duly and carefully to consider an affair of so great Moment and Importance as this is, and thereby settle it, without the vexation and trouble which Suits of Law ingender and produce, to the great comfort and quiet of your mind; wherein you shall never fail of our Aid and Assistance: In the mean time, we do exhort your Majesty in the Lord, that for the sake of Conscience, you would not leave the Queen, but till these things shall be determin'd, comfort and cherish her with the Love and Affection of an Husband, as we trust your Highness of your great Piety and Goodness will do.

in the sixth year of our Pontifi-cat.

Before yet these Breves were sent, the Pope wisely considering that by the diligence of our Agents not only the first Minutes of them were sent to England, but also that his Treaty with the Emperor was more notorious than that it could be hidden, thought fit to advertise our Cardinal, That the League betwixt him and the Emperor was made pro temporum ratione & rerum Christianarum utilitate; exhorting him therefore to do him good offices with the King, which also he explicated in another Dispatch, September 23. wishing that Aid might be sent against the Turk. All which being contrary to the King's present Designs, could not upon what terms soever be represented without much Offence, and ill conceit of Cardinal Woolsey. The King believing that underhand he held Intelligence with the Pope, to the prejudice of his Affairs. Which Polydore also affirmeth; saying, that he writ privately to the Pope to suspend the Cause, till they could bring the King to some better temper.
This also I believe was confirmed in the King's mind, by some notice he might have of a joint Dispatch (a Minute whereof is extant in our Records) from Woolsey and Campejus, during their Session, whereby they desir'd the Pope to avoke the Cause, in case it grew so doubtful that they could not determine it; both as they would be free from the Trouble and Danger, and as they conceiv'd, he might better help the King ex plenitudine potestatis; who perchance (as they said) would be content therewith, if the Pope would promise to end the matter, shortly afterwards to his satisfaction. But as this was, in part, done without our King's knowledge, and that, for the rest, it left the business in more Pexplexity and Irresolution than ever; so the King, who (I find by Cavendish) had recover'd something under the Cardinal's hand, which he urged against him, began to frown; whereof also the Courtiers took that notice, as now his Fall was voiced every where. Though yet it was not in that precipice, but that the King admitted him still to no small degrees of his wonted Access and Favour. Howbeit, as the Cardinal was now in his Decadence, all these steps did but lead unto his Ruine. To which also the secret ill Offices of the angry Queen, and despighted Anne Bolen did contribute; who, though hating one another, did conspire to his destruction. The Causes on the Queen's part are touch'd before, which also were

And for those of Mrs. Anne Bolen, besides her unkind dismissal from the Court, (which she conceiv'd to have been the Cardinal's Advice) another inveterate Grudge made her irreconcilable. The Relation whereof, being taken out of a Manuscript of one Master George Cavendish, Gentleman-Usher to the Cardinal, I have thought fit to insert.

This Gentlewoman being descended on the Father's side from one of the Heirs of the Earls of Ormond, and on the Mother's from a Daughter of the House of Norfolk, was from her Childhood of that singular Beauty and Towardness, that her Parents took all care possible for her good Education. Therefore, besides the ordinary parts of virtuous Instructions, wherewith she was liberally brought up, they gave her Teachers in playing on Musical Instruments, Singing and Dancing; in much, that when she compos'd her Hands to play, and Voice to sing, it was join'd with that Sweetness of Countenance, that three Harmonies concurr'd; likewise, when she danc'd, her rare Proportions varied themselves into all the Graces that belong either to Rest or Motion. Briefly, it seems the most attractive Perfections were eminent in her. Yet did not our King love her at first, nor before she had liv'd sometime in France, whither, in the Train of the French Queen, and company of a Sister of the Marquis Dorset, she went Anno Dom.

Court.

After the death of Louis XII. she did not yet return with the Dowager, but was receiv'd into a place of much Honour with the other Queen, and then with the Dutchess of Milan, Sister to Francis, where she staid, till some difference grew betwixt our King and Francis; therefore, as saith du Tillet, and our Records, about the time when our Students at Paris were remanded, she likewise left France, as is formerly related; her Parents thinking not fit to suffer her to stay there any longer. All this while therefore no argument of extraordinary Affection towards her was discover'd in our King. So that though it be probable, that she were at the Interview betwixt the Kings and Queens (near Guines) above-mention'd, yet she left not the French Court. But, at last, being come hither, and, about the twentieth Year of her age, receiv'd into our Queen's Service, however the King might take notice of her, the Lord Henry Percy yet (the Earl of Northumberland's eldest Son) appear'd first enamour'd of her; insomuch, that at all times when he repair'd to Court, in the Train of our Cardinal, (whom he attended in ordinary) his Addresses were continually to her; whereof he made that use, as at length he obtain'd her good will to Marriage. So that in what kind soever the King's Affection might manifest it self, neither was she so satisfied of it, as to think fit to relinquish this advantageous Offer, nor the Lord Percy aware that he was oppos'd by so puissant a Rival. But this Treaty (which proceeded to little less than a Contract) coming at last to our King's Ears, the danger he found himself in of losing a Beauty he had contemplated so long, that it was become his dearest Object, made him resolve to acquaint the Cardinal with his Love to her; wishing him also to dissuade the Lord Percy from it. The forward Cardinal hereupon both violently dehorts the Lord Percy from the Gentlewoman, and useth all Arts to insinuate himself into her good Opinion and Favour. But

Mistress Bolen, whether she were ignorant, as yet, how much the King lov'd her, or howsoever had rather be that Lord's Wife than a King's Mistress, took very ill of the Cardinal this his unseasonable interruption of her Marriage. The Cardinal also fearing the Revenges of that Sex, and, for the rest, being unwilling to come to sharper terms with the Lord Percy than he had already us'd, desires the King to write to the Earl of Northumberland to come up; alledging there was no such way to preserve the Gentlewoman for himself, and together to conceal his Love, as to use a cunning dissuasion of the Marriage to the Earl; whereby also he might be induced to interpose his fatherly Authority for dissolving of the Match. Hereupon the Earl repairing to Court, the Cardinal first, and afterwards the King discover'd the Cause of his sending for, in very kind, but withal in such covert and ambiguous terms, that betwixt unwillingness to disparage the Gentlewoman, and the enforcing divers Reasons why the Lord Percy should not marry her, the Earl was not without some hazard of misapplying the King's Affection to himself. Howsoever, he so check'd his Son, that fear of displeasing his Father became at length the predominant Passion. So that it neither serv'd him to declare the Merits of the Gentlewoman, nor to tell his Father, that his Promise, before Witness, had engag'd him further than that he knew well how to come off: The apprehension of the King's Displeasure having wrought that impression in the Earl, that he would take no Denial or Excuse on his Son's part, till he had made him renounce all his Pretences to her; which also he urg'd so far, as at length his Son consented to marry the Earl of Shrewsbury's Daughter. But the Hatred which Mistress Anne Bolen conceiv'd against the Cardinal concluded not so; nor indeed could ever end till she had procur'd his final Ruine. And this is the truest relation of Mistress Anne Bolen, that I have been able to gather out of those Records and Manuscripts that have come to my hands. So that now I should have proceeded with my History, were I not constrain'd (in a sort) to vindicate both her Honour and her Progenitors from those foul Calumnies which in a Book of Nicolas Sanders, an Englishman, de Schismate Anglicano, are cast upon them.

This Author, though learned, yet more credulous than becomes a Man of exact Judgment, reports out of one William Rastal, a Judge, (in his Life of Sir Thomas More) that Mistress Anne Bolen was the King's Daughter, by the Wife of Sir Thomas Bolen, while, sub specie honoris, he was employ'd by the King, Ambassador in France; and that this Gentlewoman coming to the Age of fifteen, was deflower'd by some Domesticks of her Fathers, and then sent to France; where also she behav'd her self so licenciously, that she was vulgarly call'd the Hackney of England, till being adopted to that King's Familiarity, she was termed his Mule. Many other Passages of this kind are also insert'd by Sanders, which I forbear, as being sorry to have occasion for publishing thus much. But how impossible these things are, the ingenious Reader may easily find out, when he compares the times: For if Mistress Anne Bolen went to France with Mary the French Queen, 1514. (as is proved by divers principal Authors, both English and French, besides the Manuscripts I have seen) and was here vitiated at fifteen Years of Age, it must follow that she was born about or before 1498. at which time our King was neither above seven or eight Years old at most, and therefore unable to get a Child (especially nine Months before) nor had that Regal Power in his hands for employment of Ambassadors, till ten or eleven Years afterwards. So that Mr. Sanders or Rastal's Affirmation herein is but fiction, as the rest certainly is, she having always lived in good Reputation. As for the Beauty and Hand-

And for her Religion, there is no probability that it should (at first) be other than what was commonly profest: Since it appears by original Letters of hers, that she was a special Favourer of the Clergy of that time, and a Preferrer of the worthiest sort of them to Ecclesiastical Livings, during her chief times of Favour with the King, though I will not deny, but upon his defection from some Articles of the Roman Church, she might also comply. But I should be glad that Mr. Sanders had not divers other things which might require a serious Review; though I must not deny, but as he hath in some things follow'd Cardinal Pool, (a Person of great Learning, and much reverenc'd in his time) so he hath his Authority. Howbeit as this Cardinal was so near in blood to divers whom the King put to death, he may be thought perchance more partial than to be believ'd every where: Neither will it satisfy all Men, that he pretends (in more than one place) to have known even so much as the King's Thoughts (by Revelation;) so that I shall leave these things to the liberty of the indifferent Reader, and turn to my History.

Eccles.

Our King, who at the first prorogation of the Sentence, by reason of the Feria Vindemiarum, hoped yet, that at least, Octob. 1. (when the Court was appointed to sit again, he might have the Cause determin'd, seeing now all proceeding in England inhibited, the Cause avocated to Rome, Campejus recall'd; and finally finding, by many Dispatches, that the Pope and Emperor had appointed shortly to meet at Bononia, was much troubled; and the rather, for that the two Cardinals proceeding hitherunto had been little more than Illusion; whereupon also he became much incens'd against them. Yet containing a while his Anger, he neither alter'd his fashion to Woolsey, nor declar'd any dislike of Campejus: Inasmuch, that he calmly gave him leave to depart. So that no Argument of Suspicion or Dislike appear'd hitherunto on either side. Campejus thus dismiss'd and rewarded, was conducted honourably to the Seaside, where he expected only a fair Wind. But when he came to take Ship, the Searchers, upon pretence he carry'd either Money or Letters from England to Rome, ransack'd all his Coffers, Bags and Papers; not without hope, certainly, to recover that Decretal Bull our King so much long'd for. I find also (by some relation) that divers Love-Letters betwixt our King and Miftress Bolen, being convey'd out of the King's Cabiner, were sought for, though in vain, they having been formerly sent to Rome. Which Usage so offended Campejus, that he complain'd immediately to our King; protesting he wou'd not proceed in his Journey till he had reparation for the Wrongs done to his Person and Dignity; and that the People were satisfy'd concerning certain scandalous Rumours, which he heard were scatter'd abroad to the prejudice of Cardinal Woolsey and himself. But our King by his Letter of October 22. answer'd, That it must not be expected from him, præstare, quicquid vel vulgi temeritas effutire, vel quorundam nimium fortasse scrupulosa & anxia sedulitas designare soleat. As for the Jus Legati pretended to be violated, our King answer'd, That he conceiv'd it was expir'd, not only as it was revok'd by the Pope's late Inhibition, but particularly by the interposition of his own Regal Authority, which alone his Subjects did acknowledge. Adding moreover, That he wonder'd somewhat that Campejus understood our Law so little, as not to fear how he usurped after that time the Name of a Legat in this Kingdom; since he, having been made Bishop here of Salisbury, was bound by Oath to the Conservation of the Royal Prerogative. As for the Searchers doings, it was a Mistake; the Commandment having been given long since, when there was just occasion for it, and not in relation to his particular, who therefore he was sorry to have been so roughly us'd; desiring the Cardinal, for the rest, to excuse the said Searchers, since they are bound thereto by Oath. So that he ought not to pretend this as a cause of his stay. As for the other part, which was the Rumour, our King said, It was uncertain from whence it came; notwithstanding that it was (though not altogether fixed in his breast, yet) so generally receiv'd and believ'd in his Kingdom, that it would be hard to remove that Opinion: In which regard also, it was in vain for him to stay here so much as one hour. Howsoever, that he might make this use of it, as to know how ill his Subjects took this frustration of the Business. But as his Royal Care should be to prevent the Inconveniences might follow hereof, so that it belong'd to Campejus's Wisdom to continue those good Intentions he had made shew of. For we (saith the King) tunc demum dubitare poterimus, cum ipse faciliis palam diversum ostenderit.

Campejus being now more than once licens'd, thought it time to be gone; so that, coming at last to the Pope, he acquainted him with all the Proceedings, not forgetting the Dangers in which Cardinal Woolsey was, for his too much Obsequiousness to that See. But the Pope, whether now altogether govern'd by the Emperor, or that otherwise he secretly hated the Cardinal for his late unseasonable Ambition to succeed in the Papacy, seem'd to care for nothing so much as the conserving of his late League, though yet he was not so secure of our King, but that he feared not a little his often threaten'd Defection. So that he omitted nothing (that might stand with his other Interests) for the containing of him in his wonted Devotion: Inasmuch that he offer'd new Projects daily for his Satisfaction. Among which Gregory Casali relates one, which shall be set down in his place.

the Pope.

Cardinal Woolsey being now divested of his late Power (wherein he had the Glory, in some sort, to have been superior to his King) and for the rest being left alone, and expos'd not only to a general Hatred, but to the private Machinations of the present and future Queen, became sensible of his ill estate; though yet he did not believe himself so near his Overthrow, as it appear'd afterwards. But what cou'd he hope for, when such puissant Enemies did procure his Destruction? Therefore, though he receiv'd some Advices from Rome, which might argue a Care rather than a Power for his Conservation, yet in effect what secret Intelligence soever pass'd betwixt the Pope and him, came to the Emperor first, and after to Queen Katherine, who cunningly caus'd it to be whisper'd into the King's Ears, by some more indirect ways, than it could possibly be imagin'd to proceed from her. Likewise Miftress Anne Bolen, having learn'd from some of the King's wisest and gravest Counsellors divers Malversations of the Cardinal, was so far from disguising them, that she even misinterpreted his better Actions. Edmund Campion adds to these Reasons, that Sir Francis Bryan being in Rome, did by the means of a Familiar of one who kept the Pope's Papers, obtain a Letter of the Cardinals, which wrought his Ruine, in this manner: Having first shew'd her the Cardinal's Hand-writing, and then corrupted her, this Courtezan so dexterously perform'd the rest, as upon pretence of visiting her Servant in his Study, 1529. dy, the convey'd away this Letter, and gave it Bryan, who fail'd not immediately to send it to our King. Which relation of Campion, though I will not contradict, yet I suppose to be the more improbable, that I find by Original Dispatches, Bryan was come from Rome before any Argument of the King's Disfavour to the Cardinal appear'd. Howsoever, the way the King took to overthrow him was meerly legal, though approaching to Summum Jus, after most Men's Opinion. In the carriage whereof yet that Secrecy was us'd, that the Cardinal did not, or perchance out of Greatness of Mind would not take notice of what was intended against him. So that though the Bill or Indictment was put in (at the beginning of Michaelmas Term) yet did he ride that Day to the Chancery with his accustomed Pomp. Of which our King being advertis'd, thought fit to forbid him the place; as thinking it undecent, that a Man, who was upon terms of Conviction, should administer that high Charge. Therefore the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk were sent, the eighteenth of October, to require the Great Seal of him. But the Cardinal, instead of rendring it, disputed their Authority, alledging the Place of Lord Chancellor was by the King's Letters Patents given him during life. The two Dukes hereupon returned to Court, bringing the next day the King's Letters to the Cardinal, who having read them, deliver'd immediately the great Seal; in sequence thereof, also submitting himself to the King, who commanded him to leave York-Place, and simply to depart to Asher, a Country-House near Hampton-Court, belonging to the Bishop of Winchester. He charged his Officers also to inventory and bring forth his Goods. Whereupon much brave Furniture made into Hangings, besides whole Pieces of rich Stuffs were set upon divers Tables in his House; the variety and number whereof may be imagin'd, when (as Cavendish hath it) of fine Holland Cloth alone there were a thousand Pieces. Besides, the Walls of his Gallery on the one side were hang'd with rich Suits of Cloth of Gold, Cloth of Silver, Cloth of Tissue, and Cloth of Bodkin; on the other side was placed the most glorious Suit of Copes that had been seen in England. In a Chamber near to the Gallery was a great Cupboard of Plate, of massy Gold; and in a Chamber adjoining, vast quantity of other Plate. All which the Cardinal commanded Sir William Gascoigne (his Treasurer) to deliver to the King, when he was requir'd.

In the mean while the Bill against the Cardinal proceeded, the most substantial parts whereof being extracted out of the Original Record, I have thought fit to present to the Reader. The ground upon which Christopher Hales, the King's Attorney, prosecuted the Cardinal, was a Statute of 16 Richard II. in which is enacted, That, whereas the Commons of the Realm ought of right, and were wont of old time to sue in the King's Court to recover their Presentments to Churches, Prebends, and other Benefices of Holy Church, to which they had right to present, and when Judgment shall be given in the said Court upon such a Plea and Presentment, the Archbishops, Bishops, and other Spiritual Persons, which have Institutions of such Benefices within their Jurisdictions, be bound, and have made Execution of such Judgments by the King's Commandments, of all the time aforesaid, without interruption, and also be bound of right to make Execution of many other the King's Commandments: Of which Right the Crown of England hath been peaceably seized, as well now, as in the time of all his Progenitors. And whereas the Bishop of Rome (for so he is termed in the Act) had made divers Processes and Censures of Excommunication upon certain Bishops in England, because they have made

Execution of such Commandments, and also because he hath ordain'd and purpos'd to translate some Prelates of the Realm, some out of the Realm, and some from one Bishoprick to another within the said Realm, without the King's Assent and Knowledge, and without the Assent of the Prelates, which so shall be translated; which Prelates be much profitable and necessary to our Lord the King, and to all his Realm; which Translations if they should be suffered, the Statutes of the Realm should be defeated and made void, and his said Liege Sages of his Council, without his Assent, and against his Will, carried away and gotten out of his Realm, and the Substance and Treasure of the Realm shall be carried away, and so the Realm destitute as well of Counsel as of Substance, to the final Destruction of the same Realm; and so the Crown of England, which hath been so free at all times, that it hath been in no earthly Subjection, but immediately subject to God in all things touching the Legality of the same Crown, and to none other, should be submitted to the Pope; and the Laws and Statutes of the said Realm, by him defeated and avoided at his will, in perpetual destruction of the Sovereignty of the King our Lord, his Crown, his Regality, and of all his Realm, &c. Therefore the King, by the Assent of his Lords, and at the Request of the Commons, hath ordain'd and establish'd, that, if any purchase or pursue, or cause to be purchased or pursu'd in the Court of Rome, or elsewhere, any Translations, Processes, and Sentences of Excommunication, Bulls, Instruments, or any other things whatsoever, which touch the King, against him, his Crown, and Regality or Realm, and they which bring within the Realm, or them receive, or make thereof Notification, or any other Execution whatsoever within the same Realm or without; that they, their Notaries, Procurators, Maintainers, Abettors, Factors and Counsellors, shall be put out of the King's Protection, and their Lands and Tenements, Goods and Chattels, forfeit to the King, and that they be attach'd by their Bodies if they may be found, and brought before the King and his Council, there to answer to the Cases aforesaid, or that Process be made against them by a Writ of Præmunire facias, in manner as it is ordain'd in other Statutes of Provisors, and other, which do sue in any other Court, in derogation of the Regality of our Lord the King.

Upon which Statute it was alledg'd, That Thomas, Legatus de Latere, Cardinal, Archbishop of York, and Primate of England, being not ignorant of the Premises, had obtain'd certain Bulls from Clement VII. by which he exercised Jurisdiction and Authority Legatine, to the deprivation of the King's Power established in his Courts of Justice; which said Bulls he caused to be publicly read in Westminster, (Aug. 28. Anno Reg. 15.) assuming to himself thereupon the Dignity and Jurisdiction of Legatus de Latere, which he hath exercis'd from the said twenty eighth of August to this day, to the prejudice of the Right of both Secular and Ecclesiastical Persons, and that by colour thereof, he had given away the Church of Stoke-Guilford in the County of Surrey (being of right in the Donation of the Prior of St. Pancrace) to one James Gorton, who also enjoy'd it accordingly. All which was to the contempt of the King and his Crown, and contrary to the aforesaid Statutes of 16 Richard II. Moreover that, by colour of the said Authority, he had caused the last Wills and Testaments of many (out of his Diocess) to be exhibited and proved in his Court, and their Goods and Chattels to be administr'd by such as he appointed. Also that, under colour of the said Authority, he had made divers Visitations out of his Diocess, and drawn divers Pensions from Abbeyes, to the contempt of the King and his Laws.

The proof of which Particulars, though evident and notorious, were not yet urged to his Conviction, till, through the King's special permission (by Writ of October 28.) John Scuse and Christopher Genney appear'd in Court as his Attorneys; where, for all other Answers, they protested tested in the said Cardinal's Name, that the said Cardinal did not know the impetration of the said Bulls to have been to the Contempt and Prejudice of the King, or that it was against any Statute of Provisors heretofore made. As for the Particulars wherewith he was charged by Master Attorney, he confest them all true in the manner and form alledg'd: And so submitted himself to the King. Whereupon the Court gave Sentence, that he was out of the King's Protection, and his Lands, Goods, and Chattels forfeit, and that his Person might be seized on.

Not contented herewith yet, another Proof of the same kind was by the King's Attorney produced against the Cardinal, namely, that contrary to the right of the true Patron (being the Master and Fellows of the Hospital of St. Lazarus in Burton-Lazar) he had, by the same Authority, given away the Parish-Church of Galby in Leicestershire, and Diocess of Lincoln (then vacant by the death of one Woodroff) to one John Allen, Doctor of both Laws, and plac'd him in it.

And thus fell the Cardinal, together with all his vast Possessions, into the King's hands. Concerning which the Criticks of the time gave sundry Opinions, the most part yet supposing him capable of the King's Mercy, had he been either less rich, or more humble. They thought him indeed condemn'd by Law, but by the Rigor of it. All which they considered the more, that the Cardinal had so long exercis'd his Legatine Power, without that the King either seem'd to dislike it, or any other had question'd him for it. Therefore, howsoever he was convicted by form of Justice, they yet clear'd him in great part, and not they only, but the King. Infomuch, that the Impression taken of his ancient Services, was not defac'd wholly. So that notwithstanding his best Goods were seiz'd on, and that the King might have taken therewith his other Possessions, and (with them) his intire liberty, yet he both sent him a Protection, and left him the Bishopricks of York and Winchester, which he had lately given him after the death of Richard Fox, only he confin'd him for the present to his House at Asher, till his farther Pleasure was signify'd. Being upon his way, the King (touch'd with some compassion) sent him by one Master Norreys, not only a gracious Message, but a Ring, which was a Token betwixt them, when any special business was recommended. Upon receiving whereof, the over-joy'd Cardinal alighted from his Mule, and in the Dirt upon his bare Knees acknowledg'd the Comfort he receiv'd. To shew his Thankfulness also to Master Norreys, he presented him with a Chain of Gold, at which a piece of the Cross did hang. But it troubled him much that he had nothing to send to the King; till at last having espy'd in his Train a facetious Natural, in whom he took much delight, he desir'd Master Norreys to present him to the King. Which Promotion yet this Fellow (for the approving himself no Counterfeit) did so slight, as the Cardinal was forc'd to send six of his tallest Yeomen to bring him to Court. The Cardinal coming at last to Asher, found himself so destitute of all Necessaries, as, till one Master Arundel first, and after the Bishop of Carlisle provided him, he wanted even the most ordinary parts of Household-stuff. And thus the ill-accommodated Cardinal passed some Weeks in expectation of the King's further pleasure, not neglecting, in the mean while, to use those Friends he had left in Court, for the reintegrating him into his former Favour; or when that could not be done, for the making his Fall more easy. For which purpose one Master Thomas Cromwel, his Servant, (who came afterwards to great Preferment) was employ'd, but Mistress Boleyn secretly oppos'd all. So that the Cardinal, being now in a manner hopeless of regaining the King's good Opinion, dismissed (not without Tears on both sides) the greatest part of his numerous Family, without other reward than what Master Cromwel and some of his Chaplains did freely contribute. The King hearing the Cardinal to be somewhat humbled, sent Sir John Russel with a Turquoise Ring to him as a Token of his Care and Affection. But it was not Gifts that the Cardinal expected from the King, but Liberty and Restitution to his former Greatness; which yet was so much in vain, as his Offences were daily exaggerated. For as the King did not think it enough that he had particularly advantag'd himself of the Cardinal's Punishment, unless he made some use thereof to the general, so he call'd a Council of the Nobles, to sit in the Star-Chamber, who having sufficiently condemn'd him, he afterwards permitted him to the Parliament, which began November 3. 1529. Wherein the King also did wisely, since by interressing the Publick in his Condemnation, he both declin'd the Censure of those who thought the late Proceedings to have been of the severest, and indear'd his People by putting the Power of punishing him into their hands. Therefore they took it as an intire Satisfaction for all they had hitherto suffer'd; and by applauding of the King, made him know how thankfully they took this Favour. And thus did the King return to that former good Opinion he had of his Subjects.

Hereupon certain Articles against the Cardinal were prefer'd in Parliament. The Original whereof, found among our Records, I have thought fit to transcribe; and the rather for that our vulgar Chronicles misreport them.

Articles against him in
ment.

Constrain'd by necessity of our Fidelity and Conscience, complain and shew to your Royal Majesty, We your Graces humble, true, faithful, and obedient Subjects, That the Lord Cardinal of York, lately your Graces Chancellor, presuming to take upon him the Authority of the Popes Legat de Latere, hath by divers and many fundry ways and fashions committed notable, high, and grievous Offences, misusing, altering, and subverting the Order of your Graces Laws, and otherwise contrary to your high Honour, Prerogative, Crown, Estate, and Dignity Royal, to the inestimable damage of your Graces Subjects of every degree, and consequently to the great hindrance, diminution, and decay of the universal Wealth of this your Graces Realm, as is it touched summarily and particularly in certain Articles here following; which be but a few in comparison of all his Enormities, Excesses, and Transgressions committed against your Graces Laws.

That is to say,

First, where your Grace, and your Noble Progenitors within this your Realm of England, being Kings of England, have been so free, that they have had in all the World no other Sovereign, but immediate subject to Almighty God, in all things, touching the Regality of your Crown of England, and the same Preheminence, Prerogative, Jurisdiction, lawful and peaceable Possession, your Grace, and your noble Progenitors have had, used, and enjoyed without interruption, or business therefore, by the space of two hundred Years and more; whereby your Grace may prescribe against the Popes Holiness, that he should not, nor ought to send, or make any Legat to execute 1529. cure any Authority Legatine, contrary to your Graces Prerogative within this your Realm:

Now the Lord Cardinal of York being your Subject, and natural liege born, hath of his high, orgullous, and insatiable Mind, for his own singular Advancement and Profit, in derogation, and to the great imblemishment and hurt of your said Royal Jurisdiction, and Prerogative, and the large continuance of the possession of the same, obtain'd Authority Legatine, by reason whereof he hath not only hurt your said Prescription, but also by the said Authority Legatine hath spoil'd and taken away from many Houses of Religion in this your Realm, much Substance of their Goods; and also hath usurped upon all your Ordinaries within this your Realm much part of their Jurisdiction, in derogation of your Prerogative, and to the great hurt of your said Ordinaries, Prelates, and Religious.

II. Also, the said Lord Cardinal, being your Ambassador in France, made a Treaty with the French King for the Pope, your Majesty not knowing any part thereof, nor nam'd in the same; and binding the said French King to abide his Order and Award, if any Controversy or Doubt should arise upon the same betwixt the said Pope and the French King.

III. Also, the said Lord Cardinal being your Ambassador in France, sent a Commission to Sir Gregory de Casalis, under your Great Seal, in your Graces Name, to conclude a Treaty of Amity with the Duke of Ferrara, without any Command or Warrant of your Highness, nor your said Highness advis'd or made privy to the same.

IV. Also, the said Lord Cardinal, of his presumptuous Mind in divers and many of his Letters and Instructions sent out of this Realm to outward Parties, had join'd himself with your Grace, as in saying and writing in his said Letters and Instructions; The King and I. And, I would ye should do thus. The King and I give unto you our hearty Thanks. Whereby it is apparent that he used himself more like a Fellow to your Highness, than like a Subject.

V. Also, where it hath ever been accustom'd within this your Realm, that when Noblemen do swear their Household Servants, the first part of their Oath hath been, That they should be true Liegemen to the King and his Heirs Kings of England; the same Lord Cardinal caused his Servants to be only sworn to him, as if there had been no Sovereign above him.

VI. And also, whereas your Grace is our Sovereign Lord and Head, in whom standeth all the Surety and Wealth of this Realm, the same Lord Cardinal knowing himself to have the foul and contagious Disease of the great Pox, broken out upon him in divers places of his Body, came daily to your Grace, rowning in your Ear, and blowing upon your most Noble Grace with his perillous and infective Breath, to the marvelous danger of your Highness, if God of his infinite Goodness had not better provided for your Highness. And when he was once healed of them, he made your Grace to believe that his Disease was an Impostume in his Head, and of none other thing.

VII. Also, the said Lord Cardinal, by his Authority Legatine, hath given, by prevention, the Benefices of divers Persons, as well Spiritual as Temporal, contrary to your Crown and Dignity, and your Laws and Estatutes therefore provided; by reason whereof he is in danger to your Grace of Forfeiture of his Lands and Goods, and his Body at your pleasure.

VIII. Also, the said Lord Cardinal, taking upon him otherwise than a true Counsellor ought to do, hath used to have all Ambassadors to come first to him alone, and so hearing their Charges and Intents, it is to be thought he hath instructed them after his pleasure and purpose, before that they came to your Presence; contrary to your high Commandment by your Graces mouth to him given, and also to other Persons sent to him by your Grace.

IX. Also, the said Lord Cardinal hath practised so, that all manner of Letters sent from beyond the Sea to your Highness have come first to his hands, contrary to your high Commandment by your own mouth, and also by others sent to him by your Grace; by reason whereof your Highness, nor any of your Council, had knowledge of no matters, but such as it pleas'd him to shew them; whereby your Highness, and your Council have been compell'd of very force to follow his Devices, which oftentimes were set forth by him under such crafty and covert means, that your Highness and your Council hath oftentimes been abus'd. Infomuch, that when your Council have found, and put divers Doubts, and things which have afterwards ensu'd, he to abuse them us'd these Words; I will lay my Head that no such thing shall happen.

X. Also, the said Lord Cardinal hath practised that no manner of person, having charge to make espial of things done beyond the Sea, should at their return come first to your Grace, nor to any other of your Council, but only to himself, and in case they did the contrary, he punished them for so doing.

XI. Also, the said Lord Cardinal hath granted License under your great Seal for carrying out of Grain and other Victual, after the Restraint hath been made thereof, for his own lucre, and singular advantage of him and his Servants, for to send thither as he bare secret Favour, without your Graces Warrant or Knowledge thereof.

XII. Also, the said Lord Cardinal used, many Years together, not only to write unto all your Ambassadors resident with other Princes in his own Name all Advertisements concerning your Graces Affairs, being in their Charge; and in the same his Letters wrote many things of his own mind, without your Graces Pleasure being known, concealing divers things which had been necessary for them to know: But also caused them to write their Advertisements unto him; and of the same Letters he used to conceal for the compassing of his purposes, many things both from all your other Counsellors, and from your self also.

XIII. Also, where good Hospitality hath been used to be kept in Houses and Places of Religion of this Realm, and many poor People thereby relieved, the said Hospitality and Relief is now decay'd, and not us'd; and it is commonly reported that the occasion thereof is, because the said Lord Cardinal hath taken such Impositions of the Rulers of the said Houses, as well for his favour in making of Abbots and Priors, as for his Visitation, by his Authority Legatine: And yet, nevertheless, taketh yearly of such Religious Houses, such yearly and continual Charges, as they be not able to keep Hospitality as they us'd to do; which is a great Cause that there be so many Vagabonds, Beggars and Thieves.

XIV. Also, where the said Lord Cardinal said, before the suppression of such Houses as he hath suppress'd, that the Possessions of them should be set to farm among your Lay-Subjects, after such reasonable yearly Rent, as they should well thereupon live, and keep good Hospitality; and now the demain Possessions of the said Houses, since the suppression of them, hath been survey'd, mete, and measur'd by the Acre, and be now set 1529. set above the value of the old Rent; and also such as were Farmers by Covent-Seal, and Copy-holders be put out, and mov'd of their Farms, or else compell'd to pay new Fines, contrary to all Equity and Conscience.

XV. Also, the said Lord Cardinal, sitting among the Lords, and other of your most Honourable Council, us'd himself that if any Man would shew his mind according to his Duty, contrary to the opinion of the said Cardinal, he would so take him up with his accustomed Words, that they were better to hold their peace than to speak, so that he would hear no Man speak, but one or two great Personages, so that he would have all the words himself, and consume much time with a fair tale.

XVI. Also, the said Lord Cardinal by his Ambition and Pride, hath hindred and undone many of your poor Subjects for want of Dispatchment of matters; for he would no Man should meddle but himself. Insomuch, that it hath been affirm'd by many wise Men, that ten of the most wise, and most expert Men in England, were not sufficient in convenient time to order the matters that he would retain to himself: And many times he deferr'd the ending of Matters, because that Sutors should attend and wait upon him, whereof he had no small pleasure that his House might be replenish'd with Sutors.

XVII. Also, the said Lord Cardinal, by his Authority Legatine, hath us'd, if any Spiritual Man having any Riches or Subtance, deceas'd, he hath taken their Goods as his own; by reason whereof their Wills be not perform'd: And one mean he had, to put them in fear that were made Executors, to refuse to meddle.

XVIII. Also, the said Lord Cardinal constrain'd all Ordinaries in England yearly to compound with him, or else he will usurp half or the whole of their Jurisdiction by prevention, not for good order of the Diocess, but to extort Treasure; for there is never a poor Arch-Deacon in England, but that he paid yearly to him a Portion of his Living.

XIX. Also, the said Lord Cardinal hath not only by his untrue suggestion to the Pope, shamefully slandered many good Religious Houses, and good virtuous Men dwelling in them, but also suppress'd by reason thereof above thirty Houses of Religion; and where, by Authority of his Bull, he should not suppress any House that had more Men of Religion in number, above the number of six or seven, he hath suppress'd divers Houses that had above the number; and thereupon hath caus'd divers Offices to be found by Verdict, untruly, that the Religious Persons, so suppress'd, had voluntarily forsaken their said Houses, which was untrue, and so hath caus'd open Perjury to be committed, to the high Displeasure of Almighty God.

XX. Also, the said Lord Cardinal hath examin'd divers and many matters in the Chancery, after Judgment thereof given at the Common Law, in subversion of your Laws; and made some Persons restore again to the other Party condemn'd, that they had in execution by virtue of the Judgment in the Common Law.

XXI. Also, the said Lord Cardinal hath granted many Injunctions by Writ, and the Parties never call'd thereunto, nor Bill put in against them. And, by reason thereof, divers of your Subjects have been put from their lawful Possession of their Lands and Tenements. And, by such means, he hath brought the more Party of the Sutors of this your Realm before himself, whereby he and divers of his Servants have gotten much Riches, and your Subjects suffer'd great Wrongs.

XXII. Also, the said Lord Cardinal, to augment his great Riches, hath caus'd divers Pardons granted by the Pope to be suspended, which could not be reviv'd till that the said Lord Cardinal were rewarded, and also have a yearly Pension of the said Pardon.

XXIII. Also, the said Lord Cardinal, not regarding your Laws nor Justice, of his extort Power, hath put out divers and many Farmers of his Lands, and also Patents of the Archbishoprick of York, and Bishoprick of Winchester, and of the Abby of St. Albans, which had good and sufficient grant thereof by your Laws.

XXIV. Also, the same Lord Cardinal at many times when any Houses of Religion have been void, he hath sent his Officers thither, and with crafty Persuasions hath induc'd them to compromit their Election in him. And that, before ere he nam'd or confirm'd any of them, he and his Servants receiv'd so much great Goods of them, that in manner it hath been to the undoing of the House.

XXV. Also, by his Authority Legatine, the same Lord Cardinal hath visited the most part of the Religious Houses and Colleges in this your Realm, hath taken of them the twenty-fifth part of their Livelihood, to the great extortion of your Subjects, and derogation of your Laws and Prerogative; and no Law to bear him so to do.

XXVI. Also, when Matters have been near at Judgment by Process at your Common Law, the same Lord Cardinal hath not only given and sent Injunctions to the Parties, but also sent for your Judges, and expressly by threats commanding them to defer the Judgment, to the evident subversion of your Laws; if the Judges would so have ceas'd.

XXVII. Also, whereas neither the Bishoprick of York, nor Winchester, nor the Abby of St. Albans, nor the profit of his Legation, nor the benefit of the Chancery, nor his great Pension out of France, nor his Wards, and other inordinate taking could not suffice him, he hath made his Son Winter to spend twenty-seven hundred pounds by the year, which he taketh to his own use, and giveth him not past two hundred pounds yearly to live upon.

XXVIII. Also, where the said Lord Cardinal did first sue unto your Grace to have your Assent to be Legate de Latere, he promis'd and solemnly protested before your Majesty, and before the Lords both Spiritual and Temporal, that he would nothing do or attempt by virtue of his Legacy, that should be contrary to your gracious Prerogative or Regality, or to the Damage or Prejudice of the Jurisdiction of any Ordinary, and that by his Legacy no Man should be hurt or offended; and upon that Condition, and no other, he was admitted by your Grace to be Legate within this your Realm, which Condition he hath broken, as is well known to all your Subjects. And when that he made this Promise, he was busie in his Suit at Rome, to visit all the Clergy of England, both exempt and not exempt.

XXIX. Also, upon the Suit of the said Lord Cardinal at Rome, to have his Authority Legatine, he made untrue surmise to the Popes Holiness against the Clergy of your Realm, which was, that the Regular Persons of the said Clergy had given themselves in reprobum sensum; which words Saint Paul writing to the Romans apply'd to abominable Sin; which Slander to your Church of England, shall for ever remain in the Register at Rome against the Clergy of this your Realm.

XXX. Also, the said Lord Cardinal had the more part of the Goods of Dr. Smith, late Bishop of London, Bishop Savage of York, Mr. Dalby Archdeacon of Richmond, Mr. Tornyars, Dr. Rothal late Bishop of Durham, and of Dr. Fox late Bishop of Winchester, contrary to their Wills and your Laws and Justice.

XXXI. Also, at the Oyer and Terminer at York, Proclamation was made, that every Man should put in their Bills for extortion of Ordinaries, and when divers Bills were put in against the Officers of the said Lord Cardinal of Extortion, for taking twelve pence of the pound for Probation of Testaments, whereof divers Bills were found before Justice Fitz-Herbert, and other Commissioners, the same Lord Cardinal remov'd the same Indictments into the Chancery by Certiorari, and rebuked the same Fitz-Herbert for the same Cause.

XXXII. Also, the said Lord Cardinal hath busied and endeavour'd himself by crafty and untrue tales to make Dissention and Debate amongst your Nobles of your Realm, which is ready to be prov'd.

XXXIII. Also, the said Lord Cardinal's Officers have divers times compell'd your Subjects to serve him with Carts for Carriages. And also his Servants have taken both Corn and Cattel, Fish, and all other Victuals at your Graces price or under, as though it had been for your Grace, which is contrary to the Laws.

XXXIV. Also, the said Lord Cardinal hath misus'd himself in your most Honourable Court, in keeping of as great Estate there in your Absence, as your Grace would have done, if you had been there present in your own Person.

XXXV. Also, his Servants, by virtue of your Commission under your broad Seal by him to them given, hath taken Cattel, and all other Victual, at as low price as your Purveyors have done for your Grace by your Prerogative, against the Laws of your Realm, XXXVI. Also, where it hath been accustomed that your Purveyors for your Honourable Household have had yearly out of your Town and Liberty of St. Albans three hundred or four hundred Quarters of Wheat, truth it is, that since the Lord Cardinal had the room of Abbot there, your said Purveyors could not be suffer'd by him and his Officers, to take any Wheat within the said Town or Liberties.

XXXVII. Also he hath divers times given Injunction to your Servants, that have been for causes before him in the Star-Chamber, that they nor other for them should make labour, by any manner of way directly or indirectly, to your Grace, to obtain your gracious Favour or Pardon, which was a presumptuous intent for any Subject.

XXXVIII. Also, the said Lord Cardinal did call before him Sir John Stanley Knight, which had taken a Farm by Covent-Seal of the Abbot and Covent of Chester, and afterwards by his Power and Might, contrary to Right, committed the said Sir John Stanley to the Prison of Fleet by the space of one year, until such time as he compell'd the said Sir John to release his Covent-Seal to one Legbe of Adlington, which marry'd one Lark's Daughter, which Woman the said Lord Cardinal kept, and had with her two Children. Whereupon the said Sir John Stanley, upon displeasure taken in his heart, made himself Monk in Westminster, and there died.

XXXIX. Also, on a time your Grace being at St. Albans, according to the ancient custom us'd within your Verge, your Clerk of the Market doing his Office, did present unto your Officers of your most Honourable Household the Prices of all manner of Victuals, within the Predict of the Verge; and it was commanded by your said Officers to set up the said Prices both on the Gates of your Honourable Household, and also in the Market-place within the Town of St. Albans, as of ancient Custom it hath been us'd; and the Lord Cardinal, hearing the same, presumptuously, and not like a Subject, caus'd the aforesaid Prices which were seal'd with your Graces Seal, accustomedly us'd for the same, to be taken off, and pull'd down in the said Market-place where they were set up, and in the same place set up his own Prices seal'd with his Seal, and would, if it had not been letted, in semblable manner us'd your Seal standing upon your Graces Gates; and also would of his presumptuous Mind, have openly set in the Stocks within your said Town your Clerk of your Market. By which Presumption and Usurpation your Grace may perceive, that in his Heart he hath reputed himself to be equal with your Royal Majesty.

XL. Also, the said Lord Cardinal, of his further pompous and presumptuous Mind, hath enterpris'd to joyn and imprint the Cardinals Hat under your Arms in your Coin of Groats, made at your City of York, which like Deed hath not been seen to have been done by any Subject within your Realm before this time.

XLI. Also, where one Sir Edward Jones, Clerk, Parson of Crowley in the County of Buckingham, in the 18th year of your most Noble Reign, let his said Parsonage with all Tythes, and other Profits of the same to one William Johnson by Indentures for certain years, within which years the Dean of the said Cardinal's College in Oxford, pretended title to a certain Portion of Tythes within the said Parsonage, supposing the said Portion to belong to the Parsonage of Chicheley, which was appropriated to the Priory of Tykeford, lately suppress'd, where of truth, the Parsons of Crowley have been peaceably possess'd of the said Portion, time out of mind: Whereupon a Subpoena was directed to the said Johnson to appear before the said Lord Cardinal at Hampton Court; where without any Bill, the said Lord Cardinal committed him to the Fleet, where he remain'd by the space of twelve Weeks, because he would not depart with the said Portion; and at the last, upon a Recognizance made, that he should appear before the said Lord Cardinal wheresoever he was commanded, he was deliver'd out of the Fleet. Howbeit, as yet the said Portion is so kept from him, that he dare not deal with it.

XLII. Also, where one Martin Docowra had a Lease of the Mannor of Balsal in the County of Warwick, for term of certain years, an Injunction came to him out of the Chancery, by Writ, upon pain of a thousand pounds, that he should avoid the Possession of the same Mannor, and suffer Sir George Throgmorton Knight, to take the Profits of the same Mannor, to the time the matter depending in the Chancery between the Lord of St. Johns, and the said Docowra were discuss'd; and yet the said Docowra never made answer in the Chancery, never was call'd into the Chancery for that Matter. And now of late he hath receiv'd the like Injunction, upon pain of two thousand pounds, contrary to the course of the Common Law.

XLIII. Also, whereas in the Parliament-Chamber, and in the open Parliament, Communication and Devices were had and mov'd, wherein mention was, by an Incident, made of matters touching Heresies, and erroneous Sects. It was spoken and reported by one Bishop there being present, and confirm'd by a good number of the same Bishops in presence of all the Lords Spiritual and Temporal then assembled, that two of the said Bishops were minded and desir'd to repair unto the University of Cambridge, for Examination, Reformation, and Correction of such Errors as then seem'd, and were reported to reign amongst the Students and Scholars of the same, as well touching the Lutheran Sect and Opinions, as otherwise; the Lord Cardinal inform'd of the good Minds and Intents of the said two Bishops in that behalf, expressly inhibited and commanded them in no wise so to do. By means whereof the same Errors (as they affirm'd) crept more abroad, and took greater place: Saying furthermore, that it was not in their defaults that the said Heresies were not punish'd, but in the said Lord Cardinal, and that it was no reason any blame or lack should be arrested unto them for his Offence. Whereby it evidently appeareth, that the said Lord Cardinal, besides all other his heinous Offences, hath been the impeacher and disturber of due and direct correction of Heresies; being highly to the danger and peril of the whole body and good Christian People of this your Realm.

XLIV. Finally, Forasmuch as by the aforesaid Articles is evidently declar'd to your most Royal Majesty, that the Lord Cardinal by his outrageous Pride hath greatly shadow'd a long season your Graces Honour, which is most highly to be regarded, and by his insatiable Avarice and ravenous Appetite, to have Riches and Treasure without measure, hath so grievously oppress'd your poor Subjects, with so manifold crafts of Bribery and Extortion, that the Commonwealth of this your Graces Realm is thereby greatly decay'd and impoverish'd: And also by his Cruelty, Iniquity, Affection and Partiality, hath subverted the due course and order of your Graces Laws, to the undoing of a great number of your loving People;

Please it your most Royal Majesty therefore of your excellent Goodness towards the weal of this your Realm, and Subjects of the same, to set such order and direction upon the said Lord Cardinal, as may be to the terrible example of others to beware so to offend your Grace and your Laws hereafter: And that he be so provided for, that he never have any Power, Jurisdiction, or Authority, hereafter to trouble, vex, and impoverish the Commonwealth of this your Realm, as he hath done heretofore, to the great hurt and damage of every Man almost, high and low. Which for your Grace so doing, will daily pray, as their Duty is, to Almighty God, for the prosperous Estate of your most Royal Majesty long to endure in Honour and good Health, to the pleasure of God, and your Hearts most desire.

Subscrib'd the first day of December, the twenty first year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lord King Henry the Eighth.

Cromwel's defence of the Cardinal his Master.

These Articles were presented to the King by the Lords, and then sent down to the lower House: Where Tho. Cromwel (obtaining the place of a Burgess) so wittily defended the Cardinal his Master, that no Treason could be laid to his charge. And upon this honest beginning, Cromwel obtain'd his first Reputation. Yet could not the resisting of this brunt, nor even the gracious Messages receiv'd frequently from the King cheer up our Cardinal. For as he found the Pope had now a long while neglected to give the King any satisfaction (which certainly was the only way to procure the Cardinal's Restitution) and that (for the rest) no evident sign of the Kings relenting appear'd, so being not able to support any longer his many Afflictions, he fell dangerously sick. The News whereof being brought to the Kings ears, mov'd so much Compassion, as not only he, but, by his Intreaty, Mistress Anne Bolen (whom the Cardinal had in vain importun'd to intercede for him) also sent him several Tokens; whereof one was a Ruby, wherein the King's Image was curiously engraven, a Gift heretofore of the Cardinals, together with a gracious Message deliver'd by Doctor Batts his Physician; That his Highness was not angry with him in his Heart, which he should know shortly. Whereupon as the Cardinal recover'd his Health, so the King, for confirming his Promises, seal'd his Pardon, February 12. and three days after, by Letters Patents, restor'd him to the Archbishoprick of York. Moreover, he sent him Money, Plate, rich Hangings, and Furniture for his House and Chappel, in that quantity, as the Cardinal was for the present much recover'd: Hoping also, that since he had resign'd his House call'd York-House (but afterward by the King styl'd the Mannor of Westminster, now White-Hall) that his Punishment ended there, and himself now upon terms of regaining the Kings favour. The Confidence whereof also made him to be an humble Suppliant to the King, that, for his Healths sake, he might have leave to remove to Richmond-House, the use of which he had receiv'd in exchange from the King, for that his sumptuous Palace which he built, and call'd by the name of Hampton-Court.

It is now time to look a while on foreign History. Our last Narration left the Count de St. Pol in Italy, where he had quarter'd that part of the Soldiers which remain'd of that years Wars, in their Winter Garrisons; but the Spring being come, he took divers places on this side the Ticino, and at last joyn'd his Forces with the Duke of Urbino, General of the Venetians, and Francisco Sforza. Yet, whether that he durst not attempt the City of Milan, which Antonio de Leyva strongly defended, or that the Count de St. Pol affected more the Enterprize of Genoia, their Army march'd to Landriano, June 21. 1529. Of which Antonio de Leyva being advertis'd, us'd that diligence, that he surpris'd the Count de St. Pol when part of his Army was march'd before, and wholly defeated the rest, taking him Prisoner.

This while the Emperor equipp'd a great Fleet for Italy, with intention to be Crown'd there, having first (for the more ample furnishing of himself with Money) pawn'd the Moluccas to the King of Portugal for 350000 Ducats.

The Pope hearing of these great Preparatives at the same Season that the Defeat of St. Pol (succeeding that of Lautrech in Naples) had wholly disabled the Army of the Confederates, resolv'd to comply with the times. So that, before the News thereof could easily be convey'd to the Emperor, he endeavour'd his own Peace, for this purpose employing one Antonio Musetola a Neapolitan; who prevail'd so far, as he concluded a League at Barcelona, June 29. to this effect.

1. That the Peace betwixt them should be perpetual.
2. That the Imperial Army which was in Naples should have secure Passage through the Popes Territories.

The Popes
League with the Emperor.

1529. 3. That the Emperor should give Donna Margarita (his Natural Daughter) in Marriage to Alessandro de Medicis Son of Lorenzo, and that he should invest him in the State of Florence, with the Title of Duke.

4. That Cervia, Ravenna, Modena, Reggio, should be restor'd to the Apostolick See by the Emperor's Power.

5. That the Pope should give unto the Emperor a Bull, with the Title of the Kingdom of Naples, to be held in Fee from the Pope, upon payment every year of a Horse or a Hackney white.

6. That the Pope should in all Ecclesiastical Affairs, enjoy his accustomed Right.

7. That the Pope and Emperor should see one another in Italy.

8. That the Emperor should assist the Pope against the Duke of Ferrara.

9. That Justice should be done to Francisco Sforza Duke of Milan, and that the Emperor commit his Cause to indifferent Judges.

10. That the Emperor and his Brother Don Fernando and the Pope join together to reduce the Lutherans, either by fair or foul means to the Roman Catholick Faith.

July 3. All which Articles (and perhaps some private ones concerning the Affairs of England now in agitation) were sworn to on both sides upon the Great Altar of the Cathedral Church of Barcelona.

And thus did the Pope renounce all his former Designs, and betake himself intirely to the Emperor, at the same time when the two Cardinals sat on their Commission in England. So easie was it for the Pope to forget both the Injuries receiv'd from the Imperialists, and the good turns from all his Confederates, when a readier way was open'd him for regaining his Cities, and revenging himself on the Duke of Ferrara and the Florentines, who, during his late Captivity, had expuls'd the Family of Medicis out of the City.

Treaty between Charles and Francis manag'd by Ladies.

July 5.

Francis also understanding that, upon this second Overthrow of his Forces in Italy, his Reputation was lost, and his Confederates discourag'd, and hearing besides, the Pope had concluded this League with the Emperor, thought it better to reserve his Money for Ransoming his Children, than to cast it away in the Wars. So that, notwithstanding his reiterated Protestations of Affection to our King, he underhand labour'd a Peace with the Emperor. The Overtures whereof also were willingly accepted, both as Charles doubted a change of Religion in Germany, and as the Turk had made no little Progress in Hungary. For which causes also he chose rather to hearken to those motions were made for delivering of the Children of Francis upon reasonable terms, than to detain them any longer unusefully. Thus both their minds secretly concurring to Peace, the Treaty thereof was permitted to two Ladies, Madam Louïse Mother of Francis, and Regent of France, and Madam Anna-Margarita Aunt to Charles, and Regent of the Low-Countries. Of which kind though the Precedents be rare, yet, as Affairs then stood, they were thought no ill Mediatresses. Both as the suppleness of their Sex could better decline that rough Dispute, which (considering the late Cartels) could scarce be eschew'd betwixt the Servants of either Prince, and as it was a kind of Gallantry, to essay, if after so many broken or avoided Treaties which Men had made, one concluded by Women would hold; howsoever for Women to treat of Marriage or Childrens business, was no strange thing. But the event shew'd they were able Negotiatresses. For though their first Meeting (being at Cambray) was not without some of that Emulation and Puntillio which is ordinary in their Sex, yet at last they fell to treat in good earnest. The Proposition which before all other Madam Louïse made, was that a Messenger might be sent to see the Estate of the Children of Francis, it being in vain (she said) to treat of their Delivery, when (for any thing she knew) they were not extant at all. This being accorded, the Ladies proceeded to the more substantial Articles of a Treaty.

Madam Margarita said, indeed she had no other Instruction, but to demand the execution of the Treaty of Madrid; but Madam Louïse, representing sometimes the unreasonableness, and sometimes the impossibility of performing those Articles, reduc'd her to more moderate Terms. Whereunto also our King's Ambassadors, Cuthbert Tonsil Bishop of Duresme, and Sir Thomas More, did not little conduce. For as our King knew the weight he could add on either side, would sway the Balance, so he interpos'd Offices; hoping to get either Francis to procure his Divorce, or Charles to suffer it. But as those Princes affairs requir'd a more quick and serious Dispatch, than to attend the Decision of so great and doubtful a Business, they car'd little to satisfy our King, or to comply with Mistress Bolen. Therefore, setting apart those Considerations, they attended only their own Interests; and Madam Louïse very particularly the News of her Grand-Childrens safety. For which purpose having employ'd one Vordin, he gave this Account as it is extant in the Spanish History.

That he found the Dauphin and Duke of Orleans in the Castle of Pedrazu, under the Guard of the Marquis de Verlanga, in a dark Chamber, ill furnish'd, having forgotten all their French, so that when Vordin spake to them, they requir'd an Interpreter, that their best entertainment was playing with little Dogs, and making Pictures in Wax. That, when he presented them new Cloaths, the Marquis would not suffer them to be put on, whereof Vordin gives this ridiculous Reason, that the Spaniards believ'd there were Witches in France, that could transport any one in the Air when their Charms might but touch the Body. But Vordin was deceiv'd; the true reason being, that out of a certain curiosity for preservation of those Princes, as well as discharge of his own Trust, Verlanga would neither suffer those, nor any other Cloaths to be worn by the Princes, till others had put them on first. But Madam Louïse was so ill satisfi'd with this Relation, that she hastned the Peace. To which purpose, as the Cardinal de Salviati (the Popes Legate) did contribute his endeavours, (but with favour certainly to the Emperor) so our Ambassadors likewise did co-operate, but so, as they had principal regard of Francis: Our King believing that he might be the sooner induc'd openly to assist him, when his Children were free. Thus these pompous Ladies (who met at Cambray, July 5.) mediated a Peace, though not without some difficulty, Madam Louïse once breaking off the Treaty, so that, had not the Emperor, by an express Courier, enlarg'd the Instructions given to his Aunt, no Peace had follow'd. At last they concluded this Treaty, in which also our King was comprehended.

July 5.

The Treaty of Cambray, Aug. 5. 1529.

I. That there shall be a good, sure, and perpetual Peace betwixt the Emperor and King, and that they shall be for ever Friends of the

the Friends, and Enemies of the Enemies of each other.

II. That the Treaty of Madrid shall remain in its full force and vigour, and shall be inviolably kept betwixt them, their Heirs and Successors, without Innovation, except only in the third, fourth, eleventh, and fourteenth Articles, where mention is made of the Counties of Auxerrois, Masconnois, Bar sur Seine, the Vicounty of Auxonne, and the Superiority or Government of St. Laurence. And whereas it was agreed by the Treaty of Madrid, that the aforesaid Places should be restor'd to the Emperor, yet, in consideration of the Peace, he is content to remain only in the Action and Right, in an amiable course, or by way of Justice to be executed; which he intends also shall be reserv'd to him and his Heirs, notwithstanding any Prescription of time that can be alledg'd to the contrary, it being permitted also to the said King, and his Successors to defend themselves. Notwithstanding all which, that a certain Rent, which the said King pretends to have for Salt out of certain Salines in those parts, shall be extinct for ever.

III. That the said King for the Ransom of his two Sons, shall pay two Millions of Crowns de Soleil; the Gold to be of twenty-two Carats and three quarters, whereof one Million and two hundred thousand Crowns, shall be paid in Specie, as much as can be gotten, and the rest in one intire Mass of Gold, if the Emperor shall so think good, or if otherwise, it shall be coin'd, and Essay thereof taken. And at the same instant the Dauphin and Duke of Orleans shall be deliver'd to the Deputies of the said King. All which is to be done at or before the first day of March next ensuing, in the manner and form as shall be agreed betwixt the said Emperor and King. And as for the other eight hundred thousand Crowns, the said King shall discharge the Emperor of a certain Debt he oweth to the King of England for Moneys lent him upon Pawns, as may appear by certain Schedules and Obligations of his Majesty, which Debt is said to amount to two hundred and ninety thousand Crowns de Soleil, or thereabouts. And concerning the remainder of the said two Millions, amounting unto five hundred and ten thousand Crowns de Soleil, the said King shall give unto the Emperor, the said Sum, in Rent, for a certain time, upon certain Lands and Signiories in Brabant, Flanders, Hainault, Artois, or elsewhere in the Low-Countries, where the Emperor or his Commissioners shall chuse or appoint, of the yearly value of twenty-five thousand and five hundred Crowns, till the said Sum of five hundred and ten thousand Crowns be made up. All this to commence as soon as the Children be deliver'd. At which time also the said King shall procure, that King Henry deliver unto the Emperor the Writings, Schedules, and Obligations, together with the Acquittances for the payments of the said Debts. As also the said Pawns and Obligations of Indemnity promis'd by the said Emperor to the King of England; and that the said two Millions being thus paid, the Emperor shall not demand any thing for cause of his Imprisonment.

IV. That Francis, in the space of six weeks after the Ratification of this Treaty, shall revoke and call back all the Forces he hath in Italy, whether French or Mercenaries, so that the Emperor may be assur'd thereof fifteen days before the Restitution of the said Hostages.

V. That the said King within fifteen days after the receipt of the ratification of this Treaty, shall restore unto the Emperor the Castle and Bayliage of Hesdin, as a Member of his County of Artois, together with the Cannon and Munition, according to the Treaty of Madrid, except those Moveables that have been restor'd to the Lady Reux.

VI. That, because in the Treaty of Madrid, the said King hath agreed to leave and quit unto the Emperor all his Rights of Jurisdiction and Superiority, that he and his Predecessors Kings of France have held, or may claim in the Counties of Flanders and Artois, as also in the City of Arras, Tournay, Tournayssis, St. Amand, and Mortaign, and as also in Lisle, Douay, and Orchies; and, because upon these general Terms, some Difficulties might arise; therefore it is declar'd by this present Article, that the said King in confirmation of the Treaty of Madrid, hath left, given, and transported, as also the said Lady his Mother, in his Name, and by virtue of the Authority given her, doth leave, give, and transport unto the said Emperor, his Heirs and Successors, being Counts and Countesses of Flanders, the Fee, Homage, Oath of Fidelity, and all other marks of Subjection which either he or his Ancestors have had, or pretended to have, over the said Counts and Countesses of Flanders, or any others inhabiting in the said Counties.

VII. That the said King hath renounc'd, and that by the Authority given her, the Dutcheß of Angoulesme, his Mother, doth renounce all right and claim to Lisle, Douay and Orchies, consenting further that they shall be united unto the County of Flanders, in manner as they were before they were transported to the King of France, by a Treaty at Paris, Aug. 2. 1498.

VIII. That the said King hath renounc'd, and that, by the Authority given her, the Dutcheß of Angoulesme, his Mother, doth renounce all Right and Claim which he or his Ancestors Kings of France have had, or may pretend to have in the City of Tournay, the Bayliage of Tournayssis, the Towns of Mortaign and St. Amand, with all the Rights. Furthermore, consenting that they may be united and incorporated unto the said County of Flanders.

IX. That the said King hath renounc'd, and, by the Authority given her, the said Dutcheß of Angoulesme, his Mother, doth renounce all Right or Claim they pretend to have in the City of Arras, or upon the Bishoprick and Cathedral Church thereof, except so much of the Revenues of the said Bishoprick and Church, as is in the Kingdom of France.

X. That the said King hath consented, granted, and, by the Authority given her, the said Dutcheß of Angoulesme, his Mother, doth consent and grant to the Emperor, his Heirs and Successors, Counts and Countesses of Artois, that they shall remain for ever henceforth quit and discharg'd from the Fee and Homage, Oath of Fidelity, or any other mark of Subjection which he or his Ancestors, Counts and Countesses of Artois, have been bound to do or acknowledge to the Kings of France, excepting only Therouene, and the Possession belonging to the Churches of Artois, being in France, and some small Towns in the Bolognois.

XI. That the said King hath given and transported, and, by the Authority given her, the said Dutcheß of Angoulesme, his Mother, doth give and transport a Service or Tenure of Artois, commonly call'd the ancient Composition of Artois, amounting yearly to fourteen thousand Livres Tournois, unto the Emperor, his Heirs and Successors, Counts and Countesses of Artois.

XII. That the Inhabitants of Artois be free from all manner of Imposition or Tribute heretofore claim'd by the Kings of France.

1529. XIII. That the Emperor reciprocally shall renounce and transport, as also, by the Authority given her, the said Lady the Arch-Dutcheſs, doth renounce and transport, for ever, unto the said King, his Heirs and Successors, all the Right and Title that the said Emperor or his Predecessors hold or claim in any of the States, Lands and Signories of the most Christian King; and especially all he may pretend to in Peronne, Montdidier, and Roye, and in the Counties of Belevoisin, Guise, and Ponthieu, and in the Towns and Signories situated upon the Soame, either upon the one part thereof or the other, together with all the Jurisdictions belonging unto them; notwithstanding any Treaty heretofore made to the contrary.

XIV. That, notwithstanding the Transportation, the Emperor hath made by the Treaty of Madrid, of the County of Humen Artois unto the French King, it is declar'd by these Presents, that the places thereof which are, at this present, in the Emperors Possession, shall remain free and exempt from any pretence of the French, as those above-mention'd.

XV. That all the aforesaid Renouncings and Transportations made by the King unto the Emperor, shall be understood as valid; notwithstanding any derogation which may rise from any Union or Incorporation of them unto the Crown of France, or any bar of the Law Salick. And that the said King and his Successors shall never attempt the contrary hereunto, when yet they might pretend to do it by Right.

XVI. That all Suits and Processes undecided in the Parliament of Paris, or any other Court of Justice of the said King, which may have relation to the Inhabitants of Flanders or Artois by reason of Fees, Lands or Possessions situate in the aforesaid Counties, shall be remitted to the Great Council of the said Emperor, or to other his Courts of Justice in the said Counties of Flanders and Artois, to be there finally determined.

XVII. That if any definitive Sentence have been given, before this last War, against the Inhabitants of the Counties of Flanders and Artois, that the power of executing them shall be committed to the Officers of the Emperor.

XVIII. That the Parliament of Paris shall remit unto the President, and others of the Emperors Great Council in Malines, the Process or Suit concerning the Right which the Count de Nevers, or his Wife or Children pretend to the Inheritance of John of Burgundy, &c.

XIX. That, notwithstanding the Droit d'Aubaine, the Subjects of either Prince may enjoy their Right in as ample form as the Natural Inhabitants of the Country use to do. And as for the County of Carolois, that the Lady Arch-Dutcheſs may enjoy it during her Life, and after her Decease, the Emperor, and then that it shall return to the Crown of France. And it is further agreed, that she may enjoy certain Rights in Noyers, and other places, in the same manner as she enjoyed them in the life of King Philip of Castile her Brother.

XX. That, if the King or any in his name do hold any Town, Castle, or Fort in the State and Duchy of Milan; it shall be restor'd to the Emperor and his Commissaries, within six weeks after the Ratification of this Treaty.

XXI. That the said King shall deliver unto the Emperor or his Commissaries, within the space of six weeks after the Ratification of this Treaty, the Contado de Asti, with all that appertaineth to it, to be enjoy'd by the said Emperor, his Heirs and Successors for ever.

XXII. That the said King likewise shall restore unto the Emperor or his Commissaries, Barleta and all other places that he or any for him holdeth in the Kingdom of Naples, as soon as is possible, and before the Restitution of Francis his Children. And it is further agreed, that the said King, within fifteen days after the publication of this Treaty, shall require the Venetians and all other his Confederates to restore all the Towns, Castles, and Fortresses that they hold in the Kingdom of Naples, within the space of six weeks. And that, in case of Contravention (when the term is expir'd) the said King shall declare himself expressly their Enemy, and from that day forwards, shall give the Emperor thirty thousand Crowns de Soleil Monthly, until the said places be recover'd, and brought to obedience to the Emperor. And, in case they be not so recover'd before the Dauphin and Duke of Orleans be deliver'd, the said King shall give good Security to the Emperor for continuing the said pay Monthly, until they be reduc'd to the Emperors Obedience. Upon condition yet, that, if the Emperor employ not the Money to the purpose aforesaid, it shall be paid back again, and that therefore the King may appoint some Person who may inform him of the time, when the said places shall be taken in. And that the said King neither directly nor indirectly shall favour any in the Kingdom of Naples, that have rebelled against the Emperor since the Treaty of Madrid.

XXIII. That the King shall restore also unto the Emperor or his Commissaries, all that can be recover'd, of that which was taken out of the Gallies in Portofino.

XXIV. That, for the particular in the Treaty of Madrid, concerning the Residence of Monsieur de Angouleme should make with the Emperor, it is remitted to the Kings discretion.

XXV. That, for the particular of the League defensive agreed in the Treaty of Madrid, it shall be understood only in relation to the patrimonial Possessions on either side, and that the Charges incident thereunto shall be at the costs of the demander, and, for the rest, that the said King shall not meddle in any Practices either in Italy or Germany, to the prejudice of the Emperor.

XXVI. That the Marriage concluded by the Treaty of Madrid, between the said King, and the Lady Leonora, Queen Dowager of Portugal, and eldest Sister of the Emperor, shall be accomplish'd. And that the said King as soon as can be, after the Ratification of this Treaty, shall send Ambassadors with sufficient and especial Power and Authority to ratifie and approve all that shall be needful concerning the said Marriage. For the Accomplishment and Consummation whereof, the said Queen shall be conducted into France, at the same instant that the Dauphin and Duke of Orleans shall be deliver'd. And that the said Matrimony shall hold in all things according to the Treaty of Madrid, saving in that only which concerns the Counties of Auxerrois, Masconnois, and the Signiory of Bar sur Seine; with reservation yet of those Rights which should (as is said before) appertain to the Duchy of Burgundy. And because the term of payment of the two hundred thousand Crowns in lieu of Dowry of the said Queen, and specified in the Treaty of Madrid, is expir'd; it is agreed again, that the said Dowry should be paid, the half within six Months next ensuing, and the other half within six Weeks following, and that upon receipt of the whole Sum or part thereof the said King shall be bound to give assurance in the manner as is specified in the Treaty of Madrid.

XXVII. That, forasmuch as concerns the Help and Assistance by Land and by Sea promis'd by the said King for the passage of the Emperor into Italy, the said Emperor releaseth it, upon Condition only, that, within two Months after he be requir'd thereunto (whether it be for his Passage into Italy, or for his Return, or for his Service while he is there) he give twelve Gallies, four Ships, and four Gallies sufficiently provided with Artillery, and Seamen, without any Soldiers yet to be put in them, but such as the Emperor shall appoint; and at the cost of the said King (except the Souldatesque) for the space of five Months, after the time that they shall come into the Haven, which his Majesty shall nominate. The said Emperor delivering unto the Captain or General (that should bring the said Armado) Letters Patents sign'd with his Hand, and seal'd with his Seal, by which he shall promise and swear, after the said five Months to restore immediately to the said King or his Deputies, the said Armado, in the manner that he receiv'd it. And moreover, the said King shall pay really to the said Emperor the two hundred thousand Crowns, that, by the Treaty of Madrid, he promis'd to pay his Majesty, for the aforesaid Voyage; that is to say, one hundred thousand Crowns within six Months next ensuing, and the other hundred thousand Crowns within six Months after. And, as for the pay of six thousand Foot for six Months, which the said King promis'd to furnish, giving therefore the caution and security of sufficient Merchants, the Emperor by this Treaty acquits him of it, upon Condition, that he pay one hundred thousand Crowns de Soleil, the which Sum shall remain, and be for the increasing of the Dowry of the Queen Dowager Leonora.

XXVIII. That, because in the said Treaty of Madrid, there is no mention of the Profits and Rents of the Inheritances given by the said Emperor and King during the War, whereupon many Questions and Differences may arise: It is determined and concluded by this Treaty, that all such Profits and Rents, Ecclesiastical or Secular, as also all Debts, Moveables, which have or might have been given expressly by Letters Patents of the said Emperor and King, or their Lieutenants in any manner, with title of Confiscation, and which have been deliver'd, taken, or paid during the War betwixt the two Princes before the Treaty of Madrid, shall remain for ever given and acquitted to the profit of the said Lords, Vassals, Lands, Towns, and Persons subject to the said Emperor and King, and of their Allies which in the said Wars shall have taken the part of the one or the other.

XXIX. That all the Privileges of the Towns, Neighbours, and Inhabitants of the Counties of Flanders and Artois, and other places of the Low-Countries, which appertain to the Emperor, shall, by this present Capitulation, be confirm'd, and that the Privileges also that the French were wont to enjoy in the said Emperors Dominions shall remain in their full force, according as hath been accustom'd on both sides.

XXX. That all Prisoners of War taken by Sea or Land, as well before as after the Treaty of Madrid, of the one part or of the other, Subjects of the said Emperor and most Christian King (excepting the Neapolitan Subjects of the Emperor that have serv'd against him in the same Kingdom) and any other that have serv'd, follow'd, and held the contrary part, of what Nation or Condition soever, shall be set free, and put at liberty, without paying Ransom, within two Months after the Ratification of the Treaty, reserving only those Prisoners, which before the said Treaty should have been put to Ransom, who shall pay their Ransom notwithstanding this Article.

XXXI. That if Robert de la March or his Children shall presume to make any Enterprize upon the Cattle and Dutchy of Bouillon, (conquer'd by the Emperor, and left by his Majesty to the Church of Leige, to which it anciently appertain'd) in such case the King may give no hope, favour or assistance, neither directly or indirectly against the said Church.

XXXII. That the Heirs of Charles Duke of Bourbon, according to the Treaty of Madrid, shall enjoy all those Goods and Possessions that pertain to the said Duke, so that, notwithstanding all Judgments and Sentences given and pronounced against the said Duke, during his Life, or after his Death, the Heirs of the said Duke shall enjoy their ancient Right.

XXXIII. That Jean Count of Ponticure shall be restor'd unto all the Goods which his Father enjoy'd at that time that he went out of France to serve the Emperor, and that also the other Friends, Allies and Servants of the said Duke of Bourbon, as also their Heirs and Successors, shall enjoy the benefit of the Treaty of Madrid in all that may concern them; notwithstanding any Judgments or Sentences given and pronounced to the contrary.

XXXIV. That Don Lorenzo de Gorreud Count de Pondevaux, Mayordomo of the Emperor, shall be put in the real possession of the Towns, Castles, Lands and Signories of Chalamont and Montmarles, bought heretofore of the Duke of Bourbon, upon Condition yet, that if the Sum of twenty thousand Crowns (being the price for which they were sold) be paid back again, that they return to the first Owners.

XXXV. That the said King, by this present Treaty, hath taken away and remov'd, and doth take away and remove the Sequestration, and all other Impediments on his part concerning the Principality of Aurange, and the Superiority of it, to the intent that Don Philibert de Chalon, Prince of Aurange, Vice-roy of Naples, may enjoy it, together with his Preheminence and Superiority, as he enjoy'd it before the said Sequestration.

XXXVI. That the Dutches of Vendosme, Widow, shall be restor'd into all the Possessions that she had in the Emperors Dominions, before, or during the Wars; and Louis Seigneur de Hanis shall enjoy the like for his part.

XXXVII. That the Comte of Gaure shall be restor'd to his own in the like manner.

XXXVIII. That, for the business of Philip de Croy, Marquis of Arechot, and the difference betwixt him and the Seigneurs of Chasteau-Bryon, and others, Tutors of the Children of Monsieur de Lautrech, that it should be referr'd to a particular Treaty and Agreement before the Governors of the City and Dutchy of Cambray, which said agreement shall stand.

XXXIX. That, the Suit depending in the Parliament of Paris, between Adolphus of Burgundy Seigneur de Beures on the one part, for the Seigneuries of Creue-cœur in Cambresis, &c. and the Kings Attorney on the other part, shall be referr'd, in the state it now is, to four Judges, whereof two be nam'd by the Emperor, and two by the King: And that the said Judges shall be bound to return and determine the Cause in the City of Cambray, twenty days after the Ratification of this Treaty. And that, if two of the four Judges absent themselves, the other two, that is to say, one of either part, may proceed to give Sentence.

XL. That

1529. XL. That in this Peace and Treaty is comprehended, as a principal Contractor, the Pope and the Apostolick See, which the said Emperor and King shall maintain in his Authority and Pre-eminence: And that they shall procure that the Towns and Places, being of the Patrimony of the Church, shall be restor'd. Also there are comprehended herein as principal Contractors, the Kings of Hungary, England, and Poland, Christian King of Denmark, the Kings of Portugal and Scotland, and the Lady Arch-Duchess, Aunt to the Emperor. Also there are comprehended herein as Confederates, the Electors, the Cardinal of Liege, &c. Also it is agreed, that all the said principal Contractors and Confederates shall be advertis'd hereof by the said King and Emperor.

XLI. That the said King shall procure the Community or Republick of Florence, within four Months after the Ratification of this Treaty, to agree with the Emperor, which being done, they also shall be comprehended herein, and not otherwise. And because, since the Treaty of Madrid, Charles Duke of Gueldres Comte de Zutphen, hath taken part with the Emperor, and agreed with him, his Majesty declares him for his Confederate, and all others nominated here: And that those who are not nominated shall be excluded out of the said Treaty, unless they be comprehended under the general terms of Vassals or Subjects of the said Kings.

XLII. That the said Emperor and King (as soon as they well can) for Ratification and Confirmation of this present Treaty (in which de verbo ad verbum, there must be inserted and joyn'd together the Treaty of Madrid) shall swear solemnly upon the Evangelists, and the Wood of the true Cross, in the presence of the Holy Sacrament, and these Ambassadors that shall be appointed thereunto, to hold and keep (every one for his part) all the Points and Articles of this Treaty, as also all those contain'd in the Treaty of Madrid, which are not alter'd, chang'd, and innovated by these Presents; submitting themselves, for performance hereof, to the Jurisdiccions and Ecclesiastical Censures, even to the Invocation of the Secular Power inclusive; Constituting their Proctors in forma camere Apostolica, to appear in their Names, or in either of them, in the Court of Rome before the Pope, and the Auditori della Ruota, and to receive voluntarily the condemnation and fulmination of the said Censures in case of Contravention; and, for this purpose, to submit themselves and pro-rogue their Jurisdiction before some Prelate or Ecclesiastical Judge. And that neither the said Emperor and King, nor any of them may (without mutual consent) demand a Relaxation of the said Oath, nor an Absolution of the said Censures. And that, if any did demand and obtain it, it shall not avail him, without the consent of the other.

XLIII. That the said King shall ratifie and approve both this Treaty, and that of Madrid in the form there mention'd, save where it hath been chang'd, alter'd, and innovated by these Presents, forasmuch as concerns the Seigneur Dauphin, according to the manner declar'd in the said Treaty of Madrid. And that he also shall cause this Treaty to be ratif'd and approv'd by all the particlar Estates of the Provinces and Governments of his Kingdoms: And that he shall make them swear and promise, that the said Treaty shall be perpetually kept, and shall cause them to be register'd and verifi'd in the Parliament of Paris, and all other Parliaments of the Kingdom of France, in the presence of the Attorneys General of the said Parliaments, to whom the said King shall give especial and irrevocable Power, to appear in his Name, in all the said Parliaments, and there consent to the afore-said Inregistring, and submit himself voluntarily to the keeping of all that is contain'd in the said Treaty. And that, by virtue of the said voluntary Submission, he may be enjoyn'd or condemn'd thereunto, by the definitive sentence of the said Parliaments, in good and convenient form. And that this Treaty shall be also verified and Inregistred in the Chambre des Comptes of Paris, in the Presence, and with the consent of the King's Attorney, for the more effectual execution, and accomplishment of them, and the validations of the Acquittances, Renuntiations, Submissions, and other things contain'd and declar'd in the said Treaty. Which Ratifications, Inregistrings, Verifications, and all other things above-mention'd shall be done and perfected by the said King, and the dispatches of them, in due form deliver'd into the hands of the said Emperor, before his Children be deliver'd, and within the space of four Months at furthest. And if, for the Inregistring and Verifications above-mention'd, it should be necessary that the said King should release, and discharge unto his Officers those Oaths that they have taken, not to consent or suffer any alienations of the Crown, the said King shall do it; and that also the said Emperor shall, in his great Council, and his other Councils, and Chambres des Comptes in his Dominions of the Low-Countries, cause to be made such other Inregistring, and Verifications, releasing also the Oath of his Officers, and causing the particular States of his said Dominions to ratifie and approve this Treaty, within the time above-mention'd.

XLIV. That this Peace shall be publish'd through all the Kingdoms and Seigneuries and Dominions of the Emperor and the King, and especially the Frontiers, before the 15th of September next, to the intent that no Man may pretend Ignorance; and the said Arch-Duchess on the part of the Emperor, and the Dutchess of Angoulesme on the part of the French King, and the said Arch-Duchess particularly for the Queen Leonora, forasmuch as may duly concern her, and by those Oaths that every one of them hath made, do promise that they shall duly ratifie all that is contain'd in this Treaty of Peace. And that they shall give Letters Patents thereof, in due and sufficient form, on either part, within two Months and a half after the concluding this present Treaty.

In testimony whereof the said Ladies Arch-Duchess and Dutchess, and each of them, have sign'd and seal'd these Presents. Dated in the City of Cambray the 5th of August, 1529.

And this is the most substantial part of the Treaty of Cambray, as it is set down by Sanderwal; but Bellay l. 3. adds, that, besides the above-mention'd two Millions of Crowns, Francis paid, for the Emperor, to our King, 500000 Crowns as a penalty the Emperor had incur'd for not marrying the Princess Mary. Moreover, that he was bound to dis-engage, from our King, a rich Jewel in the form of a Flower-de-luce, wherein was a piece of the wood of the true Cross, being pawn'd heretofore by Philip, Father of the Emperor, to Henry VII, for fifty thousand Crowns. The Acquittances, for which Payments, together with the Jewel, as the same Author confesseth to have been sent to the Emperor, so he acknowledgeth, in the manner of it, the great Libe-

Henry's Generosity.* Liberality of our King; who, besides giving Francis four years Term for payment of 400000 Crowns (which, as he saith, was the Money lent by our King to Charles) did remit and forgive him absolutely the 500000 Crowns above-mention'd; and, for the Jewel, presented it to his Godson Henry, second Son of Francis by the conveyance of Guillaume Seigneur de Langey, whom the French King sent for that purpose into England.

Mart. du Bel. l. 3. Besides this Treaty, I find, by our Records, another at the same time and place, made betwixt our King, and the Lady Margarete, in the name of the Emperor. Our Kings Commissioners being Cutbbert Tonstal Bishop of London, Sir Thomas More, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and Mr. John Hacket, our Kings Resident there. Which yet, because it contains nothing of extraordinary, but only the continuation of Traffick for Merchants, and the forbidding to print or sell any Lutheran Books on either side, I purposely omit.

Sandoz. Francis understanding this conclusion of Peace at Cambray, hasteth thither, that he might both render the Lady Margaret a Visit, and promise not to fail in the performance of those Articles his Mother had agreed. Which yet the Spanish Writers say he held no longer than until the Ambassadors of his Confederates in Italy came to him; so that, when, together with his breach of League with them, they represented their own miserable estate at that present, he excus'd himself, through the necessity of his Condition at that time; assuring them nevertheless, that notwithstanding any Treaty, he would continue his love to and care of them, only when first he might have his Children. So that in effect he secretly assisted them still; as hoping thereby to defend himself against the Emperor, when occasion were. Which also he extended so far, as, upon presumption thereof, he broke some Articles lately concluded with the Spaniard. The News of this Treaty was no sooner brought to Queen Leonora, but she, for the better complying with her Husband, interceded with the Emperor, upon pretence that Charles attempted to draw some of the Swiss (heretofore ally'd with Francis) unto his Service, and that the Children of Francis might have some more liberty, and the French detain'd in Villalpando a less straight Prison; which also was granted her by the Emperor.

July 28. Aug. 12. Sandoz. For the Emperor taking his opportunity (while the Treaty betwixt the Ladies was in agitation) departed from Barcelona the 28th of July, 1529. and arriv'd at Genoa the 12th of August after, with a Royal Train, and about eight thousand Soldiers. And here (as Sandoz observes) began the wearing of short Hair, (the Emperor cutting off his as a Vow for his Passage, or, as others have it, for a Pain in his Head) long Hair having been accusom'd for many Ages before. The Pope, being inform'd of this Voyage of the Emperors, sends some Cardinals to meet him at Genoa, himself in the mean while preparing to attend him at Bononia. While the Emperor having found a reception from the Genoese, temper'd betwixt Love and Fear, did so civilly interpret all to be Respect, that he bid them a kind Farewel, and so held on his way till he came near the Confines of the Pope's Possessions; where three Cardinals (carrying with them the Book of Ceremonies) met him, and, after due Congratulations, made it appear that the ancient Custom of all those who entred upon the Patrimony of the Church, was, to swear first not to offer any Violence to it. The Emperor accepts the Oath, yet so as he said he would not prejudice his own Imperial Right. And because this was near to Piacenza, divers understood his Words to have relation to that place; which, as also Parma, is said to have belong'd anciently to the Duchy of Milan. The Emperor had now a great Army in Italy under the Command of Antonio de Leyva, which was employ'd chiefly against the Venetians, to which it is probable also he would have join'd his own Forces, had not News come to him of the great Mischiefs which Barbarossa, that famous Pyrate, did on the Seas; and of the Turks entry into Hungary with two hundred and fifty thousand Men. For as this startled the Emperor from his Designs in Italy, so he consider'd as well how useful the Pope would be in disposing other Princes to join against this formidable Army. For which reasons, as also for making his Coronation more glorious, he resolv'd to protest against all other Enterprizes, and apply himself wholly to that War. And the rather, because the Turk had lately undertaken the protection of John Sepuse, Pretender to the Kingdom of Hungary, and now laid siege to Vienna, and endanger'd therein the ancient Patrimony of the House of Austria: Besides, the Protestants in Germany having about this time made some high Demands, he thought it his part to correct or suppress them. Only he judg'd it necessary not to give any publick demonstration thereof, until the Affairs of Italy were compos'd. Therefore, he first makes a Peace with the Venetians, upon condition they should restore the Places with-held in Naples from him, and give back to the Pope likewise the Possessions of the Church. Moreover, that they should pay him a great Sum of Money towards his Charges. Which Articles the Venetians (as being in effect abandon'd of all their Confederates) gladly accepted, only, when the Duke of Urbino (their General) might be comprehended therein. Which also was accorded. They, together with the Pope, interceded likewise for Francisco Sforza, desiring he might be restor'd to his former Estate. The Emperor also, considering that he could make no secure Peace in Italy, unless he remov'd all just Causes of Jealousy, begins to think how he might gratify Sforza herein, upon a proposition of a Marriage to be made between him, and Christiern, younger Daughter of the King of Denmark, and Isabel, Sister to the Emperor; which yet because of her Unripeness for Marriage (being then but ten Years old) took no effect till 1534. So that when the business of Florence might have been ended, all Italy now seem'd compos'd to Quietness. These things thus settled, the Emperor enter'd Bononia about the beginning of November, with more Glory, doubtless, in that he was inform'd how the Turk had rais'd his Siege from Vienna about twenty Days before: From whence after a Months Siege, he was forc'd to retire by the Valour of an old German Garrison, commanded by Philip Count Palatine, having done nothing notable, but crown'd with his own hand, at Buda, John Sepuse King of Hungary. His reception also was magnificent, while the Youth of that City having apparell'd themselves in a Livery, attended his Horse like Lacquais, that they might have the better pretence to be near him. After whom followed his Army, some choice Persons whereof carried Antonio de Leyva on their Shoulders; (though whether in regard of his ancient Infirmary of the Gout, or otherwise, for more ostentation, is not certain.) In which Equipage he went to the Church of St. Petronio, at the Gate whereof the Pope, having rais'd a high Throne upon a Scaffold, and placed himself on the Top, with his Tiara or Triple-Crown on his Head, and, for the rest, attended with a great Train of Cardinals, did in that posture expect him. The Empe-1529. Emperor alighting here from his Horse, ascended the Steps, and humbled himself to a Kiss of the Pope's Foot, which the Pope presently diverted to a Pax or Kiss on the Cheek. Which Ceremony as it attracted all Men's Eyes, so was it the more considerable unto the Spectators, for that the Conjunction of those two great Lights (as they termed it) could not but portend some strange effect to Christendom. Charles was then about twenty nine, that is to say, in the prime Age to temper his Countenance betwixt Loveliness and Majesty; though nothing yet in his Face was so remarkable as his great nether-lip: Which Sandoval will have to be peculiarly deriv'd to that Family (even to this day) from the House of Burgundy. The Pope, though gray, retain'd yet much Vigor in his Eyes, though observed for nothing so much as his Beard, which not only he, but also all the Cardinals, as our Agent Ric. Crook hath it, wore at a great length; besides, he said, many of them had their Robes or Vestures of a Violet Colour, instead of Scarlet, appearing, for the rest, (as the same Crook relates) in their Fashions somewhat Soldier-like. This Interview being past, not without a serious Protestation of the Emperor's, that he would strive to reduce the Affairs of Religion into better terms, they both lodg'd in the same House, for the more convenience of that private Conference, which often past betwixt them: Which also continued for some Months before they departed. Wherefore though it were thought that the Emperor would make his Advantage, as having the Pope in his Power and Custody; yet the Pope and Venetians so manag'd the business, as, joyning Offices together (as is abovesaid) they obtain'd that Francisco Sforza should be admitted to the Emperors Presence, and in sequence thereof not only pardon'd, but restor'd to the Duchy of Milan. Which act of the Emperors, as it was magnanimous beyond expectation, so was it no less opportune; both as it quieted not the Estates alone, but even minds of the Italians; and, as he dispos'd them thereby to give them their best assistance towards his great affairs in Germany. Besides, he excludes Francis from hope of attempting that Duchy, unless he would declare himself an open disturber of the Peace of Italy. He did not omit yet, to Capitulate with Sforza, that the Marquis de Guasto, and Antonio de Leyva should have certain Lands assign'd them out of the Duchy, and that he might put Garrisons into some of the most important places thereof, till Conditions were perform'd. Shortly after which a kind of universal League, under pretence of the good of Christendom, was by the Popes means concluded, (place being left for those that would enter into it) which also was publish'd the first of Jan. 1530. in the Church of St. Petronio. And thus the Emperor proceeded to his Coronation in Bononia, whither the Crown of Iron (which should be receiv'd at Milan) being brought, and after put on in the Popes Chappel; the other, of Gold, was set on his Head, Feb. 24. (which was his Birth-day) by the Pope in the great Church, with many Ceremonies. Among which I find none more notable, than that the Emperor, by ancient Custom, must first put on the Habit of a Canon of Sancta Maria dellatorre in Rome, and after that of a Deacon, before they can be compleatly invested in this Imperial Dignity, the Pope the mean while saying Mass, both in Latine and in Greek. The Rites whereof appear'd so much more new and strange, that since the time of Frederick 1442. no Emperor had been publicly Crown'd. This being done, Francisco Sforza was restor'd to an actual possession of his Estate.

The Emperor placing only a Commander in the Fortrefs or Cittadel of Milan, and another in Como, and causing the City of Monzo with vast possessions to be given Antonio de Leyva. Having thus settled Lombardy, he commandeth his Army to march against the Florentines, whom the Pope passionately desir'd to chastise for the many Injuries his Name and Family had lately receiv'd from them.

All which signs of Amity and Correspondence being advertis'd to our King, by Crook, and other his Agents in Italy, it was easie to imagine what hope of favour he might expect from the Pope in his important Business; yet, lest he should omit any thing which might serve for Justification of his Honour and Dignity in a lawful way, he sent to the most famous Universities of Italy, and else-where, to have their Opinions concerning the Divorce. Not offering any way to prevail himself either of his own power among his Clergy, or of the Counsel the Pope had formerly given him, till he had first discover'd what the learnedst Men in Christendom held in that Point. He also writ Letters with his own hand to the Bishop of Worcester, and Sir Gregory Casalis, (then with the Pope) to tell them, that he had sent Sir Thomas Bolen, (newly created) Earl of Wiltshire and Ormond, with John Stokesley, elect Bishop of London, and Edward Lee, as his Ambassadors to the Emperor, and that they should advise together what was to be done. These coming to Bononia, after some passages with the Emperor, who told them he could not desert his Aunts Cause, repair'd to the Pope; to whom, having propos'd the Kings affair, they receiv'd this Answer from him; That, though he was urg'd by the Queens Solicitor to proceed against the King, yet he desir'd rather that all proceeding should be suspended in the Roman Court, upon condition yet that King Henry, on the other side, would promise, not to innovate any thing in the mean while in England. Whereof information being given our King, he answer'd, That his Holiness hath fed him hitherto with fair words only, without intent to aid him, as appear'd lately by denying his Ambassadors Audience to justifie his Cause.

In the mean while our King attends his Parliament business, where Sir Thomas More, who was now return'd from the Treaty at Cambray, being (in reward of his Service) made Lord Chancellor, gave in an eloquent Oration, at the Parliament-Chamber in Black-Friers, the first overtures of the Kings intentions in that Parliament. To which, our King attended with his Nobles, repair'd from his adjoining Palace of Bridewel, Thomas Audley being chosen Speaker for the lower House. And as now Luthers Doctrine was secretly admitted into many places of this Kingdom, with much approbation, so it gave those impressions, as even the most ignorant began to examine whether the Errors then ordinarily controverted, did belong to the Doctrine or to the Government of the Church. And this alone as it was the first step, so was it a great and bold fall towards that Reformation which follow'd afterwards. Yet as Learning was not then commonly found among those, who in their studies had no other design but Truth, and satisfying their Conscience; so few understood the state of the Questions propos'd, save only they, who being of the Party, either for their own private interest would not retract, or for fear of unsettling the receiv'd grounds of Religion in Mens Hearts, thought it dangerous to permit an Innovation; which yet prov'd a pernicious and fatal Solecism. For whereas, in the beginning, a voluntary Mitigation of the rigour of some of the late Doctrines of the Roman Church, and 1529. and a benign Interpretation of the rest, might have conserv'd an universal Peace among Christians, they now, by an obstinate and wilful impugning of all those who said it was possible for them to err, did leave the undertaking of this great Work either to discontented Clergymen, or to the more Laick and improvident sort; which therefore as it prov'd in some kind, tumultuous and refractory, so certainly the Authors on either side were much to be blam'd; when in handling of Controversies, they either out of affectation of Glory, or hope of gaining large Stipends from their Followers (upon pretence of revealing some new or readier way for obtaining Heaven and everlasting Salvation) did teach divers peremptory, and uncharitable Doctrines. Whereas yet, according to the Rules both of Piety and Wisdom, they should have proceeded more moderately; conserving, in the midst of their Differences, a Brotherly Love, and pronouncing the Errors, on what part soever, more worthy pity than hate. Which Rule yet was so little observ'd in England, that many Reformers Books, and Persons were publicly burnt, while their Disciples (for Revenge) fell foul upon the persons of their Adversaries, setting forth Books to the prejudice of the whole Ecclesiastical Order. Which coming at last to the Kings knowledge, made him enquire further into the abuses of the Clergy, permitting the Redress thereof to the lower House of Parliament; where complaint for Exactions for Probats of Testaments and Mortuaries, of Pluralities, Nonresidence, and Priests that were Farmers of Lands, &c. being made, the Spirituality was much offended, and especially John Fisher Bishop of Rochester, who (as our History hath it) in a passionate Speech told the Lords, That the Commons would do nothing now but down with the Church. Saying further, that all this was for want of Faith; aggravating the danger the Kingdom was in, by the example of Bohemia. The Lower-House being inform'd thereof, sent the King a Complaint by their Speaker; desiring Reparation. But Fisher excusing himself as he could, Sir William Fitz-Williams on the part of the King, mediated the rest. Notwithstanding which, the Injury which the Commons thought they had receiv'd herein was not so digested, but that one who had made use of the Evangelicks Doctrine so far, as to take a reasonable liberty to judge of the present times, and howsoever was offended that the Bishop rejected all on want of Faith, spoke to this effect.

Abuses among the Clergy to be redress'd by the Commons.
Bishop of Rochester inveighs against the proceeding of the Commons.
How represented by them.

If none else but the Bishop of Rochester or his Adherents, did hold this Language, it would less trouble me. But since so many religious and different Sects (now conspicuous in the whole World) do not only vindicate unto themselves the name of the true Church, but labour betwixt Invitations and Threats for nothing more than to make us resign our faith to a simple Obedience; I shall crave leave to propose, what I think fit (in this case) for us Laicks and Secular Persons to do. Not that I will make my Opinion a Rule to others, when any better expedient shall be offer'd; but that I would be glad we considered hereof, as the greatest affair that now or hereafter may concern us.

For if in all human Actions it be hard to find that medium or even temper which may keep us from declining into extremes, it will be much more difficult in Religious Worship; both as the path is suppos'd narrower, and the Precipices more dangerous on every side. And because each Man is created by God a free Citizen of the World, and oblig'd to nothing so much as the inquiry of those means by which he may attain his everlasting Happiness, it will be fit to examine to whose tuition and conduct he commits himself. For, as several Teachers, not only differing in Language,

Habit and Ceremony, (or at least in some of these) but peremptory and opposite in their Doctrines, present themselves, much circumspection must be us'd. Here then taking his Prospect, he shall find these Guides directing him to several ways; whereof the first yet extends no further than to the Laws and Religions of each Mans native Soil or Diocese, without passing those bounds. The second, reaching much further, branches it self into that diversity of Religions and Philosophies, that not only are, but have been extant in former times, until he be able to determine which is best. But in either of these, no little difficulties will occur. For, if each Man ought to be secure of all that is taught at home, without enquiring further, how can he answer his Conscience? When looking abroad, the terrors of everlasting Damnation shall be denounc'd on him, by the several Hierarchies and visible Churches of the World, if he believe any Doctrine but theirs. And that, amongst these again, such able and understanding Persons may be found, as, in all other affairs, will equal his Teachers. Will it be fit that he believe, God hath inspir'd his Church and Religion only, and deserted the rest; when yet Mankind is so much of one off-spring, that it hath not only the same Pater Communis in God, but is come all from the same carnal Ancestors? Shall each Man, without more examination, believe his Priests in what Religion soever, and, when he hath done, call their Doctrine his Faith? On the other side, if he must argue Controversies before he can be satisfied, how much leisure must he obtain? How much Wealth and Substance must he consume? How many Languages must he learn? And how many Authors must he read? How many Ages must he look into? How many Faiths must he examine? How many Expositions must he confer? And how many Contradictions reconcile? How many Countries must he wander into? And how many dangers must he run? Briefly, would not our life on these terms be a perpetual Peregrination? While each Man posted into the others Country, to learn the way to Heaven, without yet that he could say at last, he had known or tried all. What remains then to be done? Must he take all that each Priest upon pretence of Inspiration would teach him, because it might be so? Or may he leave all, because it might be otherwise? Certainly, to embrace all Religions, according to their various and repugnant Rites, Tenents, Traditions, and Faiths, is impossible, when yet in one Age it were possible (after incredible Pains and Expences) to learn out, and number them. On the other side, to reject all Religions indifferently is as impious; there being no Nation, that in some kind or other doth not worship God. So that there will be a necessity to distinguish. Not yet that any Man will be able, upon Comparison, to discern which is the perfectest, among the many profess'd in the whole World; (each of them being of that large extent, that no Mans understanding will serve to comprehend it in its uttermost Latitude, and Signification,) but (at least) that every Man might vindicate and sever, in his particular Religion, the more essential and demonstrative Parts, from the rest, without being mov'd so much at the Threats and Promises of any other Religion, that would make him obnoxious, as to depart from this way: There being no ordinary method so intelligible, ready, and compendious for the conducting each Man to his desir'd end. Having thus therefore recollected himself, and together implor'd the assistance of that Supreme God, whom all Nations acknowledge; He must labour, in the next place, to find out, what inward Means his Providence hath deliver'd, to discern the True, not only from the False, but even from the Likely, and Possible; each of them requiring a peculiar Scrutiny and Consideration. Neither shall he fly thus to particular Reason, which may soon lead him to Heresie, but, after a due separation of the more doubtful and controverted Parts, should hold himself to Common, Authentick, and universal Truths, and consequently inform himself, 1529. what, in the several Articles propos'd to him, is so taught, as it is first written in the Heart, and together deliver'd in all the Laws and Religions he can hear of in the whole World; for this certainly can never deceive him; since therein he shall find out how for the impressions of Gods Wisdom and Goodness are extant in all Mankind, and to what degrees his universal Providence hath dilated it self; While thus ascending to God by the same steps he descends to us, he cannot fail to encounter the Divine Majesty. Neither ought it to trouble him, if he find these truths variously complicated with Difficulties or Errors; since, without insisting on more points than what are clearly agreed on every side, it will be his part to reduce them into Method and Order; which also is not hard, they being but few, and apt for connexion; so that it will concern our several Teachers to imitate us in this Doctrine, before they come to any particular Direction; lest, otherwise, they do like those who would persuade us to renounce Day-light, to study only by their Candle. It will be worth the labour, assuredly, to inquire how far these Universal Notions will guide us, before we commit our selves to any of their abstruse and scholastick Mysteries, or supernatural and private Revelations. Not yet, but that they also may challenge a just place in our Belief, when they are deliver'd upon warrantable Testimony; but that they cannot be understood as so indifferent and unfallible Principles for the instruction of all Mankind. Thus, among many suppos'd inferior and questionable Deities, worshipp'd in the four quarters of the World, we shall find one Chief so taught us, as above others to be highly Reverenced.

Among many Rites, Ceremonies, and Volumes, &c. deliver'd us as Instruments or Parts of his Worship, he shall find vertue so eminent, as it alone concludes and sums up the rest. Inasmuch as there is no Sacrament which is not finally resolv'd into it; good Life, Charity, Faith in, and love of God, being such necessary and essential parts of Religion, that all the rest are finally clos'd, and determin'd in them.

Among the many Expiations, Lustrations, and Propitiations for our Sins, taught in the several quarters of the World, in sundry times, we shall find that none doth avail without hearty sorrow for our Sins, and a true Repentance towards God, whom we have offended.

And lastly amidst the divers places and manners of Reward and Punishment, which former Ages have deliver'd, we shall find Gods Justice and Mercy not so limited, but that he can extend either of them even beyond Death, and consequently Recompense or Chastise Eternally. These therefore, as universal and undoubted Truths, should in my opinion be first receiv'd. They will at least keep us from Impiety and Atheism, and together lay a foundation for Gods Service, and the hope of a better Life. Besides, it will reduce Men's minds from uncertain, and controverted Points, to a solid practice of Vertue, or when we fall from it, to an unfeigned Repentance, and purpose through Gods grace to amend our sinful Life, without making Pardon so easie, cheap or mercenary, as some of them do. Lastly, it will dispose us to a general Concord and Peace: For when we are agreed concerning these eternal causes and means of our Salvation, why should we so much differ for the rest? Since as these Principles excluded nothing of Faith, or Tradition that tends to Gods Glory, in what age or manner soever it interven'd; each Nation may be permitted the belief of any pious Miracle that conduceth to Gods Glory; without that, on this occasion, we need to scandalize or offend each other. The common truths in Religion, formerly mention'd, being firmer bonds of Unity, than that any thing emergent out of Traditions (whether written or unwritten) should dissolve them. Let us therefore establish and fix these Catholick or Universal Notions.

1529. They will not hinder us to believe whatsoever else is faithfully taught upon the authority of the Church. So that whether the Eastern, Western, Northern, or Southern Teachers, &c. and particularly whether my Lord of Rochester, Luther, Eccius, Zuinglius, Erasmus, Melancthon, &c. be in the Right, we Laicks may so build upon those Catholick and infallible grounds of Religion, as whatsoever superstructures of Faith be rais'd, those Foundations yet may support them.

But as few Men are of the same mind in all points of Religion, so it is probable this Overture was entertain'd diversly: Some wishing a Reformation upon what terms soever; others, if it could be safely done, as thinking there may be diseases in Religion, like that of the Cancer Oculi, which Physicians say, it is more safe to let alone, than to Cure. Yet as it was manifest that in Probats of Testaments, Plurality of Benefices, and divers other ways above-mention'd, the Clergy had incroach'd and usurp'd both upon each other, and upon the Laity for many Ages, so they would now omit no longer to give a redress to these grosser faults. Therefore about last Wills and Testaments, which Cardinal Woolsey's Legantine Power had so disordred (as Sir Henry Guilford protested openly, that himself being, with others, Executors of the Will of Sir William Compton (who died 1528. of the Sweating Sickness) could not obtain a Probat from the Cardinal, and Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, before he had paid a 1000 Marks) some profitable orders were made. And the business of Mortuaries (exact'd with much extremity even on the poorest) was settled. Moreover Spiritual Persons were abridg'd from taking of Farms, and from Plurality of Livings, unless they were qualified either by certain University Degrees, or by the Nobility, to whom a competent number of Chaplains were assign'd. Non-residence also (then very usual) was forbidden, but in some Cases, and for the rest explain'd, and interpreted. An Act also pass'd for a General Pardon of all Offences, Forfeitures, Punishments, &c. except Murders, and Treasons; which the King granted by way of gratifying his Subjects, for a Release of a great Lone of Money from them, Anno 15. Hen. VIII. which motioned and assented to by the Lords, was, with much ado, confirm'd by the Lower House. After which was enacted a Statute for abridging Plaints in Affize, which being Complicate before, were reduc'd to a more single Method. And this was much to the ease of the Subjects. It was also declar'd Felony for Servants to imbezel their Masters Goods to the value of forty Shillings and upwards. And order taken, that after a Felon was attainted (but not before) the stolen Goods might be restor'd. Furthermore, it was provided particularly, that no Brasse should be carried beyond Sea. Which seems to regard principally making great Ordnance; (about this time appearing of great use.) Artificers Strangers also were restrain'd to certain Rules. As that they might not keep above two Strangers Servants in their House. That they should bear such charges as Natural Subjects did, paying all Subsidies, &c. and take an Oath to be true and obedient to the King and his Laws. That they should have no Conventicles, but meet in the Common Halls of their Craft. That they should not have Journey-men or Prentices Strangers above ten at a time. Moreover, Authority was given to the President of the Kings Council to associate with the Chancellor, Treasurer, and Keeper of the Privy Seal, &c. both for the punishment of Riots, and unlawful Assemblies, &c. and setting of prices of Wines, as also all other Acts, limited and appointed by any Statute to be done by the Chan-

Chancellor, Treasurer, and Keeper of the Privy Seal, &c. Other Laws also were enacted, which for being meerly Legal, and therefore relative chiefly to the Masters of the Law, or otherwise Mechanical, or at least so particular, that they belong not properly to History, I purposely omit. And so, a week before Christmass, the Parliament was prorog'd to the year following.

Before yet I come to the year 1530. I must not omit to mention Haradin Barbarossa that famous Pirate, who, from a low and obscure beginning, had, by his Valour and Conduct (as we have before touch'd) obtain'd the Kingdom of Argier. For being not fortunate alone by Sea, when he landed his Men, he did, with no less Success, attempt divers strong places; so that he was generally fear'd; and the rather, that one Haradin, call'd Caca-diablo, Sinan a Jew, and many other notable Picavens had rang'd themselves under him; whereby his Forces were so increas'd, that no Navigation was secure in the parts adjoining to him. This year (particularly) he had taken Penon de Velez, from the Spaniards, and defeated a Fleet of theirs shortly after. And now his design was to make himself Master of the Seas from Gibraltar to Sicily. For preventing whereof the Emperor employ'd divers, but unfortunately; insomuch that Andrea Doria himself, though recovering some Ships out of the Haven of Sargel, where part of Barbarossa's Sea-forces (under the command of one Haly, a Pirate of Tunis) rode at Anchor; yet when he caus'd some Soldiers to be led to attempt the Cattle, Haly gathering a few resolute Men together, charg'd them desperately, and gave them a repulse with the loss of so many, as made Doria desist from his Enterprize; which being advertis'd to the Emperor, made him resolve to invade Barbarossa in his own Country, the success whereof shall be related hereafter. The context of my History requiring me now to speak of the Florentines; on whom as the Pope passionately desir'd to be reveng'd, so the Emperor, having his preferences also, did for complying with him, send an Army thither under the command of Philibert Prince of Aurange, the Marquis of Guafto, Juan de Urbino, and others of note, and about twenty six thousand Men. The Pope yet us'd distinction; for if he desir'd that the Enemies of his Name and Family with their Adherents should be punish'd, he intreated as well that the City and the Country (whereof he was a Native) should be spar'd. But as the Prince de Aurange thought this a subtilty fitter for a School-man than a Soldier, he undertook them together. While Malatesta Baglioni, a brave Gentleman, associated with Francisco Carduci, and ten others, were chosen the chief Directors of the Florentine Affairs. And by their advice the smaller places of Toscana (for avoiding that final desolation that assaults do bring) yielded themselves betime. Yet so as Juan de Urbino, a Soldier of Note, was kill'd at one of them. And thus siege was laid to the fair City; the Suburbs whereof being weak, were thrown down, that they might the better fortifie their Ramparts, and especial care taken to keep a passage for Victuals open. Yet as the War was thought to proceed out of unkindness rather than hate, so divers of the more innocent sort persuaded the rest to implore the Popes mercy. The reluctance whereof was, that at last an Ambassade was sent. But as by the craft of the adverse Party, election was made of mean and despicable Persons, the design was eluded; the Pope not vouchsafing so much as to hear them. This made them resolve to defend themselves. Insomuch that all their fear being now actuated into desperation, they by continual Sallies (as well by Night as Day) not only wearied the Assiegers, and slew divers of their ablest Commanders, but finally kill'd Philibert Prince of Aurange himself, who being young, valiant, and liberal, was much lamented among the Soldiers. Famine, yet, at last pressing the Florentines, a Parly was propos'd, but the more daring sort (chusing rather to die with their Arms in their hands, than to yield to the Incensed Pope) fallied forth with that tury and disorder, that one would have thought they pretended not so much to Victory, as to some other death than Hunger. The more unquiet sort, being thus at length worn out and spent, the rest, by the means of Malatesta, came to a composition with the Emperor, (the Pope also, out of compassion to his Country, consenting to it) upon these terms; that they should pay 80000 Ducats towards the charge of the Army. That their popular Government should be chang'd to Monarchical, under the Rule and Dominion of Alessandro de Medici (Son of Lorenzo late Duke of Urbino) and his Heirs; their ancient Priviledges being nevertheless reserv'd. And thus, after above ten Months Siege, the City was rendred to the Emperor; who, for more ample testimony of his favour, bestow'd Margarite his natural Daughter upon Alessandro de Medici, together with the title of Duke. I find yet, by a private dispatch, that he was not very well pleas'd with these Articles, as believing he might have made more advantage of his Conquest; though, for contenting the Pope, he gave way to it, as being now intente wholly to the Buiness of Germany. For as the affairs of Religion in those parts, together with the invasion of the Turks, requir'd his Presence, so he departed from Italy, about five Months before the rendition of that place: Making (in his way) the Marquis of Mantua a Duke, and receiving his Brother Ferdinand at Innspruck, with much demonstration of Love. Where also he advis'd concerning the present Estate and Disposition, not of the Affairs only, but even Persons and Favourites of those with whom he was to treat. So that, coming at last to Augsburg, where a general Diet and Assembly was appointed, with much solemnity (the Electors and others, Princes of Germany, meeting there) he requir'd their Grievances. The account whereof yet I must omit a while, that I may come to the restitution of Francis his Children.

The Jewel, Money, and Acquittances requir'd for discharge of his pretious Hostages, being now gotten together, Francis would no longer delay to perform his agreement. Only as he confest himself much enabled hereunto by the special goodness and bounty of our King, so he fail'd not to take his advice on all occasions. And thus, the day being come, Anne de Montmorency, Grand Maistre of France, and Hernando de Velasco Constable de Castilla were chosen by both Princes for the persons to whose fidelity and care they thought fit to commend this important buiness. And because the Cautions and Difficulties were many, they agreed upon certain Articles, the most substantial whereof (besides those extant in the Treaty of Cambray, to which Relation must be had) were these following.

I. That a Bridge or Pontone, of forty foot long, and fifteen broad, should be erected upon Boats fastned with Anchors upon the midst of the River betwixt Fuenterabie and Andaja; whereupon the exchange shall be made.

II. That no Troops of Horse should be within ten Leagues of the place for ten days before, and ten days after the delivery, nor no considerable number of Foot,

III. That at the day of delivery, no Company of Men or Women should be within three Leagues of the Place.

IV. That in Fuentarabie there should be none but the ordinary Garrison, being fifty Men, and that the Canon should be dismounted.

V. That a hundred Horse, and four hundred Foot, (which afterwards was reduc'd to a less number) should be allowed on either side to come to the bank of the River.

VI. That twelve Persons should be admitted on either side to pass over and see these Articles observ'd; and that two Gallies should coast the River, with equal numbers of both Nations, to prevent surprisings.

VII. That the Money should be brought in one Shallop, and the Hostages in another, to the two sides of the Bridge; and that, for Counter-ballancing the Money, so much Iron should be put in the other.

VIII. That in the Shallop of the Hostages should be twelve Spaniards, the Constable, and Seigneur de Praet being comprehended, and Monf. de Brisac a Frenchman, with Swords and Daggers, the Hostages having Daggers only. And that the like Number and Arms should be permitted to Montmorency in the other Shallop. And one Alvaro de Lugo a Spaniard, with two Pages to go along with them in lieu of the Hostages, and twelve Oars on either part unarm'd.

IX. That coming both at the same time to the two sides of the Bridge, the Constable, and Montmorency should land first on the said Bridge, and call to them in equal number their Companies. And that the Spaniards should pass into the Shallop where the Money and Writings and Jewels were, along the one side of a Barrier erected, and the French on the other Shallop of the Hostages.

X. That Queen Leonora should go in a Shallop apart with six Ladies attendants, the rest being eight Cavaliers and six Oars of either Nation, but that she should not pass till the exchange were made. Notwithstanding which Agreement, so much time was employ'd in counting, weighing, and examining the Money, that many weeks preceding were spent before they could accord of the payment. The Spaniard finding the Gold to want of its Purity, and the Deschec or loss being valued at 40000 Crowns. Besides, as the River on the Spanish shoar was shallower than on the French, there wanted not some Jealousie and Wrangling. Howsoever, at length the delivery was made. Whereof Francis being advertis'd, did post from Bourdeaux to Varin, where with much joy he receiv'd his Children, and Queen Leonora de Seres, whom also he married an hour before the day following.

And now Francis remembring how much it concern'd him to correspond with our King (to whom he ow'd first his own, and next his Childrens Liberty) sent over to acquaint him therewith.

Our King also considering that Francis being now dis-ingag'd, might more freely declare himself, did (by a particular Message) not only make known the little hope he had of the Popes favour in his particular business, but desir'd that Kings assistance, for obtaining the resolution of the Universities and Learned Men in his Kingdom concerning the lawfulness of his Marriage; for which purpose he induc'd Guillaume de Bellay (sent by Francis to him in the beginning of this year) to co-operate with them, as also those of Italy and Germany, not omitting together to employ at Paris, his Kinsman and Beneficiary Reginald Pole, with Sir Francis Bryan, and Edward Fox, Master William Paget (after) being sent to Orleans and Tholouse, and Francis together readily promising his assistance. And because our King had many Agents about this time employ'd in Italy, as namely Doctor Richard Croke, (a Man excellent in the Greek Tongue) at Padua; Hierome de Ghinucci Bishop of Worcester, and Gregory Casalis at Rome; Doctor Stokesley at Venice, Thomas Cranmer (afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury) Andreas and Johannes Casalis, and Previor dellus; he had enough to do; while sometimes he labour'd to reconcile, and sometimes again to make use of their various Advertisements. Stokesley writ in a Letter (dated June 13.) that he had gotten the Opinions of the University of Bononia; and that more would have concurr'd, had not the Pope contradicted. Croke said, the Pope and Emperor threatned all that subscrib'd in favour of the Kings Cause. He writes also that the Emperor's Ambassador in Padua, challeng'd one Frier Thomas, for favouring the King's Cause, and told him, if this conclusion should take effect, many of the greatest Princes of Christendom should be disherited, or taken as Illegitimate; accounting in those as well the Emperor, as the King of Portugal. Notwithstanding which, he had gotten eighty principal Mens hands a good while since, and had obtain'd thirty more, which yet by their means were burnt. By a Letter also of Crokes, Aug. 24. It appears, that the Emperor labour'd with the State of Venice, to oppose the King in his demand. Furthermore he protested none would take Money (Lawyers only excepted) for delivering their Opinions, though he forc'd sometimes a small Reward on them when they had done. Which particular Dr. Stokesley (in a Dispatch Sept. 23. 1530.) did confirm; saying, it was their manner both in Padua and Bononia to refuse Money with these words, Quod à Spiritu Sancto gratis accepimus, gratis & libenter impertimur. Moreover Croke, by a Letter, Aug. 31. 1530. said, Cesar minis, precibus, pretio, & sacerdotiis, partim terreat nostros, partim confirmat suos: Certifying our King further, that Andreas Casalis and Previor dellus did reveal his Highness Secrets to the Cesarians: In conclusion I find that many would have given their opinion in favour of the Divorce, if they durst. So that though the Kings Agents did now and then differ in some Points, they all yet agreed that most of the Learned Men in those parts would have favour'd the King in the point of his Divorce, had not the Pope and Emperor oppugned it. Croke adds further, that the Emperor got some hands in Mantua for Money, but they were of the meaner sort. Whereas twenty-nine Doctors in that place had freely subscrib'd on his Highness part. Now as Gregory Casalis seem'd among all his Highness Agents, at this time, the most industrious, so he solicited the Pope continually on our Kings behalf, not neglecting also the Cesarians, to whom he gave, and from whom he receiv'd that Intelligence, as he made advantage of all. By which dangerous and suspected Wildom yet he prevail'd so far, that at length he had Authority, as it seems, to write this following Dispatch, which I have caus'd faithfully to be transcrib'd out of the Original.

Serenissime & Potentissime Domine Rex, Domine mi Supreme, humillima Commendatione premissa, Salutem & Felicitatem. Superioribus diebus, Pontifex secreto, veluti rem quam magni faceret, mihi proposuit conditionem hujusmodi, Concedi posse vestra Majestati ut duas Uxores habeat; Cui dixi, nolle me Provinciam suscipere ea de re scribendi, ob eam causam, quod ignorarem an inde vestra Conscientia satisfieri posset, quam vestra Majestas imprimis exonerare cupit.

C. P. Majestatis Humilissimus Servus, Gregorius Cafalis.

MOST Serene and most Powerful Lord, and my most gracious Sovereign, to whom all Health and Happiness, and the most humble acknowledgments of my Duty and Affection. Some days agoe the Pope in private offer'd to me this Proposal, as a thing of which he made much account, that your Majesty might have a Dispensation to have two Wives; to whom I answer'd, that I was very unwilling to take upon me to write to your Majesty, to know your Majesties pleasure herein, because that I did not know whether this proposal would satisfie your Conscience, the ease and quiet whereof, was what your Majesty does only aim at. The reason why I gave this for Answer, was, that in a certain place, from whence I have information of the Designs and Contrivances of the Cesarians, I have certain intelligence and undoubted knowledge, that this proposal was started, and is promoted by the Cesarians; but what their aim and design herein should be, I dare not certainly affirm, and therefore leave that wholly to your Highnesses great Prudence and Consideration. And though I told his Holiness, that I could not venture to write to your Majesty herein, yet was I unwilling to keep this from your Majesties knowledge, that it may appear, that no Care or Industry is wanting in me to execute your Majesties Commands, or promote your Services. I have done all which I have been able with one of Ancona, with whom I have great intimacy. As to all which I refer to the common Letters. May God preserve your Majesties Health, Rome Sept. 18. 1530.

Your most Excellent Majesties
Most Obedient Servant, Gregory Cafalis.

How this Letter was believ'd or accepted yet, doth not appear to me; so that although Melancthon is said to have concurr'd in some such Opinion, no effect follow'd thereof. For I find, that at this very time, King Henry, jealous of the Queens, or (as our Historians say) of Woolsey's procuring Bulls against him, set forth this Proclamation, September 19.

THE King's Highness streightly Chargeth and Com-mandeth, that no manner of Person of what Estate, Degree, or Condition soever, he or they be of, do purchase or attempt to purchase from the Court of Rome or elsewhere, nor use and put in execution, divulge or publish any thing heretofore within this year passed, purchased, or to be purchased hereafter, containing matter prejudicial to the high Authority, Jurisdiction and Prerogative Royal of this his said Realm, or to the let, hindrance, or impeachment of his Graces noble and virtuous intended purposes in the Premises; upon pain of incurring his Highness Indignation, and Imprisonment, and further Punishment of their Bodies, for their so doing, at his Graces pleasure, to the dreadful Example of all other.

Thus did the King begin to shake off the Romish Yoke; to which he was much animated by the concurrence of his Subjects in Parliament, both Spiritual and Temporal, who (as it appears by our Records) in July this year under their Hands and Seals sent a Declaration to the Pope. The Tenor whereof is this;

July 3.
House of Lords Letter to the Pope.

SANCTISSIMO in Christo Patri & Domino Domino Clementi, divina Providentia, ejus nominis Papæ septimo; Osculatis pedibus omni cum humilitate, felicitatem precamur & optamus perpetuam, in Domino nostro Jesu Christo. Beatissime Pater, tametsi Causa Matrimonii, Inviçitissimi & Serenissimi Principis Domini nostri, Angliæ Franciæque Regis, Fidei Defensoris, & Domini Hiberniæ, multis ipsa per se Argumentis Vestra Sanctitatis opem imploret atque efflagitet, ut illud quam celerime finem accipiat, quem Nos, summo cum desiderio jam diu desideravimus, & longa sed hactenus vana spe à Vestra Sanctitate expectavimus: Non potuimus tamen committere, ut Rebus nostris Regniue statu, ex hac litis Protelatione in tantum discrimen adducto, omnino sileremus, sed quod Regia Majestas nostrum Caput, atque adeo Anima omnium nostrum, & in cujus verbis nos, tanquam Membra conformia, justa compagine Capiti coherencia, multa sollicitudine Vestram Sanctitatem precati, & frustra tamen precati sumus, id nos Literis nostris doloris gravitate adducti seorsim & separatim flagitaremus. Suf-ficere sane alioqui debuisset, Causæ ipsius justitia, eruditissimorum virorum calculis passim probata, celeberrimarum Academiæ suffragiis judicata, ab Anglis, à Gallis, ab Italis, prout quisque apud eos ceteros eruditione antecellit, pronunciata & definita, ut Sanctitas Vestra, etiam nemine petente & reclamantibus quibuscunque, suo Ore suaque Autoritate aliorum Sententias confirmaret; præsertim cum Causæ definitio eum Regem, illud Regnum respiciat, quod de Sede illa Apostolica tam multis nominibus bene meritum sit: Precibus autem nihil opus fuisset, nisi quatenus homines doloribus indulgent, & preces non necessarias interdum effundere solent. Cæterum quum apud Sanctitatem Vestram nec ipsius Causæ Justitia nec Beneficiorum acceptorum recordatio, nec optimi Principis tam assidue & diligentes Preces quicquam profecerint, ut obtineatur à vobis quod paternæ pietatis officium exigebat, adauctus supra modum in nobis miseriarum ac calamitatum recordatione doloris cumulus singula etiam Republicæ nostræ membra vocalia facit, & Verbis & literis conquestionem edere compellit. Nam quæ tandem infelicitas, ut quod duæ Academiæ nostræ, quod Academia Parisiensis, quod multæ aliæ Academiæ in Gallia, quod passim doctissimi, eruditissimi & integerrimi viri domi forisque verum affirmant, & pro vero defendere tam Verbis quam Calamo se paratos ostendunt, id pro vero non obtineat à Sede Apostolica ille Princeps, cujus Ope atque Præ-fidio

1529. fidio sua stat Sedi Apostolicae Autoritas, à tam multis ac Populis etiam potentissimis tam valide impetita, quibus partim Ferro, partim Calamo, partim voce atque autoritate sepius in ea Causa restitit; & tamen solus illius autoritatis beneficio non fruitur, qui curavit ut esset qua alii fruerentur. His quid responderi posset non videmus, & malorum interim pelagus Reipublicae nostrae imminere cernimus, ac certum quoddam diluvium comminari, aut quod diluvio par est, multa caede ac sanguine resinctam olim Successionis controversiam denuo reducere. Habemus enim summis virtutibus Principem, certissimo titulo Regem, indubitatam Regno tranquillitatem daturum, si Sobolem ex corpore Masculum nobis reliquerit; cujus in vero Matrimonio sola spes esse potest: Matrimonio autem vero tantum illud nunc obstat, ut quod de priore Matrimonio tot docti viri pronunciant, id utique Vestra Sanctitas sua Autoritate declaret. Hoc autem si non vult, & qui Pater esse debeat, nos tanquam Orphanos relinquere decrevit, & pro abjectis habere, ita certe interpretabimur, Nobis nobis curam esse relictam, ut aliunde nobis remedia conquiramus. Sed ad hoc ne adigamur, Sanctitatem Vestram oramus ut Regi nostro in tam sanctis desideriis adesse, & sine mora aut dilatione favere velit, vehementer obsecramus, ut iudicio suo comprobet quod viri doctissimi affirmant, per illam quam nobis ex Pastoralis Officio debet Pietatem ex mutuo Cordis Affectu obtestamur, ne claudantur paterna viscera, tam obsequentibus, tam benevolis, tam morigeris Filiis. Causa Regiae Majestatis nostra cujusque propria est, à Capite in Membra derivata, dolor ad omnes, atque injuria ex æquo pertinet, omnes in ejus Majestate compatimur, quibus facile Sanctitas Vestra mederi posset, nec posset modo, sed ex paterna pietate deberet. Quod si vel id non fecerit, vel facere quidem distulerit Sanctitas Vestra, hactenus sane conditio nostra erit miserior, quod tam diu sine fructu frustra laboratum sit, sed non omni prorsus remedio destituta. Sunt quidem Remedia extrema semper duriora, sed Morbum omnino utcumque levare curat agrotus, & in malorum commutatione nonnihil est spei; ut, si minus succedat quod bonum est, sequatur saltem quod est minus malum, & id temporis etiam cursu facile tolerandum. Ista autem ut secum consideret Sanctitas Vestra, iterum atque iterum rogamus, in Domino Jesu Christo, cujus Vices in Terris se gerere profitetur, idque ut nunc factis conetur ostendere; Ut veritatem, doctissimorum hominum vigiliis ac laboribus inventam, probatam & confirmatam, ad Dei Laudem & Gloriam sua Sententia & Pronunciatione velit illustrare. Interim vero Deum Opt. Max. quem ipsam esse veritatem certissimo Testimonio cognoscimus, comprecabimur, ut Vestrae Sanctitatis Consilia ita informare atque dirigere dignetur, ut quod sanctum, justum ac verum est, à Vestrae Sanctitatis Autoritate obtinentes, ab omni alia assequenda Veritatis molestia liberemur.

TO the most holy Lord, our Lord and Father in Christ, Clement, by the Divine Providence the seventh Pope of that Name, we wish and pray for perpetual felicity in our Lord Jesus Christ, with all humility throwing our selves at his feet. Most blessed Father, although the Cause concerning the Marriage of the most Invincible Prince our Sovereign Lord the King of England and France, Defender of the Faith, and Lord of Ireland, does for sundry, great, and weighty Reasons of it self, require and demand your Holinesses Assistance, that it may be brought to that speedy end and determination, which we with so great and earnest desires have wish'd, and with so very great, though very vain expectations have long look'd for from your Holiness: We could not nevertheless prevail with our selves to keep silence herein any longer, especially since our Kingdom and the affairs thereof suffer so much, and are brought into so great danger through the unseasonable delay of Sentence herein: So that since his Majesty our Head, and by consequence the Life of us all, and we in his Words, as Subject Members, by a just Union annexed to the Head, have with great earnestness pray'd your Holiness, but pray'd in vain, we are by the greatness of our grief, forced separately and distinctly by these our Letters, most humbly to intreat your speedy determination hereof. Be justice of the cause it self, approved of by the Opinions of the most Learned Men every where, and determined by the Decrees of the most famous Universities in the World, and esteem'd and judg'd most righteous by all Persons either in England, France or Italy, who are most eminent for their Learning, might so far prevail, as that your Holiness, though no body entreated it, nay, though some oppos'd it, should with your own Voice and Authority, confirm that Sentence which has so universally been pronounced just, especially when your Determination of this Cause is a piece of Justice done to that King and Kingdom, which upon so many several accounts have deserv'd well of the Apostolical See; although entreaties to you herein seem not to be necessary, however we make them, as Persons overborn with troubles, who indulge their grief, and frequently pour forth repeated and unnecessary Prayers. But since your Holiness is not to be prevail'd upon, either by the Justice of the Cause, the remembrance of the good Services you have always found, or by the earnest and continued requests of the best of Princes, to do that which might be expected from your Paternal Love and Affection alone, our grief is by the remembrance of our Miseries and Calamities encreas'd to that immense degree, that it overspreads the whole body of the Realm, and gives a voice of complaint to each Member of it, forcing them both by their Words, and in their Letters, to lay before your Holiness this their insupportable Grievance. For how great a misfortune is it, that what our own two Universities, the University of Paris, as well as many other in France, what almost all Men of Learning, Knowledge and Integrity, both at home and abroad have determin'd and affirm'd to be true, and the truth of which they are ready to defend and support both in their Discourses and Writings; yet cannot a confirmation of this so universally acknowledge a truth, be obtain'd from the holy Apostolical See by that Prince, by whose support and assistance that See still keeps and preserves its Authority, which has been shaken and undermined by so many, and so powerful Adversaries, till he withstood and oppos'd their designs partly by his Sword, partly by his Pen, at other times by his Commands and Authority, supporting that Power and Authority of the Church, from whence others are enabled to obtain those mighty advantages from which he now finds himself only excluded. What answer can be made hereto we see not, and yet we see that from hence a flood of miseries is flowing in upon the Commonwealth, and a sort of Deluge of Calamities overwhelming us, from the disputes about Succession, which will soon overtake us, never to be settled without infinite slaughter and effusion of Blood. We now have a King most eminent for his Virtues, seated upon the Throne of his Ancestors, by right undoubted and unquestionable, who would entail lasting Peace, and uninterrupted tranquillity on his Realms, if he leaves a Son to succeed him from lawful and true Marriage, nor will that be possible, unless your Holiness will by your Authority, pronounce the same Sentence concerning his former Marriage, which so many Learned Men have already deliver'd. But if your Holiness, whom we justly call our Father, shall, by refusing to comply herein, esteem us as Cast-aways, and resolve to leave us Orphans; we can make no other Construction of it, but that the care of our selves is committed to our own Hands, and that we are left to seek our remedy elsewhere. But that we may never be driven to these Extremities, we beg your Holiness without delay, or farther loss of time, to assist these his Majesties most just and reasonable desires, we most earnestly intreat a confirmation of the judgment of these most Learned Men, humbly imploring, that for the sake of that Mutual Love, and that Paternal Affection which your Pastoral Office requires you to shew us, not to shut up your bowels of Pity and Compassion against us, your most Dutiful, most Loving, most Obedient Sons. The Case of his most sacred Majesty, is the Case of us all, since the Head cannot suffer, but the Members must bear a part, the grief arising herefrom, and the injury suffer'd hereby, does equally affect us, who bear our proportion of all his Majesties Afflictions; the remedy of which, as it must proceed wholly from your Holinesses power, so is it a duty necessarily arising from your Paternal Authority and Affection: Which remedy, if your Holiness shall refuse or delay to grant, our Condition will indeed herein be more miserable, that so long we have fruitlessly and in vain sought redress, but it will not be wholly desperate, since it is possible to find relief some other way. Desperate Remedies indeed are not without extremity to be apply'd; but he that is sick, will by any means get rid of his Distemper: in the change of our miseries there is some Comfort, when if we can't obtain perfect relief, yet we may change our condition for that which is less afflicting, and more tolerable. That your Holiness would be pleas'd to take these things into your most serious Consideration, we do again and again

1529. again beseech you, for our Lord Jesus Christ's sake, whose Vicar on Earth you stile your self, and that you would now conform your actions to that Title, by pronouncing your sentence to the glory and praise of God, and thereby giving your Testimony and Sanction to that Truth, which has been examin'd, approv'd, and after much deliberation confirm'd by the most Learned Men of all Nations. In the mean time we will beseech God, whom we infallibly know to be Truth, that he would vouchsafe so to inform and direct your Holinesses Deliberations herein, that having by your Holinesses Authority, a Confirmation of what is Just, Righteous and True, we may therein rest satisfy'd, and be free from the trouble of seeking to attain this end by other means.

CLEMENS Papa VII.

Popes Answer.

Venerabiles Fratres & dilecti Filii, Salutem & Apostolicam Benedictionem. Multa sunt in vestris Literis die xiii. Julii datis ac nobis superioribus diebus redditis, quæ gravius accepissemus, nisi ea affectui, studioque vestro erga Charissimum in Christo Filium nostrum, Regem vestrum condonanda arbitramur. Itaque sedato animo ad eas Literas respondebimus, tantum ut doceamus quam immerito de nobis conquesti sitis, neque oportuisse tantum à vobis tribui privato erga Regem sive officio sive amoris vestro, ut nos duobus, ingrati adversus Serenitatem suam animi ac denegatæ Justitiæ, gravissimis nominibus incusaretis. Nos quidem agnoscimus Regem vestrum ea omnia quæ in vestris Literis enumeratis, ac multa etiam plura promeritum, manebitque perpetuo non modo apud nos sed ad posteros nostros memoria ejus in Sedem Apostolicam meritorum. Fatemurque nos non modo Pontificiæ personæ quam gerimus, sed privato nostro nomine tantum Serenitati suæ debere, ut nunquam beneficiis parem gratiam relaturi videamur. Sed quod attinet ad Controversiam quæ de Matrimonio est inter Serenitatem suam & Catharinam Reginam, tantum abest, ut denegando Justitiam, Regis spem frustrari voluerimus, ut ultro ab altera parte, tanquam plus æquo in partes Majestatis suæ propensi, reprehendamus. Sed, ut paulo altius perpetuum animi nostri erga Regem vestrum Tenorem repetamus: Cum primum, tribus ferme abhinc annis, Regii Oratores ad nos hanc Causam detulissent; animi

1529. nostri propensionem potius quam Juris rigorem secuti, commisimus illam dilectis Filiis nostris Thomæ et Sanctæ Cecilie Eboracensi in Regno Angliæ Legato, & Laurentio et Sanctæ Mariæ in Transiberim Campegio à nostro Latere misso, Presbyteris Cardinalibus, in Regno atque adeo domi ipsius Regis audientiam & terminandam; satisfecimusque tum, quantum in nobis fuit, Serenitatis suæ voluntati. Verum cum Regina suspectum illud in partibus Judicium habere cepisset, & à gravaminibus sibi, ut dicebat, per eosdem Legatos illatis ad Sedem Apostolicam appellasset, Procuratoribus etiam ad dictam appellationem prosequendam constitutis, ne tum quidem considerari passi sumus nostram erga ipsum Regem benevolentiam. Nam tametsi causæ hujusmodi appellationis Commissio negari non poterat, tamen Concordia potius quam via Juris terminari hanc controversiam cupientes, omnes moras in Commissionem dictæ causæ appellationis concedenda interposuimus, eo prætextu, quod esset de majoribus causis, meritoque ad Consistorium rejicienda. Habita vero deinde super hoc cum venerabilibus fratribus nostris S. R. E. Cardinalibus aliquoties consultatione, fuit aliquamdiu dilatum negotium; Sed tandem unanimi omnium Cardinalium voto conclusum est, Commissionem causæ Appellationis hujusmodi per nos negari non posse. Itaque commissa est audienda & subinde in dicto Consistorio nobis referenda & terminanda. Nam cum omnibus in rebus considerate procedere debemus, tum in hac potissimum quæ Regias & illustres personas tangit, & in quam totius Christianitatis oculos conjectas esse videmus. Post quæ deinde nullus Regius legitimus Procurator comparuit, qui aut scripto aut verbo de Juribus Regis doceret; ideoque factum, ut lis adhuc decidi non potuerit. Quippe cum exactis & productis, non ex amore & benevolentia decidenda sit. Quamobrem nulla causa est, cur nobis ascribatis litis quam dicitis protelationem; de qua miramur vos queri, cum illam Oratores ipsius Regis alibi & præsertim Bononiæ à nobis petierint & impetrarint, invitissimis quidem & reclamantibus Reginæ Procuratoribus. Cum itaque nunquam per nos steterit, quin hæc lis, omnibus rebus mature discussis, terminaretur, non videmus quibus rationibus nitatur querimonia vestra; nisi forte id dicitis, tot esse Regis erga nos & Sedem Apostolicam beneficia, ut quoquo modo in ejus voluntatem Causam diffiniri oportuerit; id enim ostenditis satis aperte, cum dicitis, in Causa ab eruditissimis viris Anglis, Gallis, Italis, ac tot Academiarum suffragiis probata, & nemine petente ac reclamantibus quibuscunque Sententiam à nobis ferri debuisse. Qua in re non parum prudentiam & modestiam vestram requirimus. Nam non videmus, quibus rationibus freti postuletis, ut in Causa maximi momenti Sententiam feramus, nemine petente ac cæteris reclamantibus, cum adversa pars continue opponat totius Christianitatis Scandalum, tot annorum matrimonium ad supplicationem Clarissimorum Regum Henrici Patris ac Ferdinandi Catholici, ex Dispensatione hujus Sanctæ Sedis constitutum; præterea Filiam extantem & plures Reginæ partus;

1531. tus; & adversus opiniones Doctorum, quas pro vobis allegatis, multorum & ipsi gravissimorumque virorum judicium, & pro se facientia Divini Juris mandata adducant, Argumentis haustis non modo ex Latinis, sed etiam ex uberrimis in hac re Hebræorum fontibus: Nobis tamen in neutram adhuc partem inclinantibus, sed æquas aures præbentibus, cum Causam hanc gravissimam & ad totam Rempublicam Christianam & posteritatem omnem pertinere existimemus. Nam ex iis quas pro vobis facere Doctorum hominum atque Universitatum Opiniones scribitis, pauca admodum venerunt in manus nostras, nobis non legitime, nec Regis nomine, ab Oratoribus præsentata, illæque nudæ tantum illorum hominum opiniones, nullis adscriptis rationibus cur ita sentiant, nullaque sacrorum Canonum & Scripturæ, quæ tantum spectare debemus, Autoritate subnixæ. Postulare autem, ut, in Regis gratiam, quicquam temere atque inconsiderate statuamus, nec æquum nec vestra Sapientia dignum est. Nam, tametsi multum Serenitati suæ debemus, tamen in judicando pluris facere cogimur Eum, per quem Reges regnant & Principes imperant; & veri Patris officium est prospicere, ne nimia facilitate plus æquo indulgeamus Filiis nostris: irriteremus enim non nostram solum sed Serenitatis suæ Conscientiam immatura Sententia; quæ, non recte prolata, pernicioso universæ Christianitati noceret exemplo. Nam, quod Regno vestro Diluvium impendere dicitis, id multo magis timendum esse arbitraremur, si Sententiam, quæ recta justitiæ via ac ratione ferenda est, præcipitarem, ac, nimio erga Regem vestrum amore proveci, à Justitia atque Officio nostro discederemus; Masculam autem prolem non vos magis optatis quam nos Serenitati suæ; atque utinam tanto Regi similes Filios, ac non Regni tantum, sed & Virtutum Hæredes haberet Christiana Respublica! Sed pro Deo non sumus, ut liberos dare possimus. Quod autem dicitis, nolle nos, Autoritate nostra, secundum veritatem de priori Matrimonio declarare, quod tot docti viri pro ipso Rege pronunciant; vellemus nos quidem omnibus in rebus Serenitati suæ gratificari; posse autem ita debemus, ut non destruamus; destrueremus enim, si quid contra Juris ordinem statueremus, etsi oculis nostris exploratissima res esset. Cæterum, quod est in extremo Literarum vestrarum, Nisi Petitionibus vestris satisfecerimus, vos existimaturos vestri vobis curam esse relictam, atque aliunde remedia conquisituros, nec vestra prudentia nec religione dignum Consilium, ab eoque ut abstinatis, Paterna Charitate vos monemus: Nec tamen ulla Medici culpa esset, si ægrotus, curationis impatiens, quicquam in se statuerit, quod adversaretur salutem. Nos quidem, quæ recte ac sine perniciem dari possunt remedia non denegamus: Quis enim infirmatur, & ego non infirmor? Quis scandalizatur, & ego non uror? Os meum patet ad vos, Filii dilectissimi, & vos ut filios charissimos monemus. Sed nec Regem ipsum, cujus causam agitis, probatum fuisse credimus, ut ita scriberetis: Cognitam enim habemus ac perspectam ejus 1531. probitatem, ut ne ultro quidem oblatum, quod æquum non esset, accepturum fuisse putemus; & tametsi vestrum omnium intercessionem magni facimus, tamen noster erga Serenitatem suam amor non patitur se cujusquam cohortatione precibusque excitari; nec meminimus frustra unquam Serenitatem suam à nobis petiisse, quod cum nostro, & hujus sanctæ Sedis honore concedere possemus; paremque ostendemus perpetuo voluntatem. Denique, quod ad hanc Causam attinet, Nos quidem nullam ejus expeditioni moram interponemus, quin, cum instructa, & partes audita fuerint, terminetur; nobis summopere cupientibus vestrum Regem & ipsam Reginam, nosque ipsos molestissimo hoc negotio liberari. Hoc tantum à Serenitate sua & Devotionibus vestris requirimus, ne plus, ob summa ejusdem Regis beneficia, à nobis exigatis, quam quod sine offensa Dei persolvere possumus: Cum in cæteris omnia à nobis expectare possitis, quæ habitæ Officii ac Personæ quam gerimus & Justitiæ ratione expectari debent. Datum Romæ apud Sanctum Petrum, sub annulo Piscatoris, die xxvij. Septembris MDXXX. Pont' nostri Anno Septimo.

Evangelista.

To our Venerable Brethren the Archbishops and Bishops, and to our beloved Sons the Abbots, Noblemen, Dukes, Marquesses, Earls, Barons, Knights and Doctors assembled together in Parliament in England, CLEMENT VII. Pope.

Venerable Brothers and beloved Sons, Health be to you, and Apostolical Benediction. There are many Expressions in your Letter, bearing date July 13. which we receiv'd some days agoe, which we could not have thought well of, did we not wholly impute them to the great duty and tender affection which you bear to our most dear Son in Christ your King. We shall therefore without taking these things amiss, sedately answer your Letter, that you may thereby learn with how little reason you have complained of us, and that your private Duty and Affection to your King, ought not to extend so far, as to justify your accusing us of two grievous Offences, ingratitude to his Highness, and denial of Justice. We do acknowledge that your King has deserv'd all that your Letter mentions, nay, even much more, that the remembrance of his many Meritorious Actions towards the Apostolical See, will not only live fresh in our Memories, but be transmitted down to late Posterity. We can't but own likewise, that not only with respect to our Office and Character in the Church, but also in our own private Person, we owe so much to his Highnesses Affection, as we shall scarce ever be able sufficiently to recompence. As to what relates to the controversy concerning the Marriage between his Highness and Queen Catherine, we have been so far from disap-

1530. disappointing the King's expectation therein by denying him Justice, that we have even lain under the censure of the other Party, and have been thought partial, and too much inclin'd to favour his Majesties desires herein. But to give a more undeniable proof of our constant affection to your King, it will be necessary to mention what has some time since pass'd: When first, about three years since, his Majesties Ambassadors laid this Cause before us, rather seeking redress herein from our affection and kindness to his Highness, than from the rigorous course of Justice, we committed it to the determination of our beloved Sons, Thomas Archbishop of York our Legate in England, Cardinal Sanctæ Cæcilie, and Laurence Campejus Cardinal Sanctæ Mariæ transtiberim our Legate de Latere, who were both in your Kingdom, and upon the spot to examin into the Matter; whereby, as far as we were able, we satisfied his Highnesses desires. But when the Queen began to suspect them as partial Judges, and on the account of some grievances she had impos'd on her by the said Legates, had appeal'd from them to the Apostolical Tribunal, and had on her part appointed Proctors to prosecute the said Appeal at Rome, even then our great inclination to his Majesties Service was sufficiently evidenced. For although we could not in this Cause deny the Queen a Commission of Appeal, yet seeking rather that this controversy might be finish'd by the agreeable methods of Peace and Concord, than by course of Law, we fram'd several delays in granting our Commission of Appeal in the said Cause, under pretence that this being a Cause of the highest Nature, must therefore be brought before the Consistory. After this we held frequent Consultation with our most venerable Brethren their Eminences the Cardinals, whereby this affair was still farther put off; till at length by the unanimous vote of all the Cardinals it was concluded, that a Commission of Appeal in this Cause could not be refus'd. It was therefore appointed to be examin'd, heard, and in the said Consistory, by us to be finally determin'd. For as in all cases we ought to proceed with the greatest caution, so ought we more especially to do in that which concerns the Majesties of Kings and Queens, on which we see the eyes of all the Christian World plac'd. Since which no lawful Proctor has appear'd on the Kings part, to set forth his Majesties Pretensions either in Writing, or by word of Mouth, from whence it is that this Cause could not yet receive its Determination. Since it must be decided according to what is alledg'd, and by Witnesses prov'd; not according to Favour and Affection. There is therefore no reason why this deferring our sentence of Determination, of which you complain should be ascrib'd to us, and your complaint herein seems to us the more strange, because his Majesties Ambassadors in several places, particularly at Bononia, did request and solicit this delay of Sentence from us, contrary to the inclination and demand of the Queens Proctors herein. Since therefore we have no ways occasion'd these delays, or hindred this Cause from being determin'd after mature Examination, and due consideration of all the Circumstances of it,

1530. we see not on what reasons these your Complaints are ground'd; unless you will venture to say, that the Services which his Majesty has shewn us, and the Apostolical See are such, that the Cause should be determin'd in his favour, without regard had either to Right or Justice; for that must be the meaning of your Words, when you say that Sentence ought to be given by us, though no body entreated it, nay, tho' some oppos'd it in this case, which has been adjudg'd just by all the Learned in England, France and Italy, and by the Decrees of so many Universities: Which words to us seem not to proceed from your usual Prudence and Modesty; since we see not with what reason you can desire, that we should in a Cause of the greatest Moment give Sentence, though none entreated it, nay, tho' some oppos'd it; when on the other side is alledg'd the great Scandal and Offence that all Christians would take, at a Sentence of Divorce from a Marriage which has continu'd so many years, which was contracted by Dispensation from the Holy See, at the request of his most excellent Majesty Henry VII. and the most Catholick King Ferdinand; from whence the Queen has had so many Children born, and still has a Daughter living; contrary to the opinion of several Doctors (which you urge also on your behalf) and those very learned and grave Men, and who confirm their judgment both by the Laws of God, and by Arguments taken not only from the Latins, but likewise deriv'd from the Jewish Law: Notwithstanding all which, we kept our selves unbiass'd, inclin'd to favour neither side, but to hear both, looking on this most extraordinary Cause, not only to concern the whole Christian World, but also to belong to all Posterity. As for the Opinions of Learned Men, and the Decrees of Universities which you mention, few of them have come to our notice, shewn us not in proper form by your Ambassadors, nor in the Name of the King exhibited, and those were but bare Opinions of those Men, alledging no reasons for their Determinations, nor supporting them by any Authority from Scripture, or the Canons, which herein ought only to prevail. Wherefore, to demand that we should rashly, and without due Consideration, determine any thing herein in his Majesties favour, is a thing neither righteous in it self, nor agreeable to your Wisdom. For although we owe much to his Highness, yet in executing Judgment we must necessarily much more regard him, by whom Kings reign, and Princes decree Justice; and further, it is the duty of a good Father, to take care that by over fondness, he do not too much indulge his Children: Besides, we should not only entangle our own, but also his Highnesses Conscience, by such an hasty and inconsiderate Sentence, which if thus unduly given, would by its dangerous example, greatly damage the whole Christian World. As for that deluge of Calamities, which you fear is impending over your Kingdom, sure it were much more to be fear'd, if we should rashly hasten that Sentence which ought calmly to proceed in the strait way of Justice and Reason, thereby violating both our own Duty, and departing from the rules of Justice through too great favour and affection to your King;

1530. King; you cannot with more earnest desires wish his Majesty a Son, than we do, and that not only his Highness, but all Christian Princes had Sons like so great a King, the Inheritors not only of their Realms, but of such Princely Virtues, but we are not in the stead of God, that we can give Children. As to what you say, that we were unwilling to confirm by our Authority, a truth concerning the former Marriage, which by so many Learned Men in the Kingdom is agreed upon; we are truly willing to gratifie his Highness in all things, wherein we are able by our Authority, but then our Ability can't extend to those things which will destroy that Authority, as it would if we should judicially give sentence contrary to the usual Methods and due course of Law in any thing, tho' it might appear never so plain and manifest to us. As for what you mention in the end of your Letter, that unless we grant your request herein, you shall imagine that the care of your selves is remitted into your own Hands, and that you are left at liberty to seek remedy herein elsewhere; this is a Resolution neither worthy of your Prudence, nor becoming your Christianity; and we do therefore of our fatherly love, exhort you to abstain from any such rash Attempt: Tho' it would be no fault of the Physician, if the Patient weary of his Distemper, should rashly and unadvisedly venture upon measures destructive to his Health: We indeed never deny'd you such Remedies as might with safety be given, and with advantage receiv'd; for who is weak, and I am not weak, who is offended, and I burn not? I write not these things to shame you, but as my beloved Sons I warn you. We can't imagine that his Majesty, on whose account you write, can approve your writing in this manner; for we know, and are so fully acquainted with his Honour and Integrity, that we are assur'd he would not accept of any thing that is unjust, although it were offered him; and although your Intercession is in all cases of great power and prevalence with us, yet is our Love and Affection to his Highness such, as to need neither the entreaty nor solicitation of any Persons whatever, to influence or quicken it; and as we never remember that his Highness has ever yet made his request to us, and receiv'd a denial, where it could be granted with safety to our own, and the honour of the Apostolical See, so we shall always shew him the same regard and good will. Lastly, as to the present Cause, we shall give no hindrance or delay to its decision, so that when it is ready for Examination, and all the Circumstances of it have been heard, it shall be brought to a speedy Determination, and final Conclusion; being earnestly desirous to free your King and Queen, and our own selves from this most troublesome Affair. But this we must desire of his Highness, and of your Goodness, that you would not require more from us, by reason of his Majesties great deservings of us, than we can without offending God perform; and then you may assure your selves of all the good Offices which can be expected from us, considering the Person and Office we bear, and the Justice we are indispensably bound to administer. Given at St. Peters, Rome, under the Seal of the Fisherman, Sept. 27. 1530. in the seventh year of our Pontificat.

And now Cardinal Wolsey it seems had used his utmost Skill for recovering of the Kings favour; whereof also some hope was given him in his being permitted to remove to Richmond. But as his Enemies suspected he would make use of this nearness, to obtain access to the King, so they labour'd instantly to send him to the North. Wherein they prevail'd at length, obtaining further, that the Revenues of the Bishoprick of Winchester, and Abbey of St. Albans, as also some other places of his, forfeited by the Premunire, might be applied in part to the Kings Servants; a Pension only out of Winchester, being reserv'd to the Cardinal. The Revenues also of his two Colleges were torn and divided, which griev'd him more than any other Affliction: Infomuch, that he wrote to the King, humbly, as on his Knees, with weeping Eyes, that the College of Oxford might stand, and importun'd Cromwell to this purpose, since they are in a manner, saith he, Opera manuum tuarum. But Cromwell return'd him no comfort herein, saying, the King was determin'd to dissolve them, though whether he meant to restore them again, and fund them in his own Name, he knew not; but wishes him to be content, &c. Howsoever, in the traffick of these and other Lands, as well as Negotiating his Masters business, Cromwell shew'd that Dexterity, which at last won him much Credit, both with the King and his principal Counsellors. And now the Cardinal being commanded to York, had no excuse for retarding his Journey, but want of Means, which also he signified to the King; who thereupon sent him a thousand Mark-pounds, with which and a Train, reduced now to about one hundred and sixty Persons, he set forth, giving by the way much Alms, and not a few other Arguments of Devotion, which also made him gracious with the People, who resorted from all places adjoyning, to him. And thus with slow and unwilling removes, he came to Carwood Castle near York, about the end of Sept. 4. September, 1530. where he prepar'd according to the antient Custom, to be install'd with much Ceremony about a Month after; all access to the Choire, being till then forbidden. But whether the solemnity of this Action was thought by our King to be unreasonable, and misbecoming one in Disgrace; or that otherwise the Cardinal had cast forth some discontented words, which were related again to the King; here certainly began his final Ruine. Which, as his Enemies (at this Distance) did with more Boldness and Advantage procure, so had he less means to repair himself. Infomuch, that without being able to discover or prevent their Machinations, he was forc'd to suffer all that could be either truly or (almost) falsely surmis'd against him. Neither had he other hope, but that the punishments he had already endur'd, might be accepted as an intire satisfaction for all his Offences. And now his Stallation grew near, when the Earl of Northumberland, Warden of the Marches, withone Sir Walter Welsh, Gentleman of the Kings Privy Chamber, came by the Kings command to Carwood to arrest the Cardinal, wherein he us'd that Diligence and Secresie, that he had plac'd his Guards in the Hall, before any escap'd to advertise the Cardinal thereof. Neither did he, at the Earls coming up Stairs, receive him in other terms than those of a Guest, till entering into a private Chamber together, the Earl in a low and troubled voice arrested him of High Treason. The dismayed and pensive Cardinal stay'd a while before he answer'd, but at last recovering his Spirits, demanded the sight of the Earls Commission, protesting that otherwise he would not obey; urging further, that he was a Member

1530. ber of the College of Cardinals at Rome, and so exempt from all Princes Jurisdiction. But while the Earl reply'd, that he might not shew his Commission, Sir Walter Welsh, who had now arrested Doctor Augustine the Cardinals Physician, comes in, and confirms what the Earl had said.
 The Cardinal believing (by this time) that they were in good earnest, yields to Sir Walter Welsh, as the Kings Servant, and not to the Earl; to whom he said he would not submit himself, before he was better satisfied of his Authority. Which whether he did out of stubbornness to the Earl, who had been heretofore educated in his House, or out of despight to Mistris Anne Bolen, who (he might conceive) had put this affront upon him, in finding means to employ her ancient Tutor to take revenge in both their Names, doth not appear to me by my Author. Howsoever, he protested he was no way faulty in his Allegiance.
 Doctor Augustine (whose Offence yet doth not appear to me) was dispatch'd to London, in the posture of a Traitor, his Legs tied to his Horse.
 But the Cardinal had some Respite; though yet commanded to prepare for his Journey; which he began at length in that deliberate manner, that if he remov'd slowly before from the King, he mov'd now more slowly to him. Infomuch that had not the Earl of Shrewsbury, to whom (being the Steward of the Kings Household) the Earl of Northumberland was commanded to deliver him, till the Kings further pleasure were known, told him, that the King commanded he should be us'd kindly, as one whom he highly favour'd; it is probable, that the afflicted Cardinal would have fallen under the burthen of his own Griefs. Furthermore, the Earl assur'd him on the Kings part, that, though his Highness could do no less than put him to his Trial, yet that it was more for the satisfying of some Persons, than out of mistrust of his Traiterous doings. And thus at Sheffield Castle, he staid a Fortnight, when a Wind-Colick, which ended in a Dysentery, took him. In which state, Sir William Kingston, Captain of the Kings Guard, and Constable of the Tower, attended with twenty-four Yeomen of the Guard (all of them formerly Servants to the Cardinal) did find him. So that, notwithstanding the many Incouragements of the Earl, seconded by Sir William Kingston (who on his Knees saluted him) the Cardinal remain'd still sick and comfortless. Neither did it avail him, that Sir William Kingston (on the Kings part) gave him many gracious words, adding furthermore, that he should make no more hast than stood with his Health and Convenience. For the Cardinal became still more and more dejected. Notwithstanding, as he consider'd that delay would but argue Guiltiness, so he proceeded in his Journey the best he could, till he came to Leicester Abbey, where a Feaver, complicate with his former Disease, seizing on him, he languish'd, not without manifest signs of his End. Being thus upon his Bed, Sir William Kingston came again to comfort him, but the Cardinal, finding now that Death would discharge him of all Trials, but that before God, spake to this effect:

His last Speech.
 Cavend.

Had I serv'd God as diligently as I have done the King, he would not have given me over in my gray Hairs; but this is my just Reward. Notwithstanding, I pray ye commend me most humbly to the King, desiring him to call to remembrance all matters that have past betwixt us, and specially about Queen Katharine, and then shall his Grace know whether I have offended him. He is a Prince of Royal Courage; but rather than he will want or miss any part of his Will or Pleasure, he will endamage the loss of one half of his Realm. For, I assure you, I have often kneeled 1530. before him, sometimes the space of three hours, to persuade him from his Will and Appetite, but could never dissuade him from it. Therefore Master Kingston, I warn you, if ever you be of his Council (as for your Wisdom you are meet) that ye be well assur'd and advis'd what you put in his Head, for you shall never put it out again. After which words (as Cavendish hath them) he began an Exhortation to take heed of the Lutherans, by the example of those of Bohemia, lest they should likewise subvert the Secular Power. But as in the prosecuting of this discourse his Speech fail'd him, so did his Breath presently after, infomuch that he died, and was buried there in the Abby Church, Nov. 30. before day. And not, where he had begun a Monument for himself, long since, (wherein as appears by our Records, he had not omitted his own Image) which one Benedetto, a Statuary of Florence, took in hand 1524. and continued till 1529. receiving for so much as was already done 4250 Ducats. The design whereof was so glorious, that it exceeded far that of Henry VII. Nevertheless, I find the Cardinal, when this was fi-nish'd, did purpose to make a Tomb for Henry VIII, but dying in this manner, King Henry made use of so much as he found fit, and call'd it his. Thus did the Tomb of the Cardinal partake the same fortune with his College, as being assum'd by the King; both which yet remain still imperfect. The news of the Cardinal's Death being brought to our King, did so much afflict him, that he wish'd it had cost him twenty thousand pounds upon condition he had liv'd. Howbeit he omitted not to enquire of about one thousand and five hundred Pounds, which the Cardinal had lately got, without that the King could imagine how. So that, till it appear'd he borrow'd it of divers Persons, he might perchance suspect it to be the remainder of some of his ancient Acquisitions.

And thus concluded that great Cardinal. A Man in whom Ability of Parts, and Industry were equally eminent, though, for being employ'd wholly in ambitious ways, they became dangerous instruments of Power in active and mutable times. By these Arts yet he found means to govern not only the chief affairs of this Kingdom, but of Europe; there being no Potentate, which, in his turn, did not seek to him; and as this procur'd him divers Pensions, so, when he acquainted the King therewith, his manner was, so cunningly to disoblige that Prince who did see him last, as he made way thereby oftentimes to receive as much on the other side. But not of Secular Princes alone, but even of the Pope and Clergy of Rome he was no little courted; of which therefore he made especial use, while he drew them to second him on most occasions. His Birth being otherwise so obscure and mean, as no Man had ever stood so single:
 for which reason also, his chief endeavour was not to displease any great Person, which yet could not secure him against the divers Pretenders of that time. For as all things pass'd through his hands, so they who fail'd in their Suits generally hated him, all which, though it did but exasperate his ill Nature, yet this good Reful-tance follow'd, that it made him take the more care to be Just; whereof also he obtain'd the Reputation in his publick hearing of Causes.
 For as he lov'd no body, so his Reason carried him. And thus he was an useful Minister of his King, in all Points, where there was no question of diserving the Roman Church; of which (at what price soever) I find he was a zealous Servant; as hoping thereby to aspire to the Papacy, whereof (as the factious times then were) he seem'd more capable than any, had he not

1530. so immoderately affected it. Whereby also it was not hard to judge of his Inclinations. That Prince, who was ablest to help him to this Dignity, being ever prefer'd by him, which therefore was the ordinary Bait by which the Emperor and French King one after the other, did catch him. And, upon these terms, he doubted not to convey vast Treasures out of this Kingdom, especially unto Rome, where he had not a few Cardinals at his Devotion. By whose help, though he could not obtain that Supreme Dignity he so passionately desir'd, yet he prevail'd himself so much of their favour, as he got a kind of absolute Power in Spiritual matters at home. Wherewith again he so serv'd the Kings turn, as it made him think the less of using his own Authority. One error seem'd common to both, which was that such a multiplicity of Offices and Places were invested in him. For as it drew much envy upon the Cardinal in particular, so it derogated no little from the Regal Authority, while one Man alone seem'd to exhaust all. Since it becometh Princes to do like good Husbandmen when they sow their Grounds, which is, to scatter, and not to throw all in one place. He was no great Dissembler, for so qualified a Person; as ordering his businesses for the most part so cautiously, as he got more by keeping his word than by breaking it. As for his Learning, (which was far from exact) it consisted chiefly in the Subtilties of the Thomists, wherewith the King and himself did more often weary than satishe each other. His Style in Mis-sives was rather copious than eloquent, yet ever tending to the Point. Briefly, if it be true (as Polydore observes) that no Man ever did rise with fewer Virtues, it is as true, that few that ever fell from so high a place had lesser Crimes objected against him. Though yet Polydore (for being at his first coming into England committed to Prison by him, as we have said) may be suspected as a partial Author. So that in all probability he might have subsisted longer, when either his Pride and immense Wealth had not made him obnoxious, and suspected to the King, or that other than Women had oppos'd him: Who as they are vigilant and close Enemies, so for the most part, they carry their businesses in that manner, they leave fewer Advantages against themselves, than Men do. In conclusion, as I cannot assent to those who thought him happy for enjoying the untimely Compassion of the People a little before his End, so I cannot but account it a principal Felicity, that during his favour with the King, all things succeeded better than afterwards, though yet it may be doubted whether the Impressions he gave, did not occasion divers Irregularities which were observ'd to follow.

General Diet at Augsburgh.
April 8.
Sleid. l. 7.

I will return now a while to the business of the Emperor at Augsburg, where (by his Command) the General Diet was appointed the eighth of April, 1530. Cardinal Campejus being employ'd for these Businesses on the Popes behalf. The Emperor coming thither in the beginning of June, the first Point resolv'd, was, that until Controversies in Religion were settled, all the Preachers on both sides (some moderate Persons to be nominated by the Emperor only excepted) should be silenc'd: Which being done, the Emperor declares, that the Causes of calling together the Assembly were, First, the Invasion of the Turk. Secondly, the Affairs of Religion; demanding their Advice and Help in both; which that they might perform with less confusion, he commanded their several Propositions to be put in Writing and read. Whereupon, the Reform'd Princes made instance, that matters of Religion might be first compos'd, promising afterwards to proceed unto the rest. Not long after which, Campejus in a Latin Oration, exhorted them to obey the Emperor herein; adding further in the Popes Name, that such Order should be taken as Unity in Religion might be conserv'd, to the end that all might go against the Turk. Which also was spoken in sequence of the Emperors Treaty with the Pope at Bononia, where he endeavour'd nothing more, than to reconcile the Differences then in agitation in Germany. Hereupon, the Duke of Saxony, (with whom Melancthon was,) the Marquiss of Brandenburgh, the Dukes of Lunenburgh, the Landgrave and others, desir'd the Emperor to receive in Writing the Confession of their Faith, (call'd from this Diet, Confessio Augustana) which the Emperor at last granted; admitting afterwards the Confession of Strasburg, Constance, Lindaw, Memmingen, and some other great Towns, who following Zuinglius rather than Luther, differ'd in some Points. Whereupon, advice being taken with Campejus, what was to be done, it was determin'd, that some able Persons of the Romanists should, by way of Confutation, return a written Answer hereunto, accompany'd with a strict Command of the Emperors to obey it. But this again, was mitigated, and the Reasons at last examin'd on both sides. The Resultance whereof (among the more sober) was, that since they agreed on so many Points, their chief labours should be not to make any Schism for the rest; since it could not be deny'd, but some things requir'd Reformation. But the more heady sort, on either side, would not acquiesce so, requiring an absolute assent to their several Opinions; insomuch that they kindled in their Disputations against each other. The Duke of Saxony (particularly) demanding, that the Answer to their Confession might be given to them in Writing, which yet was not suddenly approv'd by the Emperor; though at last finding no other way to avoid Tumult, he granted their Request, on this Condition, that they should not Print or Publish the said Answer. Wherewith some were so discontented, that they return'd home, as thinking it not enough to enjoy their particular Conscience, unless they disputed it abroad, and instructed others. At last, in August, Aug. 6. 1530. seven Persons were appointed on each side, to determine Controversies, of which two should be Persons of Quality, two Lawyers, and three Divines. Whereupon the Romanists took the Bishop of Augsburgh, and Henry Duke of Brunswick, two Lawyers, and Winpinus, Eccius, and Cochleus, Divines. The other side choosing George Duke of Brandenburgh, John Frederick of Saxony, two Lawyers, and Melancthon, Brentius, and Schneepsius, Divines. But these not agreeing sufficiently (though coming somewhat nearer that they are at this present) Melancthon with two Lawyers, and Eccius with two others were permitted to decide the business. But because the Protestants thought they had yielded already, to as much as was possible for them with safety of Conscience, the business was remitted again to a greater number. To which course yet the Protestants would not condescend, but desir'd a course should be taken for preserving of Peace till a General Council were call'd. The Emperor finding things thus protracted, labours to divide the Chiefs, betwixt Threats and Promises, as each was most obnoxious; writing notwithstanding to the Pope (as I find by the Spanish History) that there was no way for ending of differences but by a Council, which therefore he desir'd might be granted, for those reasons which Don Pedro de Cueva should tell him. He omitted

1530. not also to write to the College of Cardinals for this purpose: Adding further, for a Motive, that divers Princes (in which our King also concurr'd) agreed in the same request; as judging it necessary, not only for the cause above-mention'd, but even for the Popes proper Conservation. He required also the dispatches usual for making his Brother Ferdinand King of the Romans. Lastly, he desir'd permission to sell the Ornaments and Goods of the Churches in Italy and Germany, or at least to have the fourth part of the Ecclesiastical Revenues, it being, as he said, for the defence of the Common Faith. Which coming, at last, to the Princes notice, was so suspected, that they oppos'd it. So that, though otherwise they were averse enough from the Roman Church, yet, whether out of the danger they foresaw of putting so much Money into the Emperors hands, or that otherwise they would make themselves necessary, they vehemently impugn'd it. Erasmus understanding now what was doing, writes to Campsius a Monitory Letter, concluding, that as affairs then stood, it was better suffer, than to make War against the Lutherans; supposing perchance, no Peace so devoid of Religion, as a Civil War. The Emperor finding matters thus discompos'd, calls the Princes together, promising that a Council should be call'd, as soon as the place might be agreed; upon Condition they would keep Peace in the mean while, and the Religion antiently profess'd. But the Protestants, affirming that theirs was the antient Religion, thank'd the Emperor for the rest, desiring only the Council might be pious and free. The Emperor not satisfied thus, would needs dispute himself a while (which the Spanish say he did with that eagerness that he drew his Dagger;) but neither this prevail'd. So that, for a Conclusion, instead of making an amicable accord, he publish'd a rigorous Decree; Commanding the practice of the Antient Religion, and Ceremonies, and that the Protestants every where should permit the Romanists the use thereof, denouncing severe punishments to those which obey'd not; Howbeit, he promis'd, within six Months to obtain from the Pope sufficient Authority for calling a Council the year following. In the mean time, that Peace should be kept with all those who subscrib'd to this Decree; who also, and no other, might be admitted to sit as Judges in the Imperial Chamber. The Protestants now considering, that it was impossible to come to an exact decision of the points controverted, and being offended withal that the Emperor denied them a Copy of this Decree, took their leaves somewhat abruptly, and return'd; whereupon the Emperor (intending chiefly the safeguard of Germany against the Turks) commanded the other Princes attendance. From whom he demanded Money, towards the War; which as few denied (to their Powers) so the Agents for the Duke of Saxony, and other Protestants offer'd freely to contribute their Parts, when they might but enjoy Peace, and the exercise of their Religion till the above-mention'd Council was call'd. But the Emperor, not thus contented, insisted still on his Decree; and the rather that the prime Doctors of the Reformed (which were many) could not agree among themselves, concerning the Lords Supper, and some other Articles. The consequence whereof being not difficult to foresee, the Duke of Saxony employ'd Martin Bucer to reconcile them; who also had brought them near to a head. Neither was there other impediment, but that singularity they affected in their several Opinions. Which yet proved to the detriment of Religion. For had they all, who agreed on a Reformation, agreed sufficiently among themselves, it is probable their Doctrine would have been more generally imbrac'd. But as the Romanists took this occasion to brand the Reform'd, so they again regarding more their Reputation (ingag'd to their Auditors in the Pulpit, or publick Writing) than an Unity and Peace of Religion, did by degrees rather violently confirm their own Assertions, than any way retract them. So that Germany now labour'd under the terrors, and difficulties which their several Teachers impos'd on them. In which state of things yet the Reform'd Princes and Cities, for preventing further Inconveniences, agreed together to meet by themselves, or Deputies, at Smalcald, about the end of Decemb. (at the same time that the Emperor having concluded the Diet at Augsburgh (19 Novemb.) had appointed all the Electors to meet at Collen (Decemb. 29.) concerning the choosing a King of the Romans. And here a defensive League being made by the Protestants, they thought fit to signifie it to the Emperor; and together to declare certain objections against the pretended Election. Notwithstanding which, the Emperor proceeds to make his Brother Ferdinand King of the Romans, Jan. 5. 1531. which also being advertis'd to the Confederate Protestants, John Frederick Duke of Saxony manifested the Election imperfect and defective. Not without the advice certainly of Francis; who as he had his designs that way, so he endeavour'd nothing more than to draw a Party to him; giving order, in the mean while, to unite and incorporate Bretaigne to France, upon condition that the eldest Son should always quarter the Arms thereof with those of Dauphine. And in these terms stood the affairs of Germany in the end of 1530. which I have deliver'd with the more particularity, for that the first manifest separation from the Roman Church began here, there being little else material in regard of England that I can find, save that our King (as appears by a Dispatch of the fifteenth of July 1530.) having certified George Duke of Saxony, of his intentions concerning his Divorce, was much comforted and applauded by him. I shall conclude this year with two great Inundations; one of Tiber in Rome, and the other of the Sea in the Low-Countries; which were very damageable; shortly after which follow'd the death of the two great Ladies who made the Treaty of Cambray. Madam Margerite, Aunt to the Emperor, departed first, who having been propos'd in Marriage to our Henry VII. (when she was then about twenty seven years of Age) and afterwards thought of it a little with Charles Brandon, died in the 52 year of her Age, with the Reputation of governing the Low-Countries with much discretion for the space of 23 years. The News whereof being brought the Emperor, made him neglect all his other businesses, to come to the Burial; which being perform'd with much Solemnity, he substituted his Sister Donna Maria, (Widow of the late unfortunate King of Hungary) in her place. Madam Louise, Mother of Francis, died shortly after, (for whom our King kept a solemn Obsequie) a Lady from whom France receiv'd many good, and not a few ill Offices. For if she govern'd wisely, during the Kings Captivity, and again procur'd both his and her Grand-childrens delivery; she was thought also out of some particular despight to Bourbon to have given him the first causes of Discontentment: And to have occasion'd in part the loss of the Dutchy of Milan.

Our King during these great affairs of Christendom, resolving his Parliament should continue, caus'd it to sit again, Jan. 6. 1531. Where these Laws were enacted. That

That, because much Wooll was imploy'd to uses not so beneficial to the Kingdom, and sometimes transported by Strangers, it was Decreed that none should buy Wooll in some principal Shires (to the number of twenty-eight) but those who would make Cloth or Yarn thereof, and that Strangers should not buy any till the Purification of our Lady. But this being a Law that might likewise have its inconveniency, was continu'd only for ten years, as it had been in some former Kings times.

Also a Law was made against Exactions on Apprentices by Masters, Wardens, &c. And this was beneficial for poor Men, who were not able to put their Children to learn Occupations without paying extraordinary Sums. A remedy also was taken for repairing of decay'd Bridges, and Highways, and the manner of raising the Money (which before was uncertain) set down. The carrying over of Horses, Mares, Geldings, also was forbidden upon a penalty to all places but Calais. Moreover, Denisons, notwithstanding their Priviledges, were order'd to pay such Customs as they paid before. For which purpose the Officers and Ministers of Cities and Boroughs, &c. where such Customs, &c. were due, were commanded to set up a Table in some open place, containing the particulars of them. Which Act yet was not extended to the Merchants of the Stiliart (call'd then Theutonici.) Together with which, it was provided, that the Tables touching Scavage to be set up at London, should be first view'd and examin'd by the Chancellor, and Treasurer in England, the President of the Kings Council, the Lord Privy Seal, and Lord Steward, and the two chief Justices; or by four of them at least, and by them subscrib'd. And this was for preventing of the secret exactions of Tolls by Mayors, Sheriffs, &c. upon Wares to be sold within their Precincts. A Law was made also against Egyptians, who under pretence of telling Fortunes, got Money, and Credit among the more ignorant sort. And whereas some Penal Statutes were made heretofore against Strangers who were Handicraftsmen; it was declar'd, that the said Strangers, being Bakers, Brewers, Chirurgeons, and Scriveners were exempted, and not taken to be Handicraftsmen. And, because the abuse of taking Sanctuary, and flying to hallowed places was great about this time, insomuch that many Criminals, finding Refuge and Protection in them, did there abjure the Realm, and so went into foreign Parts, by which means they discover'd the secrets of the State, to the great prejudice thereof. And whereas also, when they were to be tried before the Judges in the Circuits, they would plead they were taken out of some Sanctuary or Hallowed place, and Justice thereby delay'd; divers good orders were taken to remedy these Inconveniencies. Which yet I mention not at large; because they, together with the use of Sanctuaries, were at length wholly antiquated, and abolish'd. And now the business of Premunire, into which the whole Clergy was said to fall by supporting the power Legantine of the Cardinal, having fully been debated by the Kings Council Learned, and resolv'd against them; (whereupon also they were brought to the Kings Bench :) It was agreed in their Convocation-House, to deliver a Petition to the King. Here then the first question was, in what form to make it; the Title of Ecclesie & Cleri Anglicani Protector & Supremum Caput, was by some inserted in the Proem; but this again being demurr'd on, some of the Kings Council, together with Cromwel, came in and persuaded them to approve it; but they being silent, the Archbishop of Canterbury said, Qui tacet Consentire videtur; whereto one answer'd, Itaque tacemus Omnes. But at last this Clause being added, quantum per Christi legem licet, nine Bishops, (whereof John Fisher Bishop of Rochester was one) and fifty-two Abbots and Priors consented thereunto, as also the major part of the Lower-House, and particularly Stephen Gardiner. Being thus agreed on the Proem, they petition'd the King, that he would accept the Sum of one hundred thousand pounds of the Province of Canterbury (eighteen thousand eight hundred forty pounds, being afterwards given by the Province of York) in lieu of all Punishments: They promising, for the future, to make no Constitution, or execute any, without the Kings leave. All which the King graciously accepting, granted them a Pardon for all offences against the Statutes of Provisors, Provisions and Premunire, and all other Penalties, and Forfeitures, except Treason, Murder, and Robbery. But when this Act having pass'd the Lords, came to the Lower-House, the Commons, not knowing how far this might concern them, made some difficulty till themselves were included, which being related to the King, he gave them a check, saying, that was not the way to exempt themselves. Whereupon the Lower-House, becoming sensible of the Kings displeasure, and their own danger, humbled themselves in that sort, that the King granted them a Pardon likewise.

The Clergy falls into a Premunire.

And pay 18840 pounds fine.

I Shall begin the foreign business of this year, 1531. with the Coronation of Ferdinand King of the Romans at Aix, January the 11th, on whom it was thought, the Emperor his Brother did confer this Dignity, that he might the better ease himself from the troubles of Germany, which now appear'd in so many kinds, and places, that his Council in Spain writ a Letter, exhorting him to leave those parts, and return. To which also so conduc'd that Ferdinand had receiv'd the year before, the Crown of Bohemia, so that he was now enabled to sustain the dignity of that Charge; to the which I find also the Duke of Bavaria aspir'd. Howbeit as this was done by the Emperors sole Authority (and without those formalities anciently us'd) it was not every where allow'd for authentical. So that it was thought fit an Imperial Mandate should be sent forth every where in Germany to obey Ferdinand. Together with which the Duke of Saxony, and the Protestants were requir'd to assist in a War against the Turks. For which also all Military preparations were made. But whether the Protestants doubted lest this should be intended against them, or that otherwise they thought all hope of reconciling differences in Religion to be vain, they prepar'd to defend themselves. They would indeed have been glad to see some general and moderate Reformation. But as those they call'd the most erroneous points of the Roman Clergies Faith, prov'd to be their most profitable and commodious Doctrines, the Romanists fighting for them, tantum pro aris & focis, all accord was adjudg'd desperate: Notwithstanding which, neither would they have broken those necessary Bonds of Charity, (which Religion should strengthen) or liv'd under other name than that of Catholick, when the Romanists would have allow'd the ancient Creed to be the Rule of Faith. But when they found that, for reducing divers things to their Primitive Institution, they were call'd Innovators, and that the Roman Church would remit nothing of its Rigor, under pretence that it was inspir'd from above; they not only cast off all hope of Accommodation, but advis'd how to obtain a benign

1531. benign Censure of their actions abroad. Therefore, they sent several Letters to our King and Francis, dated 16th of February, 1531. from Smalcald, reciting what had formerly past at Worms, and Augsburg, betwixt the Emperor and them; saying farther, That the Emperor propos'd to them certain Articles (call'd the Interim) which they should hold till a General Council were summon'd, but that they were such, as they could not with any safety of Conscience admit; concluding with a request, that their good Offices with the Emperor might be interpos'd for the Convocation of a pious and free Council, out of all the parts of the Christian World; which also the Emperor had promis'd. But before the several answers of these Princes were return'd, the Emperor, doubting the consequences of this Assembly, requires again their Assistance against the Turk. To which the Princes reply'd, that before themselves had security given for Peace, it was unreasonable to grant help against others. Which being privately advertis'd to the French King, he left a while his Amourettes, to which he was now much addicted, and studied nothing more than how to make some advantage of the Division. For the present yet he return'd this answer only to the Princes, dated 21 April, 1531. That he desir'd Peace and a General Council, and was glad to understand they inclin'd that way; only that they must take care of choosing a secure and indifferent place, for the Convocation thereof. And for how much he esteem'd them, he said they might gather by this, that during his War with the Emperor, all free Access, and Intercourse was permitted them. Our King also by his Letters, of May the third, writ, that he was glad to understand their Design was to conserve the ancient Religion, and to cure only the Diseases crept into it. Therefore, that they should especially take heed of those who desir'd to innovate, bringing in parity of Degrees and Persons, and making the Magistrate contemptible. Of whom he could not but take notice, some of them having come out of Germany to his Realm; Concluding, that he desir'd a Council, and that he would mediate with the Emperor for them. The Princes thus animated, protest against the Coronation of Ferdinand, as being done in an undue manner, preparing withal to defend themselves. Which being related to the Swiss, made them desire to enter into the Confederacy. But the Duke of Saxony refus'd; alledging, that since they differ'd about the Lords Supper, they could not safely accept their help and friendship, lest ill should happen to them, as to those (ut scriptura testatur) qui muniendi sui causa cujusque modi praesidiis usi sunt. For, as the Scriptures began then commonly to be read, so out of the literal sense thereof, the manner of those times was, promiscuously to draw Arguments, for whatsoever in matter of State or otherwise was to be done. Infomuch, that the text which came nearest the point in question, was taken as a decision of the business; to the no little detriment of their Affairs: The Scriptures not pretending yet to give regular Instructions in those Points. But this is so much less strange, that the year preceding, the Scriptures (heretofore not permitted to the view of the People) were now translated in divers Languages, and into English, by Tindal, Joy, and others, though, as not being warrant-ed by the Kings Authority they were publicly burnt, and a new and better Translation promis'd to be set forth, and allow'd to the People. It being not thought fit by our King, that under what pretence or difficulty soever, his Subjects should be defrauded of that, wherein was to be found the Word of God, and means of their Salvation. Howbeit not a few Inconveniences were observ'd to follow. For as the People did not sufficiently separate the more clear and necessary parts thereof from the obscure and accessory; and as again taking the several Authors to be equally inspir'd, they did equally apply themselves to all; they fell into many dangerous Opinions: Little caring how they liv'd, so they understood well, bringing Religion thus into much Irresolution and Controversie. While few Men agreeing on the same Interpretation of the harder places, vexed each others Conscience, appropriating to themselves the gift of the Spirit. Whereof the Roman Church, (much perplext at first with these Defections) did at last prevail it self; as assuming alone the power of that Decision; which yet was us'd more in favour of themselves, than such an Analogy, as ought to be found in so perfect a Book. So that few were satisfied therewith, but such as, renouncing their own Judgment, and submitting to theirs, yielded themselves wholly to an Implicit Faith; in which, though they found an apparent ease, yet as, for justifying of themselves, the Authority of their Belief, was deriv'd more immediately from the Church, than the Scripture, not a few Difficulties were introduc'd, concerning both: While the more speculative sort could not imagine, how to hold that as an infallible Rule, which needed humane help to vindicate and support it; nevertheless, as by frequent reading of the Scripture at this time, it generally appear'd what the Roman Church had added or alter'd in Religion, so many recover'd a just liberty, endeavouring together a Reformation of the Doctrine and Manners of the Clergy, which yet, through the obstinacy of some, succeeded worse, than so pious Intentions deserv'd.

The former proceedings of King Henry, being advertis'd to the Pope, made him fear a total defection in our King. Infomuch, that at Rome they studied nothing more than how to retain him in his ancient Devotion; some Arguments whereof have been formerly mention'd. To the furthering of which intention also it did not a little conduce, that he had taken some distast against the Emperor; who, being desir'd to appoint certain Judges to determine all differences betwixt him and the Duke of Ferrara, concerning Modena and Reggio, chose such as sentenc'd on the Dukes behalf; which so incens'd the Pope, that he fell off from the Emperor (as will appear hereafter.) For which reason also it is probable, that our King might have clos'd with him, and receiv'd some satisfaction in the affair of the Divorce, had not his Parliament, at this time, as is above-said, concurr'd to the setting up of the Regal Authority in Ecclesiastical Affairs. To whom therefore he thought fit to communicate what his Agents, in Italy and other places, had done, concerning that so much controverted point of the lawfulness of his Marriage. Whereupon, the Parliament yet sitting, the Lord Chancellor, accompanied with Doctor Stokesley Bishop of London, and divers other Lords Spiritual and Temporal, came into the Lower-House 31th. March 1531, and told them; That they could not be ignorant, how the King, having married his Brothers Wife, was troubled in Conscience, and therefore had sent to the most learned Universities in Christendom, to be resolv'd in that Point; and namely had employ'd the Bishop of London there present, for this purpose. Not, yet, but that his own Universities of Oxford and Cambridge could have sufficiently decided the Point, but that he might the more amply satisfy himself and the World. Whereupon Sir Bryan Tuke was commanded to take out, and read the Determinations of the Universities of Paris, Orleans, Angiers, Bourges in Berry, and Tholouse in France, and of Bononia and Padua, in Italy, Nos Johannes Cotisford hujus almae Universitatis Oxoniae Commissarius, auctoritate & consensu hujus totius venerabilis Convocationis, declaramus, decernimus, & definimus, majorem partem omnium Doctorum, Magistrorum, tam Regentium quam non Regentium, singularum facultatum hujus almae Universitatis Oxon. concessisse & consensum pariter & assensum suum praeuisse, quod Determinatio, Definitio & Responsio ad Quaestionem nobis ex parte Serenissimi Domini Regis nuper propositam, per illos Tringinta tres Doctores & Baccalaureos, ad id per facultatem Theologiae nuper electos, sive per majorem partem eorum faciendam, habeatur, censeatur, & reputetur pro Definitione Determinatione & Responsione totius hujus Universitatis; Et quod liceat Dominis Commissario & Procuratoribus Sigillum commune Universitatis literis super praefata determinatione per eosdem concipiendis, apponere.

WE John Cotisford, Commissary of the University of Oxford, by the Authority, and with the consent of the whole Venerable Convocation, do declare, determine and adjudge, that the Major part of all the Doctors, Masters, as well Regents as Non-Regents of all faculties in this famous University, have agreed and given their Consent and Assent, that the Determination, Resolution, and final Answer to the Question lately propounded to us by his most Excellent Majesty the King, which shall be given by the thirty three Doctors and Bachelors in the faculty of Divinity, chosen for that purpose, or by the Major part of them, be esteem'd and accounted the Determination, Resolution and final Answer of this whole University, and therefore that it may be lawful for the Commissary and the Proctors to affix the Common Seal of the University to the Decree, which shall be made in pursuance to their said Determination.

Which Copy though blurr'd (upon what occasion I know not, for it is not probable it should be intended to the King in that manner) was dispatcht the day following, as the Act of the University, by the Bishop of Lincoln. As for the University of Cambridge, I find Stephen Gardiner, and Edward Fox were employ'd; Where, notwithstanding the Kings Letters, and the diligence us'd on their part, not a few difficulties did occur. Inasmuch that it was first deny'd, then the Voices on both sides were brought even, and at last, (some absenting themselves) it was agreed, that the Question should be disputed by twenty eight Delegates, and that two parts of three should determine it; which accordingly was done in favour of the King, by the Vice-Chancellor, and the two Proctors, ten Doctors, and fifteen others, whose Names are extant in the same Record. Which avernes, more than in foreign Universities, whether it should be attributed to the power of the Pope in England, or to their particular scrupulosity of Conscience, is more than I will determine; though, on this occasion, I can do no less, that repeat some Arguments drawn (in favour of the Divorce) out of our Records. First the place in Leviticus, Chap. xviii. Vers. xvi. Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy Brothers Wife. Secondly, St. Basil's Opinion, tending this way, where he saith, that he shall be Excommunicated that Marieth his Wifes Sister. Thirdly, because two Pistoles, transcrib'd out of the Popes Registers, and sent into England, by Doctor Stokesley (whereof one was of Gregory, the other of Innocent the Third) do profess, that the Pope cannot dispence against the Law of God, the particular case being then a Marriage. Fourthly, that granting the Pope can dispence, ex urgentissima causa, with that which is ex jure divino, (which yet Divines for the most part deny) there was no occasion here, since the Peace betwixt England and Spain, (which was taken as the ground of the Breve) stood firm and intire. Lastly, that the Jews themselves (for our Agents consulted with them also) did not hold the Law of Marrying the Brothers Wife, Deut. 25. as necessary in this time, but did often pati discealceationem. All which being maturely consider'd by the Lower-House, made them detest the Marriage, as our Historians have it. Whereupon the King thought fit also to prorogue the Parliament, to the intent that every Man repairing home, might satisfie his Neighbour of these Passages; not omitting, together, to cause these foreign Determinations, to be printed and publish'd this year, as the Book yet extant in Print shews. Notwithstanding which, so far was the King from remitting any thing of his gentle behaviour to the Queen, that had he not forbore to come to her Bed, neither could his outward favour towards her, or her fashions towards him have argued any diminution of Love; all those wonted Ceremonies, by which they sustain'd the dignity of their place, and civilities which might imply a mutual respect, continuing firmly on either side. Which our Historians amplifie so far, that they say he sore lamented his chance, and made no manner of Mirth or Pastime as he was wont to do; without yet that they can be thought to speak improbably, when we consider both how dear this liberty cost him, and how much it endanger'd the Succession. However, that he might both prevail himself of the occasion, and also satisfie the doubts he had rais'd, not in his own alone, but Subjects Breasts; he sent to Queen Katharine some Lords of his Council, wishing them to acquaint her with these Determinations (which also I find had been shewed the Pope,) and together to demand of her, for quieting the Kings Conscience, and ending this business, whether she would rather refer her self to the Judgment of four Spiritual, and four Temporal Lords in this Kingdom, or stand to her Appeal. To which the sad Queen answer'd, That her Father, before he consented to her second Marriage, had taken the advice of Doctors, and Clerks, whose Opinion she believ'd rather than any others; and that, the Pope having confirm'd it, she wondred that any should question it. And, whereas for quieting the Kings Conscience, you would have me put the business to eight Lords; that which I say, is, I pray God send his Grace a quiet Conscience. As for answer to your Message; I pray you tell the King, I am his lawful Wife, and so will abide, till the Court of Rome determine to the contrary. But our King, who alledg'd his Proceedings were according to the Law of God (which therefore he said should be more insisted on, than any other Authority) sent other Messengers, exhorting her still to conform her self; among whom one spake to this effect: Madam, you cannot be ignorant how much you have provok'd the Kings displeasure against you, since his Grace having

Of which therefore his Highness is so sensible, that he hath forbore of late to see your Grace, or receive your Tokens, giving you liberty further, to repair either to his Manner of Oaking, or Estamstead, or the Monastery of Bisham; for, since you were known by his Brother Prince Arthur, you cannot be his lawful Wife. To which the virtuous and sorrowful Queen reply'd little more than this: That to what place soever she remov'd, nothing could remove her from being the Kings Wife.

July 14. And here the King bid her a final farewell: for, from this time, being July the fourteenth, I find not the King ever saw her more.

Our King being now inform'd that Italian, and other foreign Merchants brought Commodities hither, which they sold well, and then return'd the Money by Exchange to their own Country, to the exhausting of the Wealth of this Realm, and the Diminution of his Customs, caus'd a Proclamation to be set forth, that according to a branch of a Statute, Ric. 3. no Money they took here for selling their Ware, should be exchange'd to other Countries, but employ'd in the Commodities of this Realm, which (our Historians say) as long as it was observ'd, prov'd to the great benefit both of the King and Subject. And now, the Money for the Premunire being call'd on, the Clergy, for their ease, would have drawn the Priests of London to Contribution, which they took so ill, that, in outrageous manner, breaking into the Chapter-House of St. Pauls, they did beat the Bishops Servants; till the Bishop, for avoiding more mischief, gave them his Blessing, and leave to depart for the present; though shortly after they were punish'd for their Misbehaviour.

This while, the Emperor (intensive wholly to the affairs of Germany) did more calmly suffer our Kings intended Divorce; and the rather, for that it is probable the Determinations of the Universities above-mentioned had given him, if not Satisfaction, yet colour enough to neglect a while the prosecuting this business. Especially, since at this time he might have so much use of our Kings Assistance against the Turk; of which also hope was given him. On the other side Francis did by all means advance, and set it forward; both in regard himself (as their Historians have it) was much addicted to love-making at this time; and as that he doubted not, hereby, to keep our King at a variance with the Emperor. Against whom the offences and quarrels he had taken being not extinguish'd, he both fortified himself by all means, and labour'd publicly to traduce even his most impartial and generous Actions. Therefore he was so far from admitting the Restitution of Milan to Francisco Sforza to be an Act of Piety, that he took it, if not as an affront to him, yet at least as a politick Introduction of one to that Dignity, who he knew could not be dispossest thereof again, without offending all Italy. So likewise the parting with the Contado of Asti (anciently belonging to the House of Orleans) to the Duke of Savoy, was thought to be no more than interesting him in that quarrel. Furthermore, his retaining an Army in Italy, at the cost of the Confederates, (but under the Command of Antonio de 1531. Leyva) was understood, not for conserving the Peace of Italy, but defending of Genoia against him. All which was so ill taken, that Francis did not only by the entremise of Guillaume de Bellay, treat of entering a private League with the Princes of Germany, for defence of the Rights of the Empire, (violated as he conceiv'd by the undue Election of Ferdinand) but prepar'd to send them Succours when occasion were. Nor did his rancour against the Emperor stay here; but (if we may believe some even of his own Nation) extended it self so far, as secretly, at this time, to encourage the Turk to invade the Patrimony of the House of Austria; to the no little scandal, both of his own Honour, and the Christian Religion. The Emperor, not ignorant of all these Machinations, sends Seigneur de Balançon to Francis, to borrow Money, and to invite him to furnish Land, and Sea-forces for a War against the Turk; alledging Treaties, Promises, and many Arguments to this purpose. To which Francis answer'd. That the Emperor had gotten lately enough from him, two Millions of Gold, which ought to suffice. For the rest, that he was neither Merchant nor Banquer to furnish Money, but a Christian Prince, that would have his part of the Honour and Danger in all brave Actions. Therefore that he would spare no forces out of his Kingdom, nor permit them to go to any place where himself did not lead them. Besides, as this Summer was far spent, he could not send his Cavalry to Austria without much incommodity, (the distance between both Countries being so great.) Therefore, that the Emperor should defend Germany, while himself with an Army of fifty thousand Men, would undertake to defend Italy, which the Turk also menac'd. And for the next year, he would be ready, with the help of his good Brother, the King of England, to go to any place where it should be needful. As for his Shipping, he could least of all spare it; having occasion to defend the Maritime parts of France against Pirats. Which being related again to the Emperor (then at Ratisbonne), he thought fit to publish it, thereby to make Francis more odious, though effectively he took his offer to defend Italy, to be little more than irrision. Businesses standing thus, Monsieur de Bellay, Ambassador from the French King to the Princes, (having first conferr'd with Monsieur de Valley, Ambassador from Francis to the Emperor) absolutely concludes that Accord the Princes had formerly propos'd to his Master: giving by this means a perpetual cause of Jealousie, and Offence to the Emperor. Yet as Francis thought himself not strong enough alone, so he implor'd our Kings assistance; which our King also promis'd, by Monsieur Gilles de Pommeraye, (French Ambassador in England,) sending with him (at his return) fifty thousand Crowns to be employ'd for the defence and conservation of the Right and Priviledges of the Empire. An Interview also was projected betwixt them for the year following, wherein both Kings should treat of the General Affairs, and particularly what they were to do, in case the Turk should again invade Christendom.

While affairs abroad pass'd thus; our Nation enjoy'd much security, and quietness; so that, if contention about Religion had not hapned, they might have thought themselves happy; which though it had its beginning from the divers explications of the Holy Scripture, yet many good Men labour'd to reconcile them; affirming, that whatsoever was necessary to the attaining of everlasting Happiness, was so plainly, and so perspicuously set down there, as it needed no Interpreter. And that, if any thing besides were taught, it was, if not erroneous, yet

Howbeit, they would not deny, but divers points might be added, for the Ampliation, Conveniency, and Ornament of Religion, when they were deliver'd upon these terms, and not under those Condemnations and Penalties wherewith the more necessary parts were enjoy'd. Whereupon also they concluded, that, if divers passages in the Holy Scriptures might seem obscure, it was Gods will to have it so, who thought not fit to reveal them otherways; as reserving a full knowledge to a second and better Life. Yet, because divers, not content with this or any moderate Reformation, did (through the violence of their Spirits) run into those extremities, as they labour'd to draw all the Doctrine of the Roman Church into a perverse Sense; much occasion of Controversy was given; while they who endeavour'd a Peace so little prevail'd, as, (for the most part) like those who part Affraies, they bore blows on either side. In which doubtful times King Henry put in execution all former Laws against Heretical Performers, and Books; whereby one Thomas Bilney, Batchelor of both Laws, declaring himself with great vehemency in divers Articles against the Roman Church, was (a) condemn'd to be burnt, and shortly after, for the same cause, (b) Bayfield a Priest, and (c) Baynham a Lawyer. The whole Narration whereof being extant in Master Fox, I shall mention no otherwise.

Other Acts made to regulate sundry abuses.

The next year January 15th, the Parliament sat again till May 14th, where the Commons persisting in their Grievances against the Clergy, which they compris'd in a Book, and deliver'd by their Speaker; The King answer'd, He would take Advice, and hear the parties accus'd speak, and then proceed to a Reformation; which follow'd in part, as appears in some Statutes of this Parliament. For, whereas it was usual in former times, that Clerks who committed Petty Treason, Murder, or Felony, were (through a certain privilege of the Church) deliver'd to their Ordinaries, who also thereupon, for lucre or other undue Motives, did suffer them to make their Purgation by such as nothing knew of their Misdeeds, to the great scandal of Justice; it was now enacted, that none should have the benefit of this recourse to the Ordinary, but those who were within holy Orders, and yet to find sufficient Sureties for their good abearing. This Act yet not to extend to those, who being attainted of Felony, or Murder, are after admitted to their Clergy, and so deliver'd to the Ordinary. It was provided also, that Ordinaries having such Persons in their Custody, might degrade them, and send them to the Kings-Bench to be detain'd.

It was enacted also, how Perjuries and untrue Verdicts should be punish'd. And this was to the singular benefit of the Subject; there being no mischiefs so easie to be done, so irreparable in their Consequence, or unlimited in their extent, as those of this kind.

And, whereas the Commission of Sewers, being about Sea-walls, Gutters, Banks, &c. and Dams, Weres, &c. in fresh Rivers, was not particularly enough set down heretofore; it was now declar'd and interpreted. And this was much for the benefit of the Sea-Coasts, and making great Rivers Navigable.

Whereas also Statutes of the Staple were heretofore us'd only betwixt Merchant and Merchant, for such Merchandise of the Staple, as pass'd betwixt them; the use thereof was now permitted to others of the Kings Subjects upon certain Conditions. And this not only enlarg'd Contracts, but strengthened much the Sinews of them.

Whereas heretofore the Kings Subjects were ordinarily call'd by the Citations to appear, in the Arches Audience, and other high Courts of the Arch-Bishops of this Realm, to answer to many furmis'd Causes; and that they who refus'd, were Excommunicated or Suspended from Divine Service; it was now enacted, that none should be so cited but in certain cases declar'd in the said Statute.

Feoffments of Lands also to the use of a Church (as being little different from Mort-main) were made void.

Whereas divers, having the benefit of their Clergy, were afterwards committed to their Ordinaries, and did there break Prison, it was now declar'd Felony.

Divers other good Statutes pass'd also this Session; which yet, for being meerly legal, or limited to certain places, are not here recited.

This year also an Act pass'd concerning Annates, or the first fruits of Bishopricks, paid usually to the See of Rome, for the obtaining of Palls, Bulls, &c. The Preamble and Consideration whereof was (as I find in the Records.)

1. That great Sums of Money already pass'd out of the Kingdom that way, (being no less than one hundred and sixty thousand pounds Sterling, since the second year of Henry VII.) Secondly, that more was like to be shortly transported, by reason many of the Bishops are Aged. Thirdly, that the first use and grant of them was for maintaining Arms against Infidels. So that it was enacted, that they should henceforth cease, and no more Money be paid to Rome to that intent, except as is hereafter specified, (viz.) lett the Court of Rome should think themselves irremunerated for their pain, in making and sealing Bulls in Lead, &c. it was ordain'd, that there may be allow'd for the said Bulls five pounds in the hundred, according to the rate of the Bishopricks clear value above all Charges. And if any Man, being chosen to a Bishoprick, and presented by the King to the Pope, shall hereupon find any let or hindrance, by restraint of his Bulls, upon convenient suit for the same; then he may be named and presented by the Kings Highness to the Arch-Bishop of the Province; who shall consecrate him; or, the said Arch-Bishop delaying under pretence of want of Pall, Bull, &c. the Person so nam'd, shall be Consecrate, and invested by any two Bishops of the Land, whom the King shall appoint thereto; and shall be held and reputed thereafter as a compleat Bishop. But of this Act we shall speak again when we come to the 25th year of the King. For though it pass'd the Parliament now, and the King gave his assent thereto; yet power was reserv'd for him to annul or confirm the same any time within two years next following.

Records.

Moreover, in this Statute, the King and his Parliament declare, that they do not intend to use any Extremity or Violence, before gentle and courteous ways have been attempted. But if it shall please the King to propose an amicable composition to the Pope, and his Holiness shall be content either to abolish or moderate those Annates; then the Composition so made, to stand firm. But if, upon the said amicable Propositions, the Realm cannot be disburdened, and that, for the continuance of the same, the Pope shall unjustly vex, and disquiet the King or his Subjects by any Excommunication, &c. Be it enacted by the Authority aforesaid, that the Kings Highness, his Heirs and Successors, Kings of England, and all his Spiritual and Lay Subjects of the same, without any scruple of 1532. Conscience, shall and may lawfully, to the honour of Almighty God, the increase and continuance of Vertue, and good example within this Realm, (the said Censures, Excommunications, Interdictions, Compulsories, or any of them notwithstanding) minister, or cause to be ministered throughout this said Realm, and all other the Dominions and Territories belonging or appertaining thereunto, all and all manner of Sacraments, Sacramentals, Ceremonies, or other Divine Service of Holy Church, or any other thing or things, necessary for the health of the Soul of Mankind, as they heretofore at any time or times have been vertuously us'd or accustom'd to do within the same. And that no manner of such Censures, Excommunications, Interdictions, or any other Process or Compulsories shall by any of the Prelates, or other spiritual Fathers of this Region, by any of their Ministers or Substitutes, be at any time or times hereafter publish'd, executed, or divulg'd in any manner of ways.

April 29. This Act being pass'd, our King made use thereof to terrifie the Pope, which also took effect; as I find by our Ambassadors Letters dated from Rome, April 29th. 1532. though together (as they were instructed from hence,) his Holiness was told by them, that our King had reserv'd the whole business to his own Power and Direction; which however it appeas'd the Pope a while, yet as matters past afterwards, the Statute had his final confirmation, Anno 25. Henry VIII.

Q. Katharine's affairs.

I Shall begin this years History with the affairs of Queen Katharine; who, by her Proctor at Rome, assisted with the advice and power of the Imperialists, Negotiated puissantly with the Pope; so that, notwithstanding our Kings Indignation for her prosecuting him in this manner, she urg'd still the Appeal, beseeching the Pope to cite the King, by himself or Proctor to appear. But the Pope thought fit rather gently thus to exhort our King to take again his Wife Katharine.

Quid enim minus tibi, & tuæ probitati convenit, quam hinc apud nos, per Oratores & literas, super causa istuc remittenda, instare, inde te ipsum Tuo facto causa decidere? Quid simile tui, armis & scriptis olim Ecclesiæ & sanctam fidem defendisse, Nunc tali facto Ecclesiæ videri Contemnere? Jam vero communis salus & tranquillitas à nullo unquam nostri temporis Rege acrius quam à te custodita est, qui bellum pro Ecclesiâ olim susceptum, & gloriose confectum, pro communi quiete deposueris; semperque Arbiter quidam pacis & communis concordie inter Christianos Principes Conciliandæ Existimatus; Quo magis hæc nova de te audientes, admiramur simul ac dolemus, unum hoc tuum factum, si modo verum est, ab omni vitæ tuæ gloria & consuetudine discrepare. Quamobrem cum nec rem tantam non explorare certius, nec neglectam omittere debeamus, Hanc ad te, quasi amantis & solliciti Patris vocem præcurrere volumus, antequam Judicis ulla partes tecum sumamus. Faciunt enim tuæ Celsitudinis dignitas, vetera tua in nos merita, nostraque ex his erga te benevolentia, ut tecum omni respectu & lenitate agere velimus, sumpta parentis persona, & Judicis tantisper deposita, donec ex tuis literis consilium progrediendi capiamus. Cupimus quidem, fili, ut diximus, hæc penitus falsa esse, aut non tam aspera quam nobis referuntur, Teque ipsum deinceps, pro tua singulari sapientia, providere, ne cuiquam de Serenitate tua omni virtute conspicua in hoc tantum obloquendi detur occasio. Si quis enim vel ex Catholicis dolens, vel ex Hæreticis gaudens audiat, te Reginam, quam in uxorem accepisti, Regumque filiam, Cæsarisque & Regis Romanorum materteram, viginti amplius annis tecum commoratam, prolemque ex te susceptam habentem, nunc à tuo thoro & contubernio procul amovisse, aliam quoque publice apud te habere, non modo sine ulla licentia nostra verum etiam contra nostram prohibitionem; Is profecto necesse est, ut sententiam quodammodo de optimo Principe ferat, tanquam Ecclesiæ & publicam tranquillitatem parvi faciente, quod nos scimus ab intentione & voluntate tua longissime abesse; in tantum, ut si quis alius hoc idem in tuo regno audeat, quod à tua Serenitate factum dicitur, nullo modo te probaturum, sed etiam severe vindicaturum pro certo habeamus. Quamobrem, fili, etiamsi tu rectissime sentias, ut nos quidem constanter credimus, tamen causam præbere rumoribus & scandalis non debes; hoc præsertim tempore tam calamitoso, plenoque Hæresium, & aliarum perturbationum; ne tuum factum latius pateat ad exemplum. Sunt enim facta regum, præsertim illustrium, sicut tua Serenitas est, proposita quasi in specula, hominibus cæteris ad imitandum. CLEMENT VII. Pope.

TO our most dear Son in Christ, &c. Health and Apostolical Benediction. What in our tender affection towards you, for the sake of both your Honour here, and your Salvation hereafter, we should be glad to find false has been reported to us, and by many hands confirm'd, concerning your Highness, that although not only before, but since the Controversy has been depending about the lawfulness of the Mar- riage Contract between your self, and our most dear Daughter in Christ, the most excellent Ca- tharine Queen of England; you entertain'd the said Catharine in your Palace, and liv'd with her as your Queen and Wife, as it was fitting you should do; yet now of late you have not only remov'd her from your Person and Court, but have banish'd her from the City, the usual place of her Residence, and sent her to another place, taking in her room publickly to your Bed and Conversation, a certain Lady Anne, with whom you cohabit, and to whom you shew that conjugal Love and Affection, which is only due to your Wife, the said Queen. Which thing, most dear Son, if it be true, and you would lay aside Carnal Affections, and give your self lea- sure to think, we doubt not but that, although we were silent herein, you would soon perceive upon how many several accounts it is unworthy your Highness, either as it is a great contempt of our Judgment and Sentence, which you thus refuse to stay for, as it is a publick scandal to the Church, or as it is a manifest violation of the publick Peace; all which things are so contrary to the principles of a virtuous and re- ligious Prince, as we have always esteem'd your Highness, that though they have daily more and more been confirm'd unto us, yet we have found great difficulty to believe them as things wholly repugnant to your Nature, and perfectly contri- ry to your usage. For what can be more unnat- ural to you, or less agreeable to your Integrity, on one hand, both by your Letters and by your Ambassadors, to implore our assistance in de- termining your Cause, and on the other, by your actions to judge and decide it your own self? To condemn the authority of the Church by such a proceeding, how unlike is it to the actions of him, who has so well defended by the power of the Sword, and by the strength of Argument, our most holy Faith and the Catholick Church? Surely the publick Peace and Tranquillity have by no Prince of our Age, been more carefully preserv'd than by you, who piously undertook a War for the Church, gloriously prosecuted it, and at length for the sake of publick peace and quiet desisted from it, from whence your Highness has been justly esteem'd the Arbitrer of Peace and common Concord among Christian Princes; wherefore when we hear these strange things concerning you, it raiseth both our Admiration, and encreaseth our Grief, that this one action of yours, if it be true, should cast a blemish upon the glory of your former Life and Behaviour. Wherefore as we could not but en- quire into the truth hereof more carefully, and ought not to pass by a matter of this weight with neglect, we were willing to send you this kind Admonition, as of a loving and affectionate Fa- ther, before we are forc'd to deal with you in the severer methods of an impartial Judge. The high Dignity of your Majesty, your most deser- ving Services to us, and our most tender love and affection to you, makes us choose to act to- wards you, with all respect and gentleness in the person of a kind Parent, and so long lay aside our office as a Judge, till by your Letters we shall see what measures will be most proper for us to take. We wish, Dear Son, as we have said, that these things were false, or at least not so bad as they are represented to us; and farther, that you your self would take such care, of your singular Wisdom, that no body may in this thing have occasion to speak ill of your Highness, whose Virtues have in all other your Actions been so Conspicuous. For if any Catholick to his great grief, or any Heretick to his mighty joy, should hear that you have now remov'd afar off from your Bed and Presence, your Queen whom you Married, the Daughter of a King, the Aunt of the Emperor, and King of the Romans, af- ter she had liv'd with you more than twenty years, and had several Children by you; that you have openly taken another Woman to your Bed, not only without our License and Dispen- sation, but also contrary to our express Prohibi- tion;

1532. tion; he cannot but in some measure make this judgment of the best of Kings, that he is one that little regards the authority of the Church, and nothing values the publick Peace, than which we are satisfied nothing can be farther from your Highnesses Will and Intention; insomuch that should any one in your Kingdom dare to do this which is reported of your Highness, we surely know that you would be so far from approving, that you would most surely punish it. Wherefore, my Son, as we most certainly believe that your knowledge is rightly inform'd herein, so ought your Practice to be such, as not to give occasion to scandalous Reports; especially in these dangerous times, which so abound with Heresies, and other most grievous Calamities, lest what you do, should grow a Precedent and Example for others: For the Actions of Princes, especially those so illustrious as your Highness, are looked upon as Marks and Patterns whereto others may direct their aim, and whereby they may form their Practice. Nor ought your Highness to neglect the common safety, and overlook the Peace and Tranquillity of Christendom, to which the best of Princes have never fail'd to pay, as in Duty bound, a regard. Nor ought you, my Son, to offer this injury to the most Serene Princes, the Emperor and the King of the Romans, the said Queen Catharine's Nephews, who have never given you offence, by thus proceeding before your Cause is determin'd, thereby disturbing that Universal Peace among Christian Princes, wherein alone, our safety from the Turks consists; lest you give occasion of much scandal in the Church, and of great danger in the Christian World, and so provoke the Almighty so far, as to change the great blessings he has so long pour'd down upon you into Bitterness and Affliction. We therefore of our tender love and affection exhort you, and of our Paternal Duty, warn you, my Son, that for the sake of that kind indulgence and favour which we have always shewn, and shall continue ever to shew you, unless you hinder us, that, if these things be true, that tarnish your former reputation of Piety and Glory, you your self would amend them by affectionately taking again to your self your Queen Catharine, by giving her the Honour and Respect due to a Queen, and the tenderness and affection due to a Wife: And by removing the said Lady Anne from your Bed and Conversation, so long at least till your Cause shall be determin'd, and we have given Sentence herein. Which, although it be no more than your Duty, and what will greatly conduce to your Honour, and advance your Glory; yet we shall take as a great mark of your Highnesses respect and good will towards us. For as our most earnest desire is always to preserve in you your good esteem of us, and your customary duty and affection to the Apostolical See, which in your Regard and your Actions, you have never fail'd to shew; so we cannot without the greatest grief betake our selves to the sharper remedies of Justice; to which the indignity offer'd to our own Person herein, which we can willingly pass by, could never prompt us, nor indeed can anything force us to it, but the honour of Almighty God, the advancement of the publick good, and the Salvation of your Immortal Soul, as our Nuncio with you has orders more fully to acquaint your Highness.

Given at St. Peter's under the Seal of the Fisherman, Jan. 25. 1532. in the 9th year of our Pontificat.

But the Pope had no good Answer thereunto; for as the People for the most part exclaim'd against the Match (as our Historians relate) so the King would have found perchance some difficulty to appease their Scruples, when otherwise he could have satisfied his own. The Queen wanted not yet those who defended her Cause publicly, both in Books and Sermons (of whom the chief were Thomas Abel her Chaplain, and John Fisher Bishop of Rochester) and privately in Discourse, (especially Women) though not sufficiently either to clear all Objections, or to remove the King from his affection to Mrs. Anne Bolen. Among which I must not forget one Temse, of the Lower-House of Parliament; who motion'd that they all should Petition the King to take his Queen again; which being advertis'd to our King, he sent for Thomas Audley, the Speaker of the House, and told him to this effect. That he marvel'd any among them should meddle in busineses which could not properly be determin'd there. As for this particular, that it concern'd his Soul so much, that he many times wish'd the Marriage had been good, but since the Doctors of the Universities had generally declar'd it unlawful, he could do no less than abstain from her Company. Which therefore he wish'd them to take as the true reason, without imputing it to any wanton Appetite: Since, being in the one and fortieth year of his Age, it might be justly presum'd such Motions were not so quick in him. All which, that they might the better understand, he had inform'd himself in all parts of Christendom, concerning strange Marriages; and that, saving in Spain and Portugal, he could never find that any Man had so much as Married two Sisters, if the first were carnally known. But for the Brother to marry the Brothers Wife was so abhorr'd among all Nations, that he never heard any Christian so do but himself; and therefore wish'd them to believe that his Conscience was troubled. Shortly after which, the King sent for the Speaker again, and told him that he had found that the Clergy of his Realm were but his half Subjects, or scarce so much. Every Bishop or Abbot, at the entering of his Dignity, taking an Oath to the Pope derogatory to that of their Fidelity to the King, which Contradiction he desir'd his Parliament to take away: Whereupon these two Oaths by the King's Command being read and considered, the Parliament so handled the Business, as it occasion'd the final renouncing of the Popes Authority about two years after.

While these things thus pass'd, King Henry commands his Agents at Rome, (the Bishop of Worcester and Sir Gregory Casalis) to present unto the Pope the Opinion of divers famous Lawyers, in favour of his Cause; procuring also Learned Men from all parts of Italy, to come to Rome, to offer Disputation for the same. To second this again, King Henry in January, 1532. Jan. sends William Benet, Doctor of Law, to Rome, with Instructions to this purpose. But because it was found, that, by the continual intercession of the Queen and Emperor, the Pope intended shortly to cite the King to appear at Rome, either in Person or by Proxy; he dispatches thither about February, Edw. Karne, Doctor of Law, Feb. to be his Excusator, and to remonstrate, that his Grace is not bound by Law so to appear. But

It is mov'd in the Commons to petition the King to take his Wife again.

But the Pope making difficulty to admit this Excusator, it was disputed in the Consistory, whether he ought to be heard or no? But much time being spent herein, the Queens Agents require the Pope to proceed in the principal Cause. In the mean while our King, by Sir Francis Bryan, importunes Francis to intercede for him with the Pope; who, thereupon by Letter, dated March 16. informs his Holiness, that the request of the King of England is just, and he ought to relieve him. Or else they two, (being une mesme chose, and who have so well deserv'd of him) shall be forc'd to seek such other Remedies, as shall not please him, &c. To enforce this most earnest Letter, Francis sends Gabriel de Grammont, Bishop of Tarbe, lately made Cardinal) to the Pope, who yet, being continually urg'd by the Imperialists to proceed against the King, and hearing (besides) first the Prohibition of Annates above-mentioned, and afterwards that a certain Priest was committed for maintaining the Papal Authority, and that another Priest (being put in Prison by the Archbishop of Canterbury for favouring Luther) after he had appeal'd to the King tanquam Dominum Supremum, was set at Liberty, proceeds to Citation; and calling a Consistory (July 8.) commits the hearing of the Cause to Paulus de Capisucci Dean of the Ruota, and appoints the Month of October 1532. for the Kings Appearance, protesting alioqui procedetur, &c. In the mean time, he writes to our King, certifying him what was done, (yet omitting the Clause of alioqui procedetur) intreating him further to send a Proctor; making also this Overture to our Agents, that he will be content that all the Process shall be in England, except only the final Decision, which (because there is question of the Papal Authority and the Law Divine) he will reserve to himself. The term prefix'd for our Kings appearance being expir'd; Capisucci cites our King again, or his Proctors, or finally his Orators. To all which Edward Kerne answered publicly, November 14. 1532. That the Proceeding was undue, both as the question concerning his Excusation was not decided, and that he could not get a Copy of the Citation; and finally as it was not congruous to the Breve sent to the King concerning this business. Besides, that the Emperor was so powerful in Rome, that he could not expect Justice, wherefore, unless they desisted, he declar'd, that he must appeal from thence to the able Men in some indifferent Universities. And that, if this were refus'd, he protested then a Nullity in all that they did. But the Pope, as little regarding this, goes to Bononia shortly after, to meet the Emperor, according to an agreement made a good while since betwixt them; promising our Agents yet, that notwithstanding the Queens Proctors Sollicitation, nothing of Moment should be done in this Cause, till the Emperor were departed.

The Turk now threatening Germany, the Elector of Mentz, and Lodovicus Prince Palatine interpos'd Offices for reconciling the Emperor and the Protestants: The Treaty whereof began in April, and so continued until July. When News of the coming of the Turk being brought, both Parties condescended to this Capitulation concluded at Noremberg.

That no Man should be troubled for cause of Religion, till the Council be held, (which the Emperor will labour to procure to be summon'd within six Months, and held within a year following) or some other way of determination of controverted-points be found.

Whereupon also the Protestants (being seven Princes, and twenty-three Cities) offer'd him aid against the Turk, who, this year, 1532. upon colour of putting Johannes Sepusius in possession of that Crown, invaded Hungary, which also he prosecuted in that peremptory manner, as without admitting any reasons from the Emperor, or indeed allowing him any other Title than the King of Spain, (for he said there was no Emperor but himself) he brought in an Army of three hundred thousand Men into Hungary. And because his Equipage was singular, I presume the Reader will take well the Description of it, for his own Person he was cloath'd only in a rich Robe of Crimson broider'd with Gold; but his Cimitary and Dagger, as also the Saddle and Bit of the Horse, on which he rid, was set with Stones of inestimable Value. Then follow'd his Visier-Bassas, and Abraym his Favorite, and Household Retinue; being about twelve thousand Men. Before him went four thousand Horse with the Standard Imperial, and four thousand Janizaries of his Guard, four hundred Slaves on Horseback in a rich Livery, and fifty Chariots carrying his most pretious Treasure, and some of the choicest Beauties of the Seraglio, and especially the admir'd Espanziel a Macedonian, and four thousand Horse to guard them, besides two hundred brave Horse richly furnish'd, which were led by the Hand. His Pages were a hundred on Horseback, whereof one more gorgeous than the rest, and his Lacquies one thousand, richly Apparell'd likewise in a Livery, all of these (last mention'd) wearing great Plumes. After which follow'd his Dogs and Hawks in no small proportion.

With this Train Solyman marches to Belgrade, then turning to the left hand of the Danubius he besieges Giumtz: Whence being repuls'd, he send out his Captains to forage the Country; who after committing all sorts of Cruelty, were at the last defeated and slain: And now Solyman finding great forces rais'd against him, and prepar'd to give him Battel, retir'd, with as little Success as he had three years since at Vienna, this Army of the Christians consisting, as I find, of ninety thousand Foot, and thirty thousand Horse, was rais'd by the Emperor, who yet did not think fit to conduct them, in Person, as coming from Lintz, in Austria to Vienna, no sooner than that Solyman was departed from Hungary; whence he sent to Rome a Dispatch of the 4th of October, desiring the Pope to meet him at Genoia. About which time he receiv'd news from Andrea Doria, whom the last Summer he had commanded to scour the Mediterranean Sea, and to land where he thought fit. Whereupon Doria with a great Fleet, and ten thousand Soldiers, setting forth from Messina in Sicily, August 18. passing by Cephalony and Zante, came to Morea, and landed at Coron, (anciently call'd Corone, not Charonea, in Baotia, Plutarch's Country, as Sandoval mistakes it) and battering it both by Sea and Land, took it by Composition, Sept. 21. where leaving for Garrison fifteen hundred Spaniards, he return'd with great Spoils and Honour to Genoia.

This while our King finding he could obtain no satisfaction from the Pope, hastens the League with Francis, formerly projected, to a Conclusion; and the rather, that he heard this Meeting betwixt the Pope and the Emperor would shortly follow. In emulation whereof therefore an Interview betwixt him and Francis was concluded, in that form which Cardinal Woolsey heretofore had set down upon the like meeting projected, Anno 1527.

The Articles of Treaty formerly concluded betwixt Thomas Earl of Wiltshire, and Ormond Lord Privy Seal, together with Edward Fox, the Kings Almoner, on the one part, and Gilles de la Pommeraye on the other part, were these.

I. That all former Treaties shall remain in force, so that, if any Conditions in this Treaty be not performed, the former Treaties yet, especially that of perpetual Peace, shall stand firm.

II. That if the Emperor Charles any way shall invade each of them directly or indirectly, in the Lands they now hold, they shall be bound to send mutual Aid, (viz.) The King of France to the King of England (within three Months warning) to the place appointed five hundred Men at Arms, (arm'd à la Francoise,) or any other less number, which the King of England shall pay according to the rate they use to have of the French King. The King of England to the King of France such a number of Archers on foot as he shall require, so it exceed not five thousand; to receive pay of the French King, according to the rate of England. And if either the Horsemen or Archers pass the Sea, besides this Pay, there is such provision to be made for Victual, by the Prince under whom they serve, that the Soldiers may well live and maintain themselves by their pay. And if the said Emperor shall attempt any thing by Sea, the Prince invaded giving two Months notice to the other, shall receive for Aid a Navy, (in which shall be fifteen thousand Soldiers,) well arm'd and equipped, which Navy both Kings shall be bound to maintain for six Months together, or longer if need be, at their own Costs, to defend and secure against the said Emperor the Sea and Shores on both sides, from the Isle of Uthant to the place call'd the Downs, between Sandwich and Dover.

III. If the Emperor or his Governors shall detain the Goods, or Ships, or Persons of the English Merchants in his Dominions, the King of France shall summon him to make Restitution, which if he denies, he shall lay hold on and arrest the Emperors Subjects, and Goods in his Kingdom, &c. nor shall release them till satisfaction be given. And in like manner is the King of England bound to the King of France.

(But, if for any probable Cause, and particularly for any contain'd in the Articles of the former Treaty between him and the Kings of England and France, or for Justice deny'd, after he hath requir'd it, the Emperor shall arrest any of the Subjects of the two Kings, or their Goods, then the other is not bound to see him indemnified, according to the former Article. Provided, First, that the Emperor made it appear, that it is for a just Cause. Secondly, That he arrest no more than may countervail his pretended loss. Thirdly, Provided also that the number of Ships arrested by the Emperor, be not above five or six, and that for some particular interest or deed betwixt them and him.) This third Article shall not be extended to the Merchants of Higher Germany, and the Subjects of Charles Jure Imperii.

Neither of the two Kings may make a new League, Friendship, or Affinity with any Prince or Estate, to the prejudice of the other. If he do, it shall be counted void, and of no effect; This Treaty, being Minuted 23 June 1532. was to be signed five Months after.

And now the time of the Interview approaching, our King pass'd the Seas to Calais, 11 of Octob. 1532. with a Royal Train, and Mistress Anne Bolen, (lately * created Marchioness of Pembroke.) And going thence to Bologne, the young Princes, the Children of Francis, meeting him, were recommended to him by the King their Father. Who, after many Complements, conducted him to the Abbey; where they both lodg'd in the same House. Many Courtesies were exchanged, and many Designs projected betwixt those Princes concerning Religion, and other Affairs of Christendom, for the space of four days that they stay'd together; which being past, Francis return'd with our King to Calais, in this Order, that, while Francis was on French Ground he gave place, but when he came to the English Pale, he receiv'd it. Being now come near Calais, the Duke of Richmond, a goodly young Gentleman, bravely attended, met them. All the Soldiers of the Town also, and Servants to the Nobility, richly Apparell'd, made a Guard for their entrance into the Streets. The Lodging which Francis was brought to, was most richly furnish'd with Cloth of Gold and Tissue, imbroider'd in some places with Pearl and precious Stone. And their several Services brought in a hundred and seventy Dishes all of Massive Gold. The Marchioness also made them a curious and rich Masque, in which both Kings danc'd. After which Anne de Montmorencie, a noble Man of a most ancient and generous Family, Grand-Maister, and Marechal of France, and Philip Chabot Seigneur de Bryon, and Admiral of France, were accepted into the Order of the Garter. Francis himself (who was also of this Order) sitting in his Stall at their Election. And this was in lieu of the taking of the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk into the Order of St. Michael by Francis at Boulogne. And here the two Kings advis'd what in their particular should be done against the Turk; for, though News were already brought of his Retreat, yet because that he had left behind him a great part of his Forces, and that it was thought he intended to return, it was agreed betwixt these Princes, the next year to bring an Army into the Field, of seventy thousand Foot, and ten thousand Horse, and not to part without mutual consent. That they should send to the Princes in Italy or Germany, to require Passage and Victuals at a reasonable price, &c. This being settled, our King complain'd of the ill usage the Pope gave him in the affairs of his Divorce, in regard he was cited to appear at the Court of Rome by himself or Proctor; whereas it was usual in these cases to send Judges to the place; it being not reasonable that either a Proctor should be trusted with the secrets of his Conscience, or that himself should abandon his Realm to go in Person to so remote a place. Whereupon they began mutual complaints against the Pope for the Annates and Exactions taken upon the Subjects in either Country, which they promis'd to remedy, by summoning him to a Council, and in the mean while to send their Ambassadors to require Reparation, protesting, that otherwise (by calling Provincial Councils in their several Kingdoms) they would give that order which was fitting: And, for this purpose that the Cardinals of Tournon and Grandmont, should be employ'd; who also were authoris'd to tell the Pope, that, whereas an Interview had been propos'd betwixt him and the French King at Avignon or Nizza, that it might be, that the King of England his good Brother, could be persuaded easily to go along with him, for ending all Controversies, if his Holiness were dispos'd thereunto. In the mean while, the Bishop of Auxerre, the French Ambassador at Rome, should certify the Pope, that the said Cardinals would be present at the Interview betwixt the Pope and Emperor, to the end they might mediate with the Pope, for giving King Henry Judges in his own Kingdom, to decide the point of the Divorce. After which, coming to speak, (as I find by our Records) concerning his intended Match with the new Marchioness, Francis encourag'd him to proceed; promising, if the Cause were question'd, to assist him to the uttermost, whatsoever should come of it. In which Discourses purposing fier la Partie for the chief affairs of Europe, they pass'd four days at Calais. After which time the King conducting him to the French Ground, bid him farewell 30 Octob. 1532. and so return'd to Calais. Yet as the weather was then tempestuous, he pass'd not not the Seas before the 14th of Novemb. on which day some write, he privately Married the Marchioness, though others place it on the 25 of Jan. following, Rowland Lee afterwards Bishop of Conventry and Lichfield, and President of Wales, (under whom it began first to be govern'd by the Laws of England) celebrating the Marriage in the presence of Arch-bishop Cranmer, the Duke of Norfolk, and her Father, Mother, and Brothers, &c. which yet was not publish'd till the Easter following. Not long after which (or as some have it in the beginning of the next Spring) the King sent George Bolen, Lord Rochfort, to Francis to acquaint him with the Marriage, and to desire him (if occasion were) not to fail his Promise. Furthermore he requir'd his advice, how it were best to publish it, since it could not be long conceal'd. He also acquainted him how the Scots under the Earl of Murray had done some Hostile Acts in his Kingdom; wishing him therefore not to take it ill if he reveng'd himself on the Scots; intreating him further, that if the Interview betwixt the Pope and him (then secretly projected) must needs follow (which yet he wish'd were protracted) that he would remember his Cause, then depending in Rome, as he was often desir'd.

The Emperor who was well inform'd of this Interview, hastned his with the Pope. And because the Pope could not be persuaded to come to Genoia by Sea, the meeting was agreed at Bononia, 20th December 1532. where also the two Cardinals above-mentioned, were on the part of Francis. And now they treated of the general Affairs, but not with that intireness and satisfaction which formerly past; for the Pope retain'd still some grudge concerning the business of Ferrara above-mentioned. Therefore, when the Emperor (according to his promise given to the German Princes) prest him to call a Council, he deserr'd it; and, when he wish'd him to renounce all Friendship with our King and Francis, he excus'd himself, saying, they were Christian Princes. Again, when he requir'd that Catharine de Medicis, the Popes Niece (between whom and the Duke of Orleans, second Son to Francis, a Treaty past) should be dispos'd of to Francisco Sforza; he reply'd she was already promis'd. Only, it seems, he accorded all that could be requir'd concerning our King. Inasmuch, that unless he would contribute puissantly for and against the Turk (for which purpose the Pope promis'd his Letters) the Emperor was then assur'd that all that could be done in favour of Queen Katharine, should be immediately dispatch'd. Which also the Emperor (now more than ever offended at our Kings League with Francis) took so well, that in Contemplation thereof, he not only withdrew his Forces out of Lombardy, but gave Peace to Italy, as by a League then concluded betwixt them more fully appear'd. Some Cardinals being made at this Interview, the Ambassadors of France demanded a Cardinals Hat for Hierom, Bishop of Worcester; which the Emperor oppos'd, saying, he would have taken it less ill, that the French King should have su'd for four Hats for his own Subjects, than one for any appertaining to our King, especially for him who had been a diligent Agent in the Divorce. Many designs here likewise were projected, and among them one by the Bishop of Como, who for deciding all Controversies, said it was necessary that the Pope, the Emperor and French King should meet together, which, yet, was not finally approv'd unless our King made the fourth. But this also in regard of the little security those Princes could mutually give or receive, being judg'd improbable, was rejected. Shortly after which, the Pope and Emperor took leave of each other. During this Interview I find in our Records a Portuguez, in the name of David King of the Ethiopians (vulgarly call'd Prete Jan) presented himself Ambassador to his Holiness; for authorizing of which charge he brought with him not only Letters of Credence (translated out of the Chaldee to the Italian and Portugal Tongues) wherein the said King declar'd himself to be descended from Queen Candace mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, but a Crucifix of Gold; the further effect of his Employment being to require some excellent Artificers, and 2000 Arquebusiers, whom he would use in a War against the Turk in Egypt, when his Holiness would compose the differences in the Western Parts, and joyn all Christian Princes for recovery of the Holy-Land; pretending thereupon in the Name of that King to render Obedience to his Holiness as the true Successor of St. Peter. But this (as Augustino de Augustini an Italian there present, and sometimes Servant to Cardinal Woolsey, hath it in his Letter to Cromwel) made the rest suspected; and the rather that other Circumstances made it probable, that this Ambassador was suborn'd partly by the Portugal to countenance his Monopoly of Spices towards those parts (much grudg'd at by his Neighbour Princes) and partly by the Pope to advance his Authority and Reputation. But to return to our History.

Our King having notice of the foresaid Interview, and finding that the Emperor, who seem'd a while to desist from the eager prosecution of his Aunts Cause, was now more vehement than ever; sends Instructions to his Agents at Rome, to protest in his Name, that he was not bound either in his own Person, or by his Proctor to appear there, urging, for this purpose, the Determination of some Universities, and particularly of Orleans and Paris. Notwithstanding which, he permitted Doctor Bennet to make (as of himself) divers motions to the Pope, the principal whereof in our Records I find these. First, that seeing by the Opinions of Lawyers, and the Council of Nice, the matter ought to be decided in partibus; and that by the Laws of England the Determination (it concerning the Succession) cannot elsewhere be made; it would please his Holiness that the Archbishop of Canterbury taking to him two eminent Bishops or Abbots, or the whole Clergy of his Province, should decide the same. But this being dislik'd by the Pope, Bennet secondly propos'd, whether he would refer the Determination to Sir Thomas More, or the Bishop of London, to be nominate by the King, and let the Queen or Emperor name another, and the French King the third, and let the Archbishop of Canterbury be the fourth. But this also being rejected, Bennet came, it seems, to the last degree of the Instructions, which was, that if the Cause might be heard in England, and that the Queen refus'd the Sentence, she should have the benefit of her Appeal before three Judges, one of England, one of France, and the third from the Pope, who also should discuss the matter in some indifferent place. But the Pope allow'd not this, saying, since he saw the King would needs conserve his Authority, he would likewise conserve his, and proceed via ordinaria. Before yet I conclude this year, I shall relate some particular home-businesses. Among which, I find that our King having gotten York-House (now White-Hall) upon the Cardinals Conviction in a Præmunire, did newly enlarge and beautifie it, buying also the Hospital and Fields of St. James, and building the Palace there. For which purpose he compounded with the Sisters of the House for a Pension during their Lives. Not long after which, he suppress'd the Priory call'd Christ-Church in London, distributing the Canons, being Franciscans, into other Houses of that kind, and bestowing the Church-Plate, and Lands, on Sir Thomas Audley, newly made Lord Keeper of the Great Seal. For Sir Thomas More, Lord Chancellor of England, after divers Suits to be discharg'd of his place, (which he had held two years and a half) did at length by the Kings good leave resign it. The example whereof being rare, will give me occasion to speak more particularly of him. Sir Thomas More, a Person of sharp Wit, and endu'd besides with excellent parts of Learning (as his Works may testify) was yet (out of I know not what natural facetiousness) given so much to Jestings, that it detracted no little from the Gravity and Importance of his Place, which though generally noted and dislik'd, I do not think was enough to make him give it over in that merriment we shall find anon, or retire to a private Life. Neither can I believe him so much addicted to his private Opinions, as to desert all other Governments but his own Utopia, so that it is probable some vehement desire to follow his Book, or secret offence taken against some Person, or Matter (among which perchance the Kings new intended Marriage, or the like might be accounted) occasion'd this strange Counsel, though, yet, I find no reason pretended for it, but infirmity and want of Health. Our King hereupon taking the Seal, and giving it, together with the Order of Knight-hood, to Thomas Audley Speaker of the Lower-House, Sir Thomas More without acquainting any body with what he had done, repairs to his Family at Chelsey, where after a Mass celebrated the next day in the Church, he comes to his Ladies Pew, with his hat in his Hand (an Office formerly done by one of his Gentlemen) and says, Madam, my Lord is gone. But she thinking this at first to be but one of his Jest, was little mov'd, till he told her seriously, he had given up the Great Seal; whereupon she speaking some passionate Words, he call'd his Daughters then present to see if they could not spie some fault about their Mothers Dressing, but they after search, saying they could find none, he replied, do you not perceive that your Mothers Nose standeth somewhat awry; of which Jeer the provok'd Lady was so sensible, that she went from him in a Rage. Shortly after, he acquainted his Servants with what he had done, dismissing them also to the attendance of some other great Personages, to whom he had recommended them. For his Fool he bestow'd him on the Lord Mayor during his Office, and afterwards on his Successors in that Charge. And now coming to himself, he began to consider how much he had left, and finding that it was not above one hundred pounds yearly in Lands, besides some Money, he advis'd with his Daughters how to live together. But the griev'd Gentlewomen (who knew not what to reply, or indeed how to take these Jest) remaining astonish'd, he says, We will begin with the slender Diet of the Students of the Law, and if that will not hold out, we will take such Commons as they have at Oxford; which, yet, if our Purse will not stretch to maintain, for our last refuge we will go a Begging, and at every Mans Door, sing together a Salve Regina to get Alms. But these Jest were thought to have in them more levity, than to be taken every where for current; he might have quitted his Dignity, without using such Sarcasms, and betaken himself to a more retir'd and quiet Life, without making them or himself contemptible. And certainly whatsoever he intended hereby, his Family so little understood his meaning, that they needed some more serious Instructions. So that I cannot persuade my self for all this talk, that so excellent a Person would omit at fit times, to give his Family that sober account of his relinquishing this place, which I find he did to the Archbishop Warham, Erasmus, and others.

This year of 1533. February 4. the Parliament sat again.

The chief Laws enacted were; that all Victuals should be sold by the larger kind of weight call'd Avoirdupois. That the price of a pound of Beef or Pork should be a half-penny at most, and of Mutton or Veal three farthings, and less, where it was usually sold for less. Which I therefore remember that we may compare the Rate of those times with these. This Law yet was finally Repeal'd in regard unseasonable years did not permit a certain Rule in these things, and some of the Lords of the Council appointed to set the Prices; whereof in its due place.

That they who kill'd any Person attempting to Rob by or near the High-way, or that broke Houses, should be acquitted without forfeiting either Goods or Lands.

That no Appeals should be made out of this Realm for these Reasons (viz.) That whereas the Kingdom of England was a just Empire, furnish'd with such able Persons both Spiritual and Temporal, as could decide all Controversies arising in it; and whereas Edw. I. Edw. III. Rich. II. Hen. IV. and other Kings of this Realm, have made sundry Ordinances, Laws, and Statutes, for the Conservation of the Prerogative, Liberties, and Pre-eminences of the said Imperial Crown, and of the Jurisdictions Spiritual and Temporal of the same, to keep it from the annoyance of the See of Rome, as also from the Authority of other foreign Potentates attempting the Diminution or Violation thereof; and because notwithstanding the said Acts, divers Appeals have been sued to the See of Rome in Causes Testamentary, Causes of Matrimony, and Divorces, right of Tythes, Oblations and Obventions, to the great vexation and charge of the Kings Highness, and his Subjects, and the delay of Justice; and, forasmuch, as the distance of the way to Rome is such, as the necessary proofs and true knowledge of the Cause, cannot be brought thither, and represented so well, as in this Kingdom; and that therefore many Persons be without Remedy: It is therefore enacted, that all Causes Testamentary, Causes of Matrimony, and Divorces, Tythes, Oblations, and Obventions, either commenc'd or depending formerly, or which hereafter shall commence in any of the Kings Dominions, shall be heard, discuss'd, and definitively determin'd, within the Kings Jurisdiction, and Authority in the Courts Spiritual and Temporal of the same, any foreign inhibition or restraints to the contrary notwithstanding. So that, although any Excommunication or Interdiction on this occasion should follow from that See, the Prelates and Clergy of this Realm should administer Sacraments, and say Divine Service, and do all other their Duties, as formerly hath been us'd, upon penalty of one years Imprisonment, and Fine at the Kings pleasure; and they who procur'd the said Sentences, should fall into a Præmunire. As for the Orders to be observ'd henceforth, it was enacted, that in Suits commenc'd before the Archdeacon or his Officials, Appeal might be made to the Bishop of the said See. And from thence within 15 days to the Archbishop of Canterbury, or Archbishop of York, respectively in their Provinces, and so likewise to the Archbishops in the Kings other Dominions. Or if Suit be 1532. be commenc'd before the Archdeacon of any Archbishop or his Commissaries, then Appeal may be made within fifteen days to the Court of Arches, and so to the Archbishops without further Appeal. In all which cases, the Prerogative of the Archbishop and Church of Canterbury was reserv'd. That if any Suit arose betwixt the King and his Subjects, Appeal might be made within fifteen days to the Prelates of the Upper House in the Convocation then sitting, or next call'd by the Kings Writ, there to be finally determin'd. And that they who shall take out any Appeal contrary to the effect of this Act, or refuse to obey it, they, their Adherents, and Counsellors, shall incur the penalty of the Statute of xvi Rich. Secundi. And thus the Spirituality finding the power invested formerly in the Pope, to be deriv'd now in great part on them, did more easily suffer the diminution of the Papal Authority.

All former Statutes also made against the excess of Apparel were repeal'd, and new Orders given, which yet stood not long; there being no measure it seems for things that depended so much upon Fancy and Opinion. It is now time that we return to our History.

June 4. Records. Among the many things concluded at the late Interview at Bononia, we may remember one was that the Pope should write to our King to send aid against the Turk, who having fail'd (accidentally) in his Intentions, he said this Summer would puissantly invade Christendom. But our King answer'd by his Ambassadors, that the Emperors Ambition was the cause thereof, and the rashness of the Pope, who at the Emperors request had lately Excommunicated John Sepuse Vayvode of Transilvania and elect King of Hungary, and so forc'd him to seek foreign Aid; which ought to put his Holiness in mind, that he be wary how he proceeded with potent Princes. Yet if the Pope in his own particular were afraid of the Turk, that he should come to Avignon, and that he and Francis would undertake his Protection, since the Emperor was resolv'd to consent to the German Princes, about some Innovation in Religion; only to diminish his Holiness Power. How the Pope yet relish'd this Motion, appears not; but certainly I find that as long as he was so aw'd in Italy, neither did Francis think it safe to treat, or our King to repose intire Confidence in him, though now the Cesarean Forces being withdrawn, a private Treaty betwixt the Pope and Francis took effect, insomuch that Francis now began secretly to fall off from our King. For as the Pope together with giving Catharina de Medices (Daughter to Lorenzo, late Duke of Urbino) in Marriage to the Duke of Orleans, had promis'd his assistance to him for recovering his Claims in Italy, which he passionately desir'd, so he was dispos'd now, though not altogether to forsake our King, yet at least to decline the Conventions betwixt them, at their late Interview. And to induce the Pope to draw Francis on his side, it may be thought no small Motive, that he had upon his own Authority, not only levied some Tenths upon the Clergy in France, but prepar'd Forces to assist the Protestant Princes; which so scandaliz'd his Holiness, as he thought it safer to permit a War of Dominion (though in Italy) than of Religion in Germany assisted by the French. And certainly, as the times then stood, the Pope had reason to fear a defection in more than one Prince. The Pope also wanted not his designs upon Modena and Reggio, wherein he hop'd Francis would second him against the Emperor, whom he hated still for approving the late Sentence in favour of the Duke of Ferrara. Which places now he intended to give his Niece, together with the Dutchy of Urbino, when it could be gotten. For performance of all which, the French Writers say a Treaty was concluded. Our King (being well inform'd of all, and particularly knowing that Francis, notwithstanding both their late private Treaty at the Interview, and divers reiterated professions of Friendship, had upon the Popes Breve and Request executed some Persons in France, who it seem'd oppos'd the Papal Authority, and recall'd from Banishment one Bede a bitter Enemy to the Kings Divorce,) thought it now his best expedient to stand to the decision of his own Clergy: Whereunto it conduc'd much, that Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury, being lately dead, Thomas Crammer (an able Person) much favour'd by the Nobility, as our Historians say, and lately imploy'd in the Kings business in Italy, and at this present in Germany, was, though absent, chosen to this Place. Neither indeed could the Kings Clandestine Marriage be much longer hidden, the new Queen being quick with Child: So that he resolv'd shortly, both to publish his Marriage, and to require his Clergy to proceed to a Sentence concerning the Divorce. His Parliament, in the mean time, so favouring his Intentions, that they made the afore said Act against Appeals to Rome, to the no little displeasure of Queen Katharine, who found thereby how dangerous it would be (in point of our Law) to insist on hers. However, I find, she had many openly favour'd her Cause, without that our King thought fit to punish them.

Queen Katharine was now at Amptbil in Bedfordshire; and because it concern'd the King to acquaint her, with the causes of this second Marriage, he sent again some grave Persons to prepare her thereunto, wishing her together to submit. But she persisting still, Crammer Archbishop of Canterbury cited her to appear at Dunstable, being six Miles off. Where for deciding this business, he appointed a Court to be held; and with him came the Bishops of London, Winchester, (being Stephen Gardiner) Bath, Lincoln, and many great Clerks. Their first proceeding (as Sanders hath it) was a Citation to our King to put away his Wife Katharine, protesting otherwise that they would censure him. But the Records which I have seen, mention only that Crammer demanded and obtain'd leave of the King to determine the matter, since it caus'd much doubt among the common People, and fears of great Inconveniencies in matter of Succession. The Court being now held, and the Queen summon'd fifteen days together, without yet that she appear'd, the Archbishop having first pronounc'd her Contumacious, proceeds to Sentence, which also he caus'd to be publickly read in the Chappel of our Lady in the Priory of Dunstable, before two Notaries, and then sent to the King, desiring further to know his mind concerning his second Marriage, as soon as he had advis'd with his Council.

The Tenor of the Sentence was this.

IN Dei nomine Amen: Nos Thomas permissione divina Cantuarien. Maii 23. 1533.

IN the Name of God Amen: We Thomas by Divine permission Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of all England, and Legate of the Apostolical See, in a certain cause of enquiry of and concerning the validity of the Marriage contracted and consummated between the most potent and most illustrious Prince, our Sovereign Lord Henry VIII. by the grace of God King of England and France, Defender of the Faith, and Lord of Ireland, and the most serene Princess Catharine, Daughter of his most Catholick Majesty, Ferdinand King of Spain, &c. of glorious Memory; we proceeding according to Law and Justice in the said Cause, which has been brought judicially before us in virtue of our Office, and which for some time has lain under Examination, as it still is, being not yet finally determin'd and decided, having first seen all the Articles and Pleas which have been exhibited and set forth of her part, together with the answers made thereto, and given in on the part of the said most illustrious and powerful Prince Henry VIII; having likewise seen, and diligently inspected the Informations and Depositions of many Noblemen and other Witnesses of unsuspected veracity exhibited in the said Cause; having also seen, and in like manner carefully consider'd not only the Censures and Decrees of the most famous Universities of almost the whole Christian World, but likewise the Opinions and Determinations both of the most eminent Divines and Civilians, as also the Resolutions and Conclusions of the Clergy of both Provinces of England in Convocation assembled, and many other

wholsom Instructions and Doctrines which have been given in and laid before us concerning the said Marriage. Having farther seen, and with like diligence inspected all the Treaties and Leagues of Peace and Amity on this account, enter'd upon, and concluded between Henry VII. of Immortal Fame, late King of England, and the said Ferdinand of glorious Memory, late King of Spain, having besides seen, and most carefully weigh'd all and every of the Acts, Debates, Letters, Processes, Instruments, Writs, Arguments, and all other things which have pass'd, and been transacted in the said Cause at any time, in all which thus seen and inspected, our most exact care in examining, and our most mature deliberation in weighing them, hath by us been us'd, reserving herein whatsoever of right ought to be by us reserv'd. Furthermore the said most illustrious and most powerful Prince King Henry VIII. in the fore-mention'd Cause, by his proper Proctor having appear'd before us, but the said most Serene Lady Catharine in contempt absenting her self, (whose absence may the Divine Presence always attend) by and with the advice of the most Learned in the Law, and of Persons of most eminent skill in Divinity, whom we have consulted in the Premises, we have found it our Duty to proceed to give our final Decree and definitive Sentence in the said Cause, which accordingly we do in this manner. Because by Acts, Warrants, Deductions, Propositions, Exhibitions, Allegations, Proofs and Confessions, Articles drawn up, Answers of Witnesses, Depositions, Informations, Instruments, Arguments, Letters, Writs, Censures, Determinations of Professors, Opinions, Councils, Assertions, Affirmations, Treaties and Leagues of Peace, Processes and other matters in the said Cause as is above-mentioned before us laid, had, done, exhibited, and respectively produc'd, as also from the same and sundry other Reasons, Causes and Considerations, manifold Arguments, and various kinds of proof of the greatest Evidence, Strength and Validity, of which in the said Cause we have fully and clearly inform'd our selves, we find, and with undeniable evidence and plainness, see that the Marriage contracted and consummated, as is aforesaid, between the said most Illustrious Prince King Henry VIII. and the most Serene Lady Catharine, was and is null and invalid, and that it was contracted and consummated contrary to the Law of God. Therefore we Thomas, Archbishop, Primate and Legate aforesaid, having first call'd upon the name of Christ for direction herein, and having God altogether before our Eyes, do pronounce, sentence and declare for the nullity and invalidity of the said Marriage, decreeing that the said pretended Marriage always was, and still is null and invalid, that it was contracted and consummated contrary to the Will and Law of God, that it is of no force or obligation, but that it always wanted, and still wants the strength and sanction of Law, and therefore we sentence, decree and declare, that it is not lawful for the said most illustrious and powerful Prince Henry VIII. and the said most serene Lady Catharine, to remain in the said pretended Marriage; and we do Separate and Divorce from each other the said most illustrious and most powerful King Henry VIII. and the said most illustrious Lady Catharine, in as much as they contracted and consummated the said pretended Marriage de facto, and not de jure, and that they, so separated and divorc'd, are absolutely free from all Marriage Bond, with regard to the foresaid pretended Marriage, we do pronounce, decree and declare by this our definitive Sentence, and final Decree, which we now give, and by the tenor of these Presents publish.

The King hereupon (according to the Decree of the last Parliament) commands strictly Katharine should no more be call'd Queen, but Princess Dowager, and Widow of Prince Arthur; and dispatches Messengers both to Rome, and to the Emperor (then in Spain) to declare and justify the proceedings, not omitting together to satisfy Francis thereof, as shall be told in his place. The Oration made to the Emperor (whether by Doctor Hawkins then resident in his Court, or Sir Thomas Wyat, as Fox hath it) did in effect remonstrate, that since his Highness did still esteem him to be his Friend, Confederate and Ally, he thought good to acquaint him with his Actions, and among them, his Divorce, and therein particularly the Justice of the Cause, and order of the Process, in which nothing being omitted, which might satisfy himself or others, he hath found, at last, that the Marriage with Queen Katharine was indispenfable, as being against the Law of God, Nature, and Man; yet that herein he us'd not his own Judgment alone, or his Subjects (though enough to quiet his Conscience) but requir'd it of foreign parts and Universities, and among them those of Bononia (though depending of the Popes) and Padua (though menac'd by the Venetians) and hath found them, and many other, so consentaneous to his Divines, that (some few partial Places and Persons only excepted) they all determin'd in favour of his Highness Cause; the further confirmation whereof, by publick disputation and proof, he should willingly offer his Majesty, were it not too great an injury to that which is pass'd in this Realm, to dispute it in any other Country; especially when it is contrary to the Laws of the Land: So that he trusted his prudence would take it as a thing done, and justly done, and not to marvel if the King his Master, for the weal of his Soul, as well as benefit and peace of his Realm, had taken a course which otherwise he would so little have thought of, as he wisheth no such occasion had ever been given him; wherein, he hopes it will appear, how much respect is given both to the Pope and your Self, since otherwise his Highness should not have sent so many Ambassages to you both, or spent so many years in clearing these Points, without receiving yet any fruit but delay and insatisfaction. Infomuch, that he perceiv'd, after the Cause had depended almost seven years space, he was in a Labyrinth, out of which he saw no likelihood to get, had he not stept right forth at once to the Mazes end. Yet if this were all, he could better suffer it: For since at last the necessity of clearing his Conscience, and satisfying his People, had made him give a period to his Suits, the Pope not content with his former Vexations, cited him to appear at Rome, and publish'd divers slanderous Breves against him, requiring the Cause to be determin'd before him; though

K. orders her only the Title of Princess Dowager.

July 6. Notice of these proceedings sent to the Emperor.

1533. though a General Council hath long since determin'd that all matters should be ended, where they begun. So that if the Archbishop of Canterbury as Metropolitan of the Realm had at length given Sentence on the Kings part, he thought the question should not be so much, whether it were done according to the common fashion, as whether in it self it were right, whereof therefore he would treat with the Pope apart, desiring his Majesty howsoever to take well this Declaration, since his Highness reputing him still his friend, thought this accompt due to him, as hoping further, he would not be less friendly hereafter, than he had been heretofore. To which the Emperor answer'd little more that I can find, than that he well knew how matters pass'd, and that he would advise with his Council, what further was to be done; giving by this short and sharp Reply, just suspicion of preparing War against England, as he had more than once threatned. For which purpose, as 1529. he had practis'd with the Earl of Desmond in Ireland, so now he treated secretly with James King of Scotland, to whom also he sent his Order. Our King not ignorant hereof, takes occasion (upon expiration of the late five years Truce) to give ear unto the complaint of the Earl of Angus, (then at Burwick) and to permit Sir Arthur Darcy to enter the Country and forrage it. Which he did in April 1533, burning divers Towns, and carrying away much Booty. Pretending for cause thereof, the Restitution of the Douglasses. But while James, a valiant Prince (as his many Expeditions in Person against the Out-Laws did declare) prepar'd to be reveng'd, the French King taking notice of this difference compos'd it, though not without some difficulty. Notwithstanding which, the Treaty with the Emperor continu'd. For whereas the young King being not long since desirous to match in France, found some interruption, he hark'n'd now to an offer from the Emperor. And his faithful Servants thought it time, as having run no small hazard in his Night-walks. And now three Maries, all of the Emperors Family, were mention'd to him; his Sister Mary Dowager of Hungary, Mary of Portugal his Niece by his Sister Leonora, and Mary our Princess. Neither will the Reader think it so strange, that the Emperor presum'd here so far with our Kings Daughter, when he shall consider (as I find in our Records and Bellays History) that he offer'd her afterwards to the Dauphin; as intending, together with troubling this Kingdom, to make this Princess a reward of their Ambition who assist'd him. The answer which James return'd was, that he should most desire the Match with England, if conveniently it could be effected, saying yet that after her he would gladliest have a Daughter of his Sister of Denmark. But Charles saying, she was already promis'd, the business of Marriage ended so, for the present, the Treaty of friendship nevertheless being in some kind entertain'd. Whereof our King being advertis'd, labour'd to break it, proposing to his Nephew a Match with Isabel, Sister to Henry King of Navarre. For which purpose he also sent Henry Knevet to Margaret Queen of Navarre, who gladly entertain'd the motion.

This while, the Duke of Albany was sent by Francis unto the Pope, to treat in appearance of a War against the Duke, but really to conclude the design'd Marriage with Catharina de Medices, to whom the said Duke was near allied. Which Match though the Emperor had heretofore oppos'd; yet now considering how expedient it was for his Affairs to divide Francis from our King, he resolv'd privately to give assent to it, as judging fewer Inconveniences would follow that way, than if both Kings joyn'd against him. Before yet he would declare himself, he told the Pope he should require these Conditions from Francis. 1. To Innovate nothing in Italy. 2. To confirm again the Treaty of Madrid and Cambray. 3. To obtain some assurance from him, that he should consent to the calling of a General Council. 4. That he would labour effectually with the King of England not to proceed any further in his Divorce. To all which the Pope gave no other answer, but that he would mediate therein, being not able (as he alledg'd) to dispose otherwise of so puissant a Prince.

And now because the Reader may expect an account why this General Council, promis'd within a years space to the Germans, formerly by the Emperor, solicited by our King and Francis, submitted unto by the Protestant Princes, took yet no effect at the time appointed; I thought fit to deliver the chief passages thereof: Since I dare say no Age ever produc'd a juster occasion for the calling of it. Which therefore also I shall relate with more particularity, that none was more forward herein than our King, only when it might be held in some free place and manner; as knowing well that nothing either formerly had, or now, could more authorise any solemn Error, than a factious and partial Assembly, under what general or specious Title soever. Nevertheless, as it concern'd the Emperor in point of Honour and Advantage, chiefly to procure this work, our King and Francis were content a while to look on. And three Motives I find were presented by the Emperor to the Pope. 1. The settling of the business of Religion. 2. Resistance against the Turk. 3. Accommodation of differences betwixt Christian Princes. The Pope having receiv'd these, reply'd only, That he would commit the business to some principal Persons of his Council, who making this following Remonstrance, the Pope thought fit to send it to the Emperor; which finally was that concerning Religion, they thought it a dangerous point to admit Protestants or Hereticks to dispute any of the Opinions, which Holy Councils have formerly determin'd. Since thereupon also they might take occasion to call in question the Articles of Christian Faith. On the other side, when they were forbidden to defend their Doctrines, they might think themselves worse us'd than the Arrians and other Hereticks heretofore, and pretend they were condemn'd unheard, and so return home more obstinate than ever. Secondly, If they have contradicted the determinations of former Councils, what hope is there that they should stand to this? And what a scandal would it prove to be disobey'd? Besides, how unreasonable and hard would it be for the Pope to compel them to a strict observation of the Decrees establish'd there, when the Emperor and other Christian Princes, had so much to do both one against another, and against the Turk? Thirdly, That there was small likelihood of convincing the Protestants as long as they wholly adhere to the Letter of the Holy Scripture, without admitting the Interpretation of Fathers or Councils, who by Divine Inspiration may be thought to have clear'd many doubtful Places: So that if once they call'd in question the authority of the Church, there could be no ground for deciding Controversies. Fourthly, That it is probable, their demand of a Council was not so much with the intention to obey it, as to avoid the punishment due from the Magistrate; since their request was to have liberty of Religion till a Council had determin'd the Controversies, which could not be suddenly done. Fifthly, That the Protestants might find some excuse to depart before any Determination, as they did from the Diet at Augsburgh. Besides, if there were difference of Opinions, and some should condescend to an alteration in part, it might cause a Schism, and consequently a setting up of Council against 1533. against Council, or of Pope against Pope, as hath formerly happen'd. And again, that whether the Pope were declar'd above a Council, or a Council above the Pope, Inconveniencies would follow. Finally, That whether the Authority of convoking this Council were permitted to them, or to the Emperor, it might take up more time and years, than the Emperor could spare to attend it. 2. As for the second Motive of calling this Council, being the Invasion of the Turk, it was answer'd, That the Hostile preparatives being ready, and the Assembly of a Council in all likelihood so slow, it was more fit to think of taking Arms, than of entering into School Disputations, especially since under this colour, the Protestants might evade, alledging they were not oblig'd to contribute any thing till the business of Religion were settled, moreover, that this would but occasion the Turks coming, as knowing it would tend wholly to his damage and hurt, and consequently, would but hasten him the more to prevent it. Furthermore, that if the Council gave no content to the Protestants, it might cause them to seek Protection from the Turk, as the Wayvod of Transilvania had lately done, and under pretence of Evangelical Liberty seize on the Goods of the Church. These Motives from the Emperor, together with this politick answer of the Pope, being brought to Francis by the Seigneur de Praet, and his Reply requir'd thereunto, Francis after deliberation said, that notwithstanding there were Inconveniencies in calling a Council, there were far greater if they omitted it. It being certain there was never any other lawful and ordinary way for decision of Controversies in Religion. Inasmuch, that all future Ages would condemn not only his Holiness, but all the Christian Princes of the time when they did not procure it. Wherefore his Opinion was, that they should assemble a Council without yet neglecting the other point propos'd. And for this end, that all Christian Princes by their Letters, and Ambassadors should advise together before the Council were call'd, and each of them set down what they in their particular thought fit to be done. Whereupon, also, they should send to Rome jointly to demand a free and secure place of meeting, where the Points projected might be resolv'd. In discussion whereof, therefore, such intire and honest liberty should be permitted to all and every one, as they might frankly discover themselves. Only, that they should not interpose any thing concerning their private differences and quarrels. For the better performing whereof, it should be agreed that no decision of former Councils should be urged to the hindrance of an ingenuous and free communication concerning these Points; when yet it should be alledg'd that the questioning of former Acts would but open the way to frustrate this. Since it would give occasion unto many to withdraw themselves, who otherwise would be present at the Council. For preventing whereof, therefore, it were expedient that each of them should send their Ambassadors or Deputies with unlimited Commission to treat concerning the Points in Controversie. Which also should be laid down in Writing, to the intent that by common vote and consent they might afterwards be determin'd. With this caution, yet, that in the mean while all particular Enmities should be laid aside or quenched. And that till this were done, and the several Superiors of the said Ambassadors or Deputies acquainted with the proceedings (so that absolute power thereupon might be given them to conclude) it was unseasonable to call a Council. But if they chose this way, it would follow that either the inferior Number would submit to the greater, and consequently conform themselves to one common way in Religion, or at least they would remain without excuse, or cause of exception, when on so good and indifferent Terms the determination of a free Council had been offer'd them. All which he signified by his Ambassadors.

Feb. It was now toward the end of February 1533. when the Emperor receiv'd this Answer, who as he was disaffected to Francis, did easily misinterpret his meaning, taking all his Advice in a counter sense: First, Because he thought it unreasonable, that the Ambassadors of Christian Princes and Protestants should project the Points and Articles to be treated of in the said Council, since it could be thought no less than an Artifice and Invention, to restrain and diminish the Authority of the said Council, which together with all that could be treated therein, ought intirely to depend on the Inspiration of the Holy Ghost, and not upon the Opinions of Men. Secondly, Because Francis had made no particular Answer concerning Contribution for resisting of the Turk, as if he thought the Danger of his Neighbours in this kind did not concern him.

Which Remonstrance being brought (in form of a Reply or Complaint of the Emperor) to Francis: He answer'd, That he cou'd not but marvel how the Emperor should so much mistake him, since together with an ample Declaration of his Opinion concerning the Affair of Religion, he had declar'd likewise that the Ambassadors and Deputies should not neglect the other Point, whose Resolutions also concerning resistance of the Turk, he thought not only more effectual and proper than those of a Council, but of a quicker dispatch. And for the other Point concerning the restraint or diminution of the Council, it was sinisterly and malignly interpreted. For when they should send Ambassadors from all parts with so pure and sincere Affection and Zeal for the good of the Church, and defence of Christendom, he could do no less than believe that the Holy Ghost will assist and direct their Assembly. And howsoever that any thing concluded in this kind should be esteemed no more than as a beginning or preamble to the Council. Nevertheless for the giving more intire satisfaction to the Emperor, he thought fit to declare, that if the Emperor did not approve the said Assembly of Ambassadors, he for his part would mention it no further; only when the Emperor would but please to take notice that himself made the first Overture thereof, as by the Articles brought by Du Praet might appear. For the rest, he wish'd it might be a true Universal Council, and not a National or Provincial, as it must be term'd, when all Christian Nations did not assist therein. And as for War against the Turk, tho' he had already paid 1200000 Crowns, and must pay 800000 more, yet if the Turk in Person should assail Christendom, he would not only hazard his own Blood and his Subjects to oppose him, but hope the Emperor would do the like. But neither was the Emperor satisfied herewith. For as he thought Francis would make use of this Assembly for contriving some Design or Enterprize against him, so he secretly declin'd it. Francis likewise, as he was wholly won to the Pope, and intentive to the business of Italy, laboured not much to advance a business, so suspected and dangerous to the Roman See. So that the Diffidence and Jealousy betwixt these Princes broke off the Council at this time, when it seem'd so necessary for the Peace and Welfare of Christendom. Howbeit the Emperor (who departed from Genoa April 8. and was now in Spain) left he should be thought not to comply with his Promise, obtain'd from the Pope, that these following Conditions should be offered to John Frederic Elector of Saxony in the room of his Father, lately deceas'd. That it should be free and open to all, as in times past. That assurance should be given on both sides to stand to whatsoever should be decreed there. That they who could not be present, should send their Deputies. That in the mean while, nothing should be innovated. That the Place should be Piacenza, Bononia, or Mantua, at their choice. That if any Princes neither came themselves, nor sent, they should yet be concluded by the Decrees of the Council, and if they disobey'd, that the Emperor and other Princes should see Justice done. That if these Conditions were accepted, the Council should be summon'd within six Months.

1533. Months following the date hereof (being towards the end of March, or beginning of April, 1533) and held within a Year after. For more authorising of which Propositions, the Emperor commanded his Ambassadors to second the Legat. The Duke of Saxony hereupon, after deliberation with the other Protestant Princes and States at Smalcald, return'd this Answer: That the Council could not be free as long as the Pope, who was a Party, should sit as Judge. That the Cause of Religion, as being grounded on the Scriptures, should be determined by them, and not by School-Opinions. That the Place ought to be (as the Emperor had promised) in Germany, if it should be free and open unto all. Our Historians say also, that the Pope sent (in May) to our King to be present at the Council, or at least to send thither: But when the Messenger (being requir'd to it) shew'd a Commission, which had neither place nor time express'd, he was dismiss'd.

His Answer. June 30. While these things pass, our King by a Dispatch to Francis requires him to send hither some trusty Person, to whom he might with all Confidence communicate such things as could not fitly be committed to Paper; intreating also that the said Person might be instructed in all the Passages of Affairs (wheresoever) since the Interview. For though the King by Message, sent formerly by the Lord Rochfort, had acquainted Francis that he was privately married, yet as he had many Particularities to speak of, and might besides have use of the assistance which Francis had offer'd, so he desir'd one on that part to whom he might freely open himself. Hereupon Francis sends Guillaume du Bellay Seigneur de Langey with these Instructions: That he should persuade our King to be at the Interview betwixt the Pope and him, as being better able than any else to justify and defend his proper Cause, assuring him, that he should be as safe, both in his passage to, and stay there, as in his own Kingdom. Nevertheless if he thought not fit to come, that at least he should send one in whom he might repose intire Confidence. He was charged also to inform our King, how Francis had made those Ordinances concerning Horse and Foot, and Sea-busineses, which were agreed betwixt them. Lastly, he was commanded to desire our King's Advice concerning the Affairs of the Protestant Princes of Germany, who instantly crav'd their joint assistance.

March. 1533. 4. K. Henry files the Pope only Bishop of Rome. When Monsieur de Langey was come, and had expos'd these Particularities, our King answer'd: That since the Bishop of Rome (for so he now term'd the Pope) after many Diffimulations, and Delays, would not decide the business of the Divorce, he had for discharge of his Conscience referr'd it to the Archbishop of Canterbury, as being not able to support any longer the continual Vexations wherewith his Mind was afflicted. And that the said Archbishop and divers Bishops and principal Persons of the Clergy having sentenced a Nullity in his former Marriage, and declared the Dispensation for it void, as given in a Case which being ex Jure Divino, could not be dispensed with; he had thereupon privately married the Marchioness, without yet that he had intention to disclose it before May next. About which time he hoped also that the Interview betwixt his Master and the said Bishop would be, and that the said Bishop therefore would do him Justice. If not, that he would publish his Marriage, and withdraw himself totally from the Yoke and Dominion of the Bishop's Church. Concerning the Tyranny and Usurpation whereof, he had compos'd a large and ample Treatise; the Title whereof was, De Potestate Christianorum Regum in suis Ecclesiis, contra Pontificis Tyrannidem & horribilem impietatem, as Beutherus hath it; though (for my part) having seen no such Book, I conceive it was that De vera differentia Regia Potestatis & Ecclesiasticae, & quae sit ipsa virtus & veritas utriusque, made about this time; which nevertheless he said he would not publish, until he saw what Right the Bishop would do him; desiring the said King in the mean time not to abandon him, since the Bishop had vaunted, he would set all Christendom against him, which the Emperor also, in his Discourse with the Pope had averred, discovering how by the means of Scotland he would revenge his Aunt's Quarrel. Some Intelligence whereof was brought our King by the said Seigneur de Langey, who crossing the Seas from Boulogne to Dover, was assaulted by some Scotchmen of War, who hovering in our Seas to espy their Advantage, set upon the Gallion that Langey went in, so that had he not made use both of Sails and Oars, he had been overtaken or sunk; their number being superior, and Ordnance playing continually on him. They overtook yet a Ship of his Consort, which having Sails only, and not Oars, could not escape them. Monsieur de Langey being now dismiss'd, acquainted Francis with our King's Resolution. Whereupon also, he hasten'd his Interview with the Pope, which after variety of Places propos'd, was finally resolv'd at Marseilles, the Emperor's Ambassadors at Rome in vain opposing it.

And now the News of the Archbishop of Canterbury's Sentence, and open Marriage of Mistress Anne Bolen, being come to the Pope's Ears, and together with it an Information concerning the Book our King had compos'd against the Pope's Authority (which also more than any thing else offended him) the whole College of Cardinals, especially such as were for the Emperor, became humble Suppliants to the Pope, that he would proceed rigorously against our King; which also the Pope accorded, tho' not in that peremptory and publick manner as was afterwards done; for I find that this Sentence was not definitive in the principal Cause, (as the Imperials desir'd, and Sanders mistakes it) but only declarative in the Point of Attemptats, (as they call it) in that King Henry (the Cause yet depending) had divorc'd himself without the Leave and Authority of the Pope. Therefore it was declar'd that all his Actions herein were subject to a Nullity, and Himself to Excommunication, unless he restor'd things in integrum, for which time was allow'd him till the end of September following. These Proceedings being reserved, and the Censures thus suspended, argued that the Pope was willing before he went any further to see the success of his Interview with Francis, which was accelerated by this means. For as the Pope knew well that the Emperor was already sufficiently incens'd against the King, so it was easy for him to collect, that if he could gain Francis, nothing afterwards could hinder him to fulminate. And he had reason to chuse this way of Treaty; for I find all his Interviews succeeded well with him. Nevertheless, the Emperor as he knew not how far this new Treaty might extend, labours by his Ambassadors to retard it. But they failing, he took another course; for being advertis'd that the Pope intended to make use of some of his Gallies for this Journey, he sends a Command that they should be employed against the Turk. But neither could this keep back the Pope, who rather than not go, resolv'd to commit himself to the French Gallies, and so to pass to Marseilles. Things being thus advanc'd, our King (in conformity to the Proposition of Francis) sends the Duke of Norfolk, lately made Marshal of England, the Lord Rochfort, Sir William Paulet, Sir Anthony Brown, and Sir Francis Bryan, followed with some hun-

June 1. This while, our King being confident, that either by the Pope's good Permission, or his proper Authority, he should be able to justify a Cause which so many Universities had sentenc'd on his side, proceeds to the Coronation of his new Queen, which also was perform'd with much Solemnity. And the rather that the murmur of those who objected against the Irregularity and Deviation of our King's proceeding herein, might be hidden and recover'd in the Pomp. Shortly after which, our Historians say, Mary the Dowager of France dy'd, and was bury'd at St. Edmundsbury.

June 23. The Duke of Norfolk being now come to Francis (who was upon his Journey to Marseilles) acquaints him with part of his Instructions, which were to dissuade him from the Interview and Marriage propos'd, or, at least, to suspend it till the Pope had given our King satisfaction; offering also Aid for a War in Piedmont, if he would suffer no more Monies to go out of his Realm to Rome, and instead of the Pope to erect a Patriarch; which it seems was one of the private Articles treated betwixt them, at the Interview: But hearing, at the same time, of the Declaration past at Rome against our King, he thought it too late to expect any Favour from the Pope, and therefore demanded leave to return. Notwithstanding which Francis desir'd his stay, promising all the best Offices and Assistance to our King he could require, as soon as he should come to Marseilles; protesting furthermore, that what Offence soever was done to our King, he would take as to himself. But the Duke being inform'd again, by our diligent Agents, what had past at Rome, would omit no longer to advertise the King. Therefore, he posted away the Lord Rochfort to acquaint his Highness with what was done, and to know his gracious Pleasure; whereupon, the King, upon advice with his Council, thought fit to revoke together with the said Duke, the Duke of Richmond, then living in the French Court, commanding also his Ambassadors with the Pope to return. Nevertheless, as Francis insisted with our King to send some other, if for no other end, yet at least to witness the earnestness and solicitation wherewith he would pursue the King's Affair with the Pope; so our King thought fit to send Stephen Gardiner, not long before made Bishop of Winchester, and Sir Francis Bryan, together with Sir John Wallop, to attend him at the Interview. And here it is probable, that Francis had many Designs, whereof also he resolv'd to prevail himself according to the occasion. For if he treated with the Pope, he no less entertain'd his former Correspondence with the Princes of Germany, who sent to him (then being at Tholouse) a Secretary of the Dukes of Bavaria, to tell him how, upon the Consignation of 100000 Crowns, which the said King by Treaty was oblig'd to pay in aid, and for the Restitution of the Duke of Wittenberg, whose Possessions were withheld by Ferdinand, they now all agreed that it should be put into the hands of the said Duke, desiring nevertheless that it might be done with all secrecy. To which Francis answer'd: That the Interview being past, he would send some one to acquaint him with his Intentions.

Aug. 8. This while the Duke of Albany being departed with the Gallies of France, to conduct the Pope to Marseilles, News was brought to Francis of the Death of one Merveilles, employ'd by Francis to Francisco Sforza (then in possession of the Duchy of Milan, by the Emperor's Favour, though not as yet of the Daughter of Denmark, formerly destin'd unto him;) the occasion whereof also I have thought worthy my relation. This Merveilles being a Milanese, had serv'd long in the French Court, and was now by the good leave of Francisco Sforza received as a secret Agent or Ambassador for Francis; the terms on which Sforza stood with the Emperor, not admitting a more ouvert access. The Servants of this Merveilles having a Quarrel with one Castiglione concerning some Words he had spoken against their Matter, did at last kill him in the Streets; which was reveng'd by the Magistrate on Merveilles himself, whose Goods he seized on, and afterwards by order of the Duke privately cut off his Head. Which being advertis'd to Francis, he fell into an extream Passion, saying, he was his Ambassador, and that herein the Law of Nations was violated. The resentment whereof also, as he thought common to all Princes, so he acquainted the Pope, Emperor, and other Potentates of Europe therewith, in high terms, not forgetting also to give our King a particular account thereof, together with his Intentions; protesting to them all, he would have Reparation. But when the Emperor had receiv'd his Letter, he return'd no other Answer, but that Merveilles had deserv'd death, and was justly punished, he being no Ambassador, but a Subject of the Duke of Milan's. Whereupon the French Ambassador hoping to satisfy the Emperor, shew'd him private Dispatches, by which it appear'd, that the Duke acknowledg'd him under that Title. Notwithstanding which, the Emperor made small account of them, as supposing the Quality of an Ambassador not wrong'd, as long as the Person in question (besides that he was no Subject of the French King) did not openly sustain the Dignity of his Place: Whereupon also this Act was so far from being chastised by him, that it did but hasten the Marriage of Sforza with Christine the King of Denmark's second Daughter, whom the Emperor immediately sent for, and gave much about the time that the Duke of Orleans married Catharina de Medices. Notwithstanding which, Sforza sent his Chancellor to Francis, alledging by way of Excuse, that Merveilles was no more but a private Person, though authoris'd sometimes to treat; neither was he ever acknowledg'd publicly by any other Title than his Vassal and Subject; so that not to have done Right to another Subject kill'd by his Procurement, had been to the derogation of Justice and his own Authority. Besides, he said Merveilles was such an outrageous and mischeivous Person, that he had been told divers times on the Duke's part, that he did not like of his abode there. As for the secret manner of his being put to death, he said, it was to avoid Ignominy, in case Francis for delivering some of his Messages (when there was occasion) should repute him his Ambassador. But the Excuse (as it imply'd some contradiction) did but exasperate Francis, who told the Chancellor, that if intire satisfaction were not given, he would in some fitting time and place procure it.

About this time, the Queen being brought to bed of the Princess Elizabeth, (who happily succeeded to this Crown) the Christening following shortly after, with much Solemnity, where the Archbishop of Canterbury was Godfather, and the Dutchess of Norfolk and Marchioness of Dorset Godmothers. Howbeit the divorced Katharine and her Daughter were not only much grieved, but divers that favour'd her Cause, writ, and spoke against the late Marriage: A Nun of Kent also, pretending to prophesy thereon, of whom and her feigned Miracles (about this time discover'd) we shall make mention hereafter.

Marseilles, where Montmorency received him. His publick entrance into the Town (being the next day after his arrival) was in a rich Chair, carry'd on the Shoulders of two Men, himself wearing his Pontifical Ornaments, (the Tiara or Triple Crown only excepted) before him a white Hackney was led, on which the Sacrament was carry'd. After him follow'd all the Cardinals, and his Niece Catharina de Medices (the Dutches of Urbin) with a great Train of Cavaliers and Ladies. Francis at the same time, that he might seem to give the Pope intire possession of the Town, going out thereof, but the next day returning thither, and after many Complements to the Pope, coming to business, the intended Marriage was concluded, the Pope himself marrying the young Couple. Her Portion in Money was but little, being only but 100000 Crowns, but in Expectation and Titles great; since a pretence to Urbin in the Right of her Father Lorenzo de Medici, to whom Leo X. gave the Investiture to the disinherison of Francisco Maria Conte di Feltri, (who at this present was in possession thereof) as also the Donation of Reggio, Modena, Rubiera, Pisa, Ligorno, Parma and Piacenza by the Pope, or something equivalent to them, did make her thought a Match worthy of the Son of Francis, especially, when so potent a Prince should undertake her Cause, not without hope of uniting these places to the Rights he claimed in Italy. After which, the Pope was often solicited by Francis in the behalf of our King, that at least the time of declaring the Censures against him might be prorogu'd. But the Pope answering only, that tho' the term prefix'd for Fulmination were now past, yet he would omit further process till he came to Rome. Our Agents not content herewith, proceed in their Instructions, and Edmund Bonner (as I find by an Original of his to our King) getting Audience of the Pope, November 7. in respectful terms, and under protestation that his Majesty intended no contempt of the See Apostolick or Holy Church, intimated to him King Henry's Appeal to the next General Council lawfully assembled, exhibiting also the Authentick Instruments thereof (made before the Bishop of Winchester;) at which the Pope being much incens'd, said, he would refer it to the Consistory. Which being held Nov. 10. he answer'd Bonner, That, concerning the King's Appeal, he rejected it, as being unlawful, and against a Constitution of Pope Pius. Secondly, for the Council, he would procure it, as belonging to his Authority, and not to King Henry's. Thirdly, for the Original Instruments (which Bonner required back) he denied them, and so dismiss'd him; desiring Francis only, that he would persuade our King to conform himself to his ancient Devotion and Obedience to the Roman Church. Shortly after which, being the twelfth of November 1533. the Pope return'd. I find moreover that the Archbishop of Canterbury at this time suspecting the Pope would proceed against him, by the advice of our King made his Appeal also to the Council: Which he desir'd our Agents to intimate to the Pope. The success whereof yet doth not appear in our Records.

The P's
Answer.

Here also, at the requisition of Francis, he made four French Cardinals, which added to six more, who held that Dignity, made the Emperor see that the Pope intended to strengthen the French Party in Rome. Besides, as the Pope did fear lest Francis should usurp upon the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction in his Kingdom, he gave him the Nomination of the Heads and Chiefs, not in Monasteries alone, but in all Elective Benefices in his Kingdom; which was politickly done; for he prevented thereby that Power which Francis might have assum'd, especially when he had stood to the Conventions he made with our King at their last Interview. By which means also, he dispos'd Francis to oppose the Emperor about calling a Council, shewing together how inconvenient it would be to the Roman Church, as Affairs then stood.

Francis not forgetting, this while, to send to Germany, both in favour of the Duke of Wittenberg, and to comfort the Protestant Princes in their Perseverance, promised to do all that he could for them in a defensive way: He omitted not also to send Jehan du Bellay, Bishop of Paris, to our King, both to acquaint him with all the Passages at Marseilles, and to induce him to send Ambassadors to Rome to treat with the Pope concerning the suspending of this Fulmination, which he said highly concern'd him. But our King, who was in some part acknowledg'd already Supremum Caput Ecclesie in his Dominions, replying he would advise with his Council hereof, one who much favour'd the Papal Authority, spake in this manner.

Sir, Your Highness is come to a Point which needs a strong and firm Resolution, it being not only the most important in its self, that can be presented, but of that consequence as will comprehend your Kingdom and Posterity. It is, whether, in this business of your Divorce, and second Marriage, as well as in all other Ecclesiastical Affairs in your Dominions, you would make use of your own, or of the Papal Authority? For my part, as an Englishman, and your Highness's Subject, I must wish all Power in your Highness: But when I consider the ancient Practice of this Kingdom, I cannot but think any Innovation dangerous: For if in every Temporal Estate it be necessary, not only to keep order, but to come to some Supreme Authority, whence all inferior Magistracy should be deriv'd, it seems much more necessary in Religion, both as the Body thereof seems more susceptible of a Head, than any else, and as that Head again must direct so many others. We should above all things therefore labour to keep an Unity in the Parts thereof, as being that sacred bond which knits and holds together not his own alone, but all other Government. But how much, Sir, should we recede from the Dignity thereof, if we (at once) retrenched this his chief and most eminent Part? And who ever liked that body long whose Head was taken away? Certainly, Sir, an Authority received for many Ages, ought not rashly to be rejected; For is not the Pope Communis Pater in the Christian World, and Arbitrer of their Differences? Doth he not support the Majesty of Religion, and vindicate it from neglect? Doth not the holding of his Authority from God, keep Men in awe, not of Temporal alone, but Eternal Punishments, and therein extend his Power beyond Death it self? And will it be secure to lay aside these potent means of reducing People to their Duty, and trust only to the Sword of Justice, and Secular Arm? Besides, who shall mitigate the Rigour of Laws in those Cases, which may admit exception, if the Pope be taken away? Who shall presume to give Orders, or administer Sacraments, or grant Pardons, Dispensations, Indulgences, and other Mysteries of the Church? Who shall be Depositary of the Oaths, and Leagues of Princes, or fulminate against the perjur'd Infractions of them? For my part, (as Affairs now stand) I find not, how either a General Peace among Princes, or any equal Moderation in Human Affairs, can be well conserv'd without him. For as his Court is a kind of Chancery to all other Courts of Justice in the Christian World; so if you take it away, you subvert that Equity and Conscience which should be the Rule 1533. Rule and Interpreter of all Laws and Constitutions whatsoever. I will conclude, that I wish your Highness, as my King and Sovereign, all true Greatness and Happiness, but think it not fit (in this case) that your Subjects should either examine by what Right Ecclesiastical Government is innovated, or inquire how far they are bound thereby; since, besides that it might cause Division, and hazard the Overthrow both of the one and the other Authority, it would give that Offence and Scandal abroad, as Foreign Princes would both reprove and disallow all our Proceedings in this kind, and together upon any occasion, be dispos'd easily to join against us.

To which was reply'd by one in this manner.

SIR, If he who propos'd this Question, had resolv'd it as well, I should not have needed to return an Answer. But since from Principles we admit as true, he draweth Consequences which follow not, I shall according to common reason crave leave to examine his Arguments, without insisting upon any thing urged out of either Testament, or controverted by the Theologians of this time. Nothing is more certain, than that there is a necessity of establishing some Supreme Power in Spiritual as well as Temporal Affairs; only the Question will be, whether they be better united in one Person, or divided into two? I am for one, especially while the Precincts of both be of the same extent, and the Magistrate no way obnoxious: For can we suppose a Government without Religion, or a Religion without a Government? Will the bare Precepts of Theology contain People in their Duties, unless the Secular Arm concur? Or, the inflicting Punishment with a high hand suffice to teach a good Life, or bring Men to Everlasting Happiness? Besides, can a Kingdom be safe, if the Secular Magistrate command one thing, and the Spiritual another? Must not the Subject on these terms be suspended betwixt his Obediences, or distracted into some Schism or Rebellion? Which Inconveniences as they cannot be deny'd, so neither do Examples want thereof, both anciently betwixt Emperors and Popes, and of latter times as well in this Kingdom as divers others, where not only Scandal and Dissention, but even Ruins and Desolation follow'd on this occasion. It being manifest thus, how fitly both Powers are conjoined, the next Question will be Who is most proper to exercise them in this Kingdom? But it is clear that Popes are not. For besides that they want Title, Succession, Election, Possession, or whatsoever else may establish Government for the Temporal Part, they cannot so much as aptly administer the Spiritual, while the distance betwixt us and them is so great, that they neither can take timely notice of the Proceedings and Deviations of the Clergy, or give that order and redress which is fitting; so that although by a frequent admitting of Appeals to Rome, they strive to take away this Difficulty, it is rather increased. The Causes brought thither being sometimes undecided for a long space, sometimes wholly frustrated, while People had rather let fall their Sutes, than be at the cost of bringing their Witnesses with them to so remote a place, as neither their Health or Means can reach unto. Of which, as also many other Inconveniences in this kind, the Germans in their Centum Gravamina have not long since complain'd, without that the whole Court at Rome could devise a due Remedy, as long as the determination of Ecclesiastical Affairs was so commonly avok'd thither. Whereby it follows that the Pope as being neither Secular Magistrate

1533. in this Kingdom, nor within a just distance to exercise the Spiritual, cannot lawfully pretend to an absolute Power in either Jurisdiction. It remains, that Princes of this Kingdom successively assume it, both as their Person and Office hath in it a mixture of the Temporal and Spiritual Power, and as the Precincts they claim in Ecclesiastical Affairs are no longer than their Swords can reach to, and secure, nor their Interests other, than to conserve at home a perpetual Peace of Religion; which also will be with so much Advantage to their Subjects, as while the same Authority animates and gives life unto all, none of the Members can easily prevaricate, or fall away. If any yet will deny this Maxim, he may be convinc'd by Examples of Popes themselves, who practise this mixed Power not only in their Territories about Rome, the Patrimonio della Chiesa, but in their more remote Dominions, with that singular benefit to their Vassals, that they more than any other in Italy, are exempt from being drawn into contrary parts. So that if it be clear as well by Reason as by Precedents, that both Powers may subsist together, and be exercis'd by one and the same Person, I think none will deny, but that it will be so much the more equal, to place them in a Temporal than a Spiritual Monarch, as it imports more to give good Laws, and exhibit Justice, than to dispute Controversies (where the grounds of Religion are already settled) and to resist Foreign Invasions, than to declaim against Vice, and the Non-payment of Church-Duties: Out of which therefore may be concluded, That there is no more necessity of a Pope over us, or (if you will) over all Churches in the World (when they could be converted to Christianity) than to assign one Universal Monarch over it. There being in the Frame of Government as well as all other Bodies, a certain Symmetry and Proportion, beyond which it cannot conveniently be dilated. These things thus appearing, it may be considered now, whether the Pope have not yet another Incapacity for swaying all the Ecclesiastical Affairs of this Kingdom, in his being so obnoxious to other Princes. But this also is evident, since the French and Spaniard so constraining him on either side, that he must submit to the stronger, or suffer such Imprisonment and Outrages as he hath lately done, it will be dangerous to constitute him our Supreme Judge in these Affairs of Religion, which regard matter of State. For suppose he would be impartial between such Princes as may press him equally, Shall we presume he will be so to us, who stand not in the same relation of Nearness and Interest unto him? Nevertheless, I shall easily grant that he may wish us well, or bestow his Blessing on us; but where his Person or Estate will be concern'd, I do believe it would be so unsafe for him to do us Right, that it would be an unmannerly thing to ask it. But may he not in some Cases yet be retain'd as Judge in Ecclesiastical Affairs, and Arbitrator of the Differences of Christianity? For my part I shall accord it, as long as he complies with his place of Communis Pater. But if through Interdictions, Censures, Excommunications, Fulminations, and the like, he proscribe, and exterminate those, who otherwise might give him a due respect, doth he not relinquish his Name? Especially while without regard to the Quietness of Men's Consciences, the Peace of Christianity, or the Unity of Religion, (which might easily follow, when the unnecessary Points were laid aside) he (for the conservation of his Authority in this Kingdom only) procures Foreign Princes to invade it. Whereupon therefore, he so little exerciseth his Pastoral Charge, (instituted at first for the Safeguard and Ease of the Secular Magistracy) as he now di-

1533. flurbeth all, whereas he ought so much rather to use a discreet Moderation, as he sees that Princes can both reign without him, and contain their Subjects (whether Spiritual or Temporal) in their accustomed Obedience and Devotion, out of which therefore he may collect, that until these Ecclesiastical Affairs be permitted to Princes, which cannot aptly be determin'd without them, there will be small hope of an accommodation. And for these Reasons also, we can as little admit him Arbitrer of the Temporal Causes betwixt us, and any other Christian Prince, though otherwise the Function be so necessary, as (it seems) there is no so good means for avoiding the many Wars, and deciding the Controversies betwixt them. But it is alledged still, That in deserting the Pope's Authority, some diminution of Religion may follow: Alas! if Religion stood not on firmer Principles than these, it were worse grounded than any other Knowledge; For were not the Laws of Piety and Goodness so written (at first) in the heart, as Mankind had no other Direction for attaining his everlasting Happiness, for about two thousand Years, and until the Decalogue was given? And is that again any thing else but an Explication of these Laws? Besides, is there not a Doctrine of Faith deliver'd us in some part of our Belief or Creed (and I say in some, for the beginning thereof, as well as certain Articles towards the end, are general Notions both written in our Hearts, and received in all Religions.) And have we not through the Reverend Authority of the Church for many Ages, declaring and confirming this Faith, accepted thereof, and the Ten Commandments, and therein submitted our selves to all that is required in either Testaments, and will they yet exact new Beliefs, and obtrude new Articles? When the Laws of God, only written in Men's Hearts, and the Decalogue, for so many Ages were thought to suffice for Salvation. Let them say what they will; I find no reason to believe, that the Divine Wisdom imposeth more, or proceedeth by other Rules than those that were deliver'd to our Fore-fathers; or that some such obliquation of Religion hath happen'd as the course of his Providence should be varied too. And therefore, though I shall be content, that the Illustration or Explication of some Points may be worth the Churches Labour, I can never agree that the Principles and Foundation of this Structure should be stirr'd, or exhibited on other terms. Neither indeed should the Roman Church in true Wisdom procure it, the Majesty of Religion being no ways so well conserv'd, as by asserting such a Perfection, Antiquity, Universality, and Visibilty in the more necessary parts thereof, as may argue the Care which God hath over Mankind in all Ages, without omitting, together, to represent the Doctrines of Faith, and of God's Mercy, in middle times after such manner, as may be for our Instruction. And thus their Auditors, being informed, not only what parts of Religion have been received in all Ages and Countries, but what his particular Providence hath added in sequent times, may glorify him for both. Nevertheless, if Popes shall be so far from these charitable and temperate ways, as they will still intermix and trouble all things; if they shall confound and join together the certain, and the uncertain, and compel Men equally to the Belief of all they teach, ought not Princes in this case to prevent Distractions? Ought they not to extinguish Usurpations in Religion, and together, vindicate her from Error and Neglects? While in giving a due Lustre and Protection with the Temporal Sword, they make her become more Reverend and Awful. Which Duty also is so much more requisite in them, as it is not in the Power of any else to perform it. Neither should we fear, lest our Princes should grow too absolute thereby; when it is the most assured way for conserving, not the outward only, but inward Peace in this Kingdom. Not that this Authority may be at length devolv'd to such as would abuse it; there being a possibility of bad Popes, as well as bad Princes. And that Incommodum non solvit Argumentum. And thus, Sir, may all Innovation be taken away in Religion, and all Defects restored by your Highness in your Dominions, without either suffering Sophistry or Pedantism to be taught instead of true Doctrine, or that the Hierarchy of your Kingdom should be devested from their ancient Dignities and Rights. Since as your Highness pretends not to create new Articles of Faith, they may continue still to expound the old, in their several kinds, and give light to the hard places in the Scripture, read Divine Service, administer Sacraments, and the like, and together, exhort Men to Piety, Charity, Good Life, Repentance, and whatever else may conduce to Everlasting Happiness: Whereof also when the Pope would take such notice, as to confirm and approve our Proceedings, we might (if your Highness so pleas'd) return that respect to him, as, upon his Publick Declaration, that he doth not only ratify our Confession of Faith, but relinquish all his Pretences, which may derogate from your Regal Authority, and behave himself (for the rest) tanquam Communis Pater, such Points might be refer'd to him, as your Clergy could not conveniently determine, and his Dignity together, be so far forth acknowledg'd, as he might still retain a Primacy, according to his ancient Patriarchal Right, without intermeddling yet with that Supremacy, which your Convocation-house hath already decreed for your Highness. And now to come to the present Question concerning the Divorce; I must say, I cannot find what the Pope should take ill. For is any thing done by our Archbishop, but what, not only the Pope himself, but the most famous Universities of Christendom have declared lawful? So that, if after six Years suspension of the Cause, we have determined the business, as himself confessed he would have done, but for fear of the Emperor; What offence can he take? Will he complain, he is not able to do us Justice, and yet be scandalized if it be done by others? Or shall the executing of what he thought reasonable, be judg'd a Fault, when the not executing thereof must (in all Equity) have made us the greater Criminals? Let us therefore send to desire his Consent. It hath been already intimated unto us, that it was not so good to ask a Licence, as a Pardon, we will hope then from him a Confirmation of the Archbishop's Sentence. And thus both the one and the other Authority may be conserv'd, without that we should need to fear any Foreign Invasion, as long as the general Vote of our Kingdom shall establish what (in a fort) it hath agreed unto.

And to this Opinion our King inclined, and so much the rather, that about this time the Pope's Sentence against him was openly set up at Dunkirk in Flanders; so that to prevent further Inconveniences, the King (as our Records shew) advised with his Council December 2. First, To inform his Subjects of his Appeal to the Council General, and the Justice thereof. Secondly, Of the Unlawfulness of the Dowager's Appeal to Rome, and the late Statute against it, which said Statute was (for that purpose) to be set upon every Church Door in England, as also his Majesty's said Provocation, or Appeal, whereof Transsumpts also were to be sent into Flanders. Thirdly, To 1533. To command it to be taught, that the General Council is above the Pope, and that he hath no more Authority in England by God's Law than any other Foreign Bishop. Lastly, to send into Germany, to confederate with the King of Poland, John King of Hungary; the Dukes of Saxony, of Bavaria, the Landgrave of Hesse, &c. as likewise the Hanse-Teutonic Towns, being Lubeck, Dantick, Noremberg, &c. These things being resolv'd on, for a final Answer, he desir'd the Bishop of Paris to certify Francis, That if the Pope would supersede from executing his Sentence, until he had indifferent Judges sent, who might hear the business, he would also supersede from the execution of what he was deliberated to do in withdrawing his Obedience from the Roman See. But the Bishop, who thought this alone not enough to reduce things into good terms, made an offer to Negotiate the business at Rome; which our King gladly accepted, assuring him withal, that as soon as he had obtain'd what was demanded, he would send sufficient Power and Authority to confirm as much as was accorded on his part, as having entire Confidence in his Discretion and Sufficiency, ever since his two Years Employment as Ambassador in this Kingdom. Whereupon the Bishop, though in Christmas Holydays, and an extreme Winter, posted to Rome: Where he came before any thing was done, more than what formerly past: And here obtaining a Publick Audience in the Consistory, he eloquently declared our King's Message, representing both what he had obtain'd of our King, and shewing withal how advantageous it would be to the whole Church. Which so prevail'd, that they prefix a Day for receiving from our King a Confirmation thereof. Inasmuch, that a Courier was dispatch'd to our King Henry, desiring his Answer within the time limited. But the term being expir'd, and no Answer brought, the Pope resolv'd to proceed to Fulmination of the Sentence; which being advertis'd to Bellay, he repair'd to the Pope and Cardinals, (then sitting in full Consistory) desiring them to stay a while, it being probable that the Courier, either through cross Winds, or other Accidents in long Journies, might be detain'd; concluding his Speech, that if the King of England had six Years together been patient, they might attend six Days; which space only he desir'd them to give him, for the receiving of our King's Answer; this Proposition being put to the question, the plurality of Voices carried it against our King, and the rather, that in this mean time, News came to Rome, that the King had printed and published the Book written against the Pope's Authority, (which yet was untrue, for it came not forth till afterward, though it was not yet kept so close, but a Copy was now come to the Pope's hands) and that there was a Comedy represented at Court, to the no little defamation of certain Cardinals. By reason whereof the Sentence was so precipitated, that, what according to their usual Forms could not be done in less than three Consistories, was now dispatch'd in one: And so by a final determination (the Copy whereof is in Fox) the Marriage with Queen Katharine was pronounced good, and King Henry commanded to accept her for his Wife, and in case of refusal Censures were fulminated against him. But two days of the six were not past, when the Courier arriv'd with ample Commission and Authority from our King, to conclude and confirm all that the Bishop had agreed in his Name. Which was this, (as the Writer of the Concilio Tridentino hath it) that King Henry was content to accept the Judgment of that Court, upon condition that the suspected and Imperial Cardinals should not intervene, and that indifferent Persons should be sent to Cambray to be inform'd of the Merits of the Cause; giving Authority further for his Proctors to appear in that Court. At which, the more wise and temperate Cardinals were so astonish'd, that they became humble Suppliants to the Pope, that he would advise how all things might be repair'd; whereupon the business was again discuss'd. But all Remedies being judg'd either late, or impossible, the Sentence stood, and the Emperor was made the Executor of it. The Bishop now returning toward France, met (as I find by our Records) Edward Karne and William Revet, who were employ'd by our King for soliciting this important business. But as they understood by the Bishop, that the first Marriage was pronounced good, and the Issue by it legitimate, so they judg'd it lost labour to proceed, and advertis'd all to our King, who became so sensible of the Indignity wherewith he was us'd in this important Affair, that he separated himself from the Obedience of the Roman Church, but not from the Religion thereof (some few Articles only excepted) as shall appear hereafter. And thus (according to the Relation of Martin du Bellay) did our King fall off. Who therefore in this present Condition found nothing so fitting to be done, as to cherish the good affection of his Subjects, who in a Parliamentary way he found did many ways advance and second his Designs. I shall for a conclusion add only the Censure of Thuanus, concerning our King in this business, Certe in reliqua vita ita se gessit ille Rex, ut eum, si aequiores & prudentiores Pontifices nactus fuisset, sponte se subjecturum ipsorum potestati fuisse appareret.

The Emperor (now in Spain) being much troubled at the Interview at Marzeilles, yet conniv'd at it, as hoping at least, the Pope would dissuade Francis from favouring our King, or assisting the Protestant Princes: Therefore he did not much endeavour to hinder it: For as he knew the Pope was passionately affected to the advancement of his Kindred, so he judg'd it lost labour to oppose him therein; since by ingrafting his Family now in France, as well as by his former Alliance with Spain, he might hold himself secure on either hand. Neither did he think that Terrors could prevail, at a time, when the Pope must know, there would be use of all the Imperial Forces against the Turk, who besides that he threaten'd a general Invasion, had now particularly besieged Corron, taken a Year since by Andrea Doria, which a Spanish Garrison held till they were forc'd to leave it again to the Turk about April 1534.

I will come now to the business of our Parliament, holden this Year from Jan. 15. till 30. of March next, wherein these Statutes were enacted:

That the Prices of Victuals should not be enhanced without just ground and reason. If they were, then upon complaint thereof, the Lord Chancellor (and others, who had Authority given them herein) should tax the said Victuals how they should be sold, either by the Owners or by Victuallers. Also that no Corn or Cartel be carried beyond Sea without the King's Licence, unless either to Calais, Guines, Hamme, and their Marches, or for Victualling of Ships, &c.

That no Man indicted of Murder, Burglary, or other Felony, and upon his Arraignment standing mute, to prevent the Process of the Law against himself, shall have benefit of his Clergy; but Law shall proceed against him for the Crime whereof he is indicted, as if he had pleaded to the same, and thereupon had been found guilty.

attainted.

Elizabeth Barton (call'd the Holy Maid of Kent) and Complices were attainted of High Treason, for conspiring to slander the Divorce between the King and Queen Katharine, and the late Marriage between him and Queen Anne.

Because by the greediness of some, who have gotten into their hands much Cattel, and many Farms, which they have turned from Tillage to Pasture (especially for Sheep) old Rents are raised, Prices of things enhanced, and so, much Poverty and Theft ensued; it was enacted, that no Man should have in his own or Farmed Lands above 2000 Sheep (yet that every Temporal Person may keep upon his Inheritance as many as he will.) Secondly, that no Man shall take and hold above two Farms at once, and those to be in the same Parish; upon certain Penalties there set down.

The Statute of Henry IV. concerning Hereticks was repeal'd. And it was Enacted, That Sheriffs in their turns, and Stewards in their Leets, may make Inquiry and Presentment of Hereticks; who being by two lawful Witnesses accused, may be cited and arrested by an Ordinary, and being convict in open Court, shall abjure their Heresies, and refusing so to do, or relapsing, shall be burnt.

Also the Statute of Richard III. permitting free Importation of all kinds of Books, was repealed. And (for the benefit of our Book-binders) it was Enacted, That no Bookseller should buy any Books bound beyond Sea; nor any (though unbound) of any Stranger, but by engross. And if the Prices of Books chance to be raised above reason, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, the chief Justice of either Bench, or any two of them shall moderate the same, upon a certain Penalty.

Whereas the Clergy have truly acknowledged that the Convocation is always assembled by the Kings Authority, and have promis'd his Majesty, that they will not henceforth make or allege any new Constitutions, without his Highness Assent and Licence; and whereas divers Constitutions and Canons Provincial and Synodal heretofore enacted, are thought to be prejudicial to the Kings Prerogative, and contrary to the Statutes of the Realm, and enormous to the People; and the said Clergy therefore hath humbly besought his Majesty, that the said Constitutions and Canons may be committed to the examination of thirty-two Men to be nam'd by his Majesty, viz. sixteen of both Houses of Parliament, and sixteen of the Clergy, who may annul or confirm the same, as they find cause; it is enacted that all Convocations shall be henceforth call'd by the Kings Writ, and that in them nothing shall be promulg'd or executed without his Highness Licence, under pain of Imprisonment of the Authors, and mulct at the Kings will. And that his Highness shall at his Pleasure (seeing the time of this Parliament is too short) appoint thirty-two Men, as aforesaid, to survey the said Canons and Constitutions, for the Confirmation or Abolition of the same.

And as concerning Appeals, they shall be made (according to the Statutes made the last year) from Inferior Courts, to the Archbishops, and for lack of Justice there, to the Kings Majesty in his Court of Chancery.

As concerning Amates us'd to be paid to Rome by Archbishops and Bishops, and Bulls and Palls to be had from thence, since there hath been heretofore an Act pass'd, and the Bishop of Rome, otherwise call'd Pope, being inform'd thereof, hath as yet devis'd no way with the Kings Highness for redress of the same; his Highness hath now confirm'd and ratified the same Act, and every Article thereof, and the Parliament doth enact the same, with this Addition, that from henceforth no Bishop shall be commended, presented or nominated by the Bishop of Rome, nor shall send thither to procure any Bulls or Palls, &c. but that at every vacation of a Bishoprick, the King shall send to the Chapter of the Cathedral a Licence (as of old hath been accustomed) to proceed to Election, which Election being deferr'd above twelve days next ensuing shall belong to the King, but being made within the time limited, shall be held firm and good, and the Person so elected, after certification of his Election to the Kings Highness, and Oath of fealty taken to him, shall be styl'd Bishop Elect; and so by his Majesty, be commended to the Archbishop of the Province, to be Invested and Consecrate. And if the Persons to whom this Election, or Consecration belongeth, neglect or refuse to perform the same, or admit, or execute any Censures, Interdictions, &c. to the contrary, they shall incur the penalty of the Law of Præmunire.

Whereas the People of this Land hath been much impoverish'd by the usurp'd exactions of the Bishop of Rome, under the Titles of Petence, Procuracion, Expedition of Bulls, Delegacies, Dispensations, &c. It is enacted that such Impositions be no more paid; and that neither the Kings Highness, nor any Subject of his, shall sue for any Dispensation, Faculty, Delegacy, &c. to the See of Rome, but that any such Dispensation, &c. for Causes not being contrary to the Law of God, which were wont to be had from Rome, may be now granted by the Archbishop of Canterbury, as well to the Kings Highness, as to his Subjects: But in those things which were not wont to be granted by the See of Rome, the said Archbishop shall not meddle, without the Kings Licence. Provided, that all Dispensations, &c. whose Expedition at Rome came to four pounds and upwards, shall be confirm'd by the Kings Seal, and enroll'd in Chancery, those below four pounds passing under the Archbishops Seal only. That the Fees for these Dispensations shall be limited by the said Archbishop, and the Lord Chancellor, and a part of the same (be they great or small) shall always come to the Kings hands. As for all Monasteries, Colleges, Hospitals, heretofore exempt, the King only, and not the Archbishop should have Authority to visit them.

Lastly, upon the Suit of Parliament to the King for the establishing of the Succession to the Crown (the uncertainty whereof hath caus'd heretofore great division and bloodshed in this Realm) it was enacted, that the Kings Marriage with the Lady Katharine, Wife and carnally known to his Brother Prince Arthur (as was lawfully prov'd before Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury) as contrary to Gods Law, shall be held void: and she styl'd no more Queen, but Dowager to Prince Arthur, and the Matrimony with Queen Anne shall be taken for firm and good; and the Issue thence procreate be accounted lawful; the Inheritance of the Crown to belong to the same in manner following, (viz.) First to the eldest Son begotten by the King on Queen Anne, and to the Heirs of the said Son lawfully begotten; and for default of such Heir, then to the second Son, &c. and if Queen Anne decease without Issue Male, then the Crown to descend to the Son and Heir of the Kings Body lawfully begotten, and the Heirs of the said Son lawfully begotten, and for a default of such Issue, to the second Son in like manner, &c. And for default of Sons, that then the Crown shall belong to the Issue Female of the King by Queen Anne; and first

And for default of all such Issue, to the right Heirs of the Kings Highness. It was ordain'd that this Act shall be proclaim'd before May next throughout the Kingdom. And all Persons of Age shall swear to accept and maintain the same. They who refuse the Oath standing guilty of Misprision of High Treason; and they who speak or write against the Marriage or Succession here establish'd, to be adjudg'd Traitors.

Besides all this, the present Statute express'd certain Degrees of prohibited Marriage; (amongst which, that between the Brother and the Brothers Wife, was one) which being against Gods Laws, could not be dispenc'd with by Man, and therefore no such Marriages shall hereafter be made; and those that are made already shall be by the Ordinary dissolv'd, and those that are already so dissolv'd, shall be esteem'd justly and lawfully dissolv'd, and the issue thence proceeding Illegitimate.

March 30. The Parliament rising, Commissioners were sent abroad to require the Oath of Succession, which nevertheless John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, and Sir Thomas More, late Chancellor, deny'd, yet so as they both profess'd a readiness to swear to the Succession, but not to the whole Act, (it containing divers other things. First, the indispensability of the first Marriage, as being against the Law of God. Secondly, of the legal proceeding in the Divorce by Cranmer: Thirdly, some touches against the Popes Authority, &c.) But which of these in particular offended them, they would not discover; therefore though Archbishop Cranmer told Cromwell it were not amiss to accept the Oath as they offer'd it, both for satisfaction of the People, and the Dowager with her Daughter, and the Emperor (who much rely'd on these Mens Authority,) they yet refusing, were sent to the Tower, where they continu'd till they were brought forth to their Tryal and Death, as will appear hereafter.

April 17. And are imprisoned.

The Pope having proceeded in those Rigorous terms with our King (as is formerly mention'd) and for more authorising his Sentence, made the Emperor Executor thereof, hop'd now to have his Revenge, but he was deceiv'd. For though the Emperor did gladly accept this Overture, for his Aunt Queen Katharine's sake, and the hope he had to dispose of the Princess Mary, as Inheritor of the Crown, yet as he had deeper designs, in aspiring to the Conquest of Italy, and indeed to an Universal Monarchy, he was no less glad of the occasion to take off our King from the Pope; howsoever each side prepar'd for War. The Emperor's intention was, to give the Princess Mary to some one, who upon her Title might pretend to the Crown, whom therefore he promis'd to second. Our King and Francis not ignorant of the Emperor's designs, agreed on the other side, partly to joyn with the Duke of Gueldres for invading the adjoining Territories to France, and partly to renew the ancient Claim to Navarre, and assail the Emperor in those quarters. Yet neither did that of the Emperor take effect, because there was no means to recover the Person of the Princess Mary. Nor this of our Kings, because Francis employing his thoughts wholly on the affairs of Italy, did not think fit to comply openly with one against whom the Pope had Fulminated. Howbeit, our King for defence of his Authority and second Marriage, neglected not to obtain from the Parliament a confirmation thereof, and of the Succession in that Line (as is mention'd before;) sending also to Queen Katharine at Bugden near Huntingdon, in sequence thereof, Edward Lee, Archbishop of York, and Cutbert Tonsall, Bishop of Duresme, to signify unto her, that he took it ill that she still claim'd the Title of Queen, &c. the passages of which Negotiation I have thought fit to transcribe out of the Original Record, as containing many material points concerning the whole frame of the business.

Their Letter to the King, was this.

1534. Please it your Highness to understand, that An this day we repair'd to the Princess Dowager, and there I the Archbishop of York, for an Introduction to declare to her the effect of our Commission, said to her, First, that your Highness had often sent to her divers of your Council, and amongst them me, one, to declare unto her the invalidity of the Marriage between your Highness and her. Secondly, that Carnal knowledge, which is the great Key of the matter, is sufficiently prov'd in the Law, as also some that were of the Council do avow. Thirdly, that upon proof so sufficiently made of Carnal knowledge, Divorce was made between your Highness and her. Fourthly, that upon Divorce made by lawful Sentence, she was admonish'd to leave the name of a Queen, and not to account or call her self hereafter your Highness Wife. Fifthly, how that after your Highness was discharg'd of the Marriage made with her, you contracted new Marriage with your dearest Wife Queen Anne. Sixthly, that for so much as (thank'd be God) fair Issue is already sprung of this Marriage, and more likely to follow, by Gods Grace, that the whole Body of your Realm gather'd together in Parliament, hath for the stablishment of this Issue, by your dearest Wife Queen Anne, and the Succession coming of this Marriage, made Acts and Ordinances against all them that would in word or in deed withstand them, and that for these purposes, we were sent to her Grace, to the intent she might understand the true purpose of these Acts, with the pains; lest by Ignorance she should fall in any of them, and so I declar'd the Act. Which thing being thus declar'd to her, she being therewith in great Choler and Agony, and always interrupting our words to the aforesaid Points, made these Answers following. To the first, that she took the Matrimony between your Highness and her for good, and so always would account her self to be your Highness's lawful Wife, in which Opinion she said she would continually (till Death) persist. To the second, she utterly denied that ever Carnal Knowledge was had between her and Prince Arthur, and that she would never confess the contrary, and with loud voice when mention was made of that point, she said, they ly'd falsly that so say'd. To the third, she answer'd, that she is not bound to stand to that Divorce made by my Lord of Canterbury, whom she call'd a Shadow, and that although he had given Sentence against her, yet the Pope had given Sentence with her, whom she took for Christs Vicar, and therefore would always obey him, as his faithful Daughter. To the fourth, she answer'd, that she would never leave the name of a Queen, and she would always take her self for your Highness Wife. To the fifth, she said that this Marriage, made after her Appeal, which she made by your Highness leave and consent, is of no value. To 1534. To the sixth, she answer'd, that she is not bound to the Acts of the Parliament, for so much as she is your Highness Wife, and not subject to your Highness, and also because these Acts were made by your Highness Subjects in your favour, your Highness being party in this matter; with divers other unseemly words. Unto which her Answer I the Bishop of Duresme replying, forasmuch as she had said in her Communication, that both I and the residue of her Council had always shew'd unto her, that her matter is just and good; I said that all the question whereupon we were consulted at such time as the Legates were here, depended only upon the validity of the Bull and Breve, albeit I said, that sith that time divers other questions had risen and been debated by many Universities, the chief of Christendom, of which one was Bononia, the Popes own Town; and by them concluded, that after the decease of the Brother, who had had Carnal knowledge with his Wife, the Brother living might not marry the said Wife by any Dispensation of the Pope, because it was forbidden by the Law of God. And forasmuch as the Pope (albeit the said Conclusions, have been by Learned Men sent from your Highness, declar'd unto him) never made answer to maintain lawfully his power to the contrary, but rather in confirmation of the Opinions of the said Universities, said at Mar-seilles, that if your Grace would send a Proxie thither, he would give the Sentence for your Highness against her, because that he knew that your Cause was good and just, which his saying was according also to an Epistle Decretal sent hither by the Legat Campejus, whereof the effect was, that if Marriage and Carnal knowledge were had betwixt Prince Arthur and her, the Legates should pronounce for the Divorce, according whereunto proofs were brought in before the Legats, and also since, before the Convocations of this Realm, and the Bishop of Canterbury, and by them allow'd and approv'd as sufficient and lawful: Whereby doth plainly appear, that the Sentence given by the Pope to the contrary was not vailable, because it pronounced the Dispensation, (which he had no power to grant, seeing it was against the Law of God) to be good; therefore I had now chang'd my former Opinion, and exhorted her to do the semblable, and forbear to usurp any more the Name of a Queen; specially for that the Sentence she sticketh so greatly unto, was given after your Graces Appeal to the Council General, and intimate to the Pope, so that it could not be vailable. And that if she should so do, she might thereby attain much quietness for her self, and her friends, and that she being conformable so to do, I doubted not but your Highness would suffer her to have about her such Persons as should be to her pleasure, and intreat her as your Graces most dearest Sister, with all liberty and pleasure, with divers other things which by her much enterlacing, I was forc'd to answer unto. The specialties whereof, and of her obstinacy, that she will in no wise, ne for any peril of her Life or Goods relinquish the Name of a Queen, we do remit for tediousness unto the Wisdoms and Discretions of my Lord of Ches-ster, Mr. Almoner, and Mr. Redell, who like as they have very substantially, wisely, and effectually, order'd themselves in the execution of the Premisses, so we doubt not, but that they will sincerely report the Circumstances of the same unto your Highness, whom we beseech Almighty God long to preserve in much Honour, to his Pleasure, and your Hearts desire. At Huntington the 21 day of May.

By your Highness most humble Subjects, Servants and Chaplains,

Notwithstanding which answers of the Princess Dowager, such was the gentleness of our King, as betwixt the memory of his former love and pity on her present Condition, contenting himself to have dissolv'd her Family, and remov'd from her all such as would not serve her as Princess only; he pass'd them over with much calmness. Howbeit he resolv'd to punish rigorously her Adherents, and particularly Elizabeth Barton (call'd the Holy Maid of Kent) who had almost stirred up more than one Tragedy; for being suborn'd long since by Monks, to use some strange Gesticulations, and to exhibit divers feign'd Miracles, accompanied with some Wisardly Unsoothsayings, she drew much Credit and Concourse to her, insomuch that no mean Persons, and among others Warham, late Archbishop of Canterbury, and Fisher Bishop of Roche-ster, and Sir Thomas More, gave some belief to her; so that notwithstanding the danger that was to give ear to a Prediction of hers, that Henry VIII. should not live one Month after this Marriage with Mistress Bolen, she was cry'd up with many Voices, Silvester Davius, and Antonio Pollioni, the Popes Agents here, giving Credit and Countenance thereunto. But the Plot being at last discover'd, she was attainted of Treason in the Parliament, and executed with her chief Complices shortly after. At which time also she confess'd their Names who had instigated her to these Practices, and whom she had acquainted with her Revelations. Among whom were More and Fisher; whom yet the King pardon'd upon their several Submissions, not suffering the Bills to pass, which were put into the Parliament against them.

After many bickerings betwixt the English and Scotch, a Truce first, and afterwards a Peace was concluded betwixt our King and King James. On the King of Scots part, March 23. came to London, William Stuart Bishop of Aberdeen, Robert Reid Abbat of Kinlos, and Adam Otterburne, a Lawyer. To treat with these on our Kings behalf, were appointed T. Audley Chancellor, Cromwel Secretary, and Edward Fox Almoner.

The Treaty was for perpetual Peace, which was concluded May 20. during their joynt Lives, and a year after, and Sworn by King Henry, Aug. 2. and by King James, July 9. It was also agreed, that King Henry shall deliver to the King of Scots the Fortres of Edrington, lately taken by the English, and the King of Scots shall not impute breach of Peace to King Henry, if he entertain Archibald Earl of Anguis his Brother, or his Uncle, and if the said Douglasses should chance to invade Scotland, Redress should be made according to the Laws of the Marches, and the Peace remain between the two Kings. Which that it might continue during their Lives, as was then agreed, Queen Margaret by Letters solicited Queen Anne and Cromwel the Secretary. While this Peace was treated, I find by our Records the Lord William Howard, Brother to the Duke of Norfolk, was sent into Scotland, to carry King James the Order of St. George, whereunto he was also accepted at Windfor the next year, July 28. he had Instructions also to acquaint him, with an Interview intended betwixt 1534. our King and Francis, whereat he was intreated to be present, and for this purpose to pass through his Kingdom, that they both together might go to Calais; which favour was acknowledg'd by James. But as the Interview in France was disappointed, so our King who desir'd much to confer with his Nephew, invited him to York. Whereupon King James propos'd the business to his Council, who judging Newcastle to be the fitter place, made an excuse for the present, promising yet the year following to meet, if he so thought good. Nevertheless, as our King well knew upon what ground this meeting was deferred, the Lord William Howard, and William Barlow, Elect Bishop of St. Asaph, were sent to make certain Overtures and Propositions to that King, whereof in its due place.

June 29. This year Charles the Emperor being in Spain, intente chiefly to the proceedings of the Turk, and his Brother Ferdinand in Germany, desirous to govern without home-opposition, such a Peace was accorded with the Duke of Wittenberg, and such favourable usage given the Protestant Princes, that the Pope complain'd openly of Ferdinand's Partiality to them. But Ferdinand excus'd all with reason of State. Which also the Pope accepted the rather, in that the Anabaptists (who taught a Doctrine more contrary to Monarchy than the Lutherans) did then prevail in many places, and particularly held Munster in Westphalia. So that because the Duke of Wittenberg, promised to contribute some Forces to the besieging of that place, he said he had concluded an advantageous Peace. For as no Man knew how far the Innovations of these times might reach, it was thought to be of much Importance, that they had drawn one side to oppose the other.

And are grievously persecuted. Duplex De Serr. King of France enters into a League with the Turk.

De Serr.

In France also about this time, the Doctrine of the Evangelicks began to take Root, though so covertly, that few durst openly avow it; yet as they found favour and protection from Margaret Queen of Navarre, and Anne Dutchesse d' Estampes, so the King himself, whether for deciding the Cause, or love of these two Ladies (whereof one was his Sister, and the other his Favourite) refus'd not to confer privately with divers of the Reform'd, and to give some such tacit assent to their Doctrins, as thereupon growing Audacious, they adventur'd to set up Papers in the Court, and publish Libels against the Church of Rome in such manner, as Francis being incens'd thereat, caus'd the Authors to be sought out, and burnt. Not yet but that he could have been content to have had some points reform'd, and the Papal Authority diminish'd a little, but that he fear'd it might cause a division in his Realm, as he saw it had done in the Empire. Therefore, following a violent course, and improper to convince those who are well persuaded of their Religion, he condemn'd the professors thereof to the fire. While yet on the other side (as the French Historians confess) he entred into a League with the Turk, to the no little scandal of his own, and all the Christian Religion. But as this was not without some great Design, so he instituted certain Legionary Soldiers, or Regiments of Foot throughout France, to the number of 42000 Men, each of the Legions being compos'd of two thousand Harquebusiers, and 4000 Pikes, and Halberdiers, who were commanded by twelve Captains (having 500 a piece) under six Colonels; while to draw the People voluntarily to support this Charge, the King exempted the Gentry from the Service they ow'd the Crown, by reason of their Tenures and Fees, and the Roturier or Peasant from all Impositions, saving twenty Solz apiece. Many good Ordinances also were made for the entertaining and ordering 1534. this Militia. Neither did the King misdoubt that the putting of Arms into so many of his Subjects Hands would redound to his prejudice, or the People fear that their Liberty should be oppress'd thereby. So that it gave not only Security at home, but Reputation abroad; all which was done, while the Emperor prepar'd for a Voyage to Tunis, the Relation whereof also, I shall set down in its due place.

This year (Sept. 26.) Pope Clement VII. took his end. For as he had been troubled long with a weakness in his Stomach, which his Physician Curtio advis'd him to remedy by change of Dyet, so being not able in an infirm State to suffer such an alteration, he sunk under his Disease and died. This Pope was one, who having prov'd the variety of good and ill Fortune, more than any other of his sort, had learn'd at last to make use of all; he was happy in his Interviews, as returning ever with some advantage, without that the committing himself to the power of those puissant Princes whom he met, did diminish his Authority, in a time when they wanted neither will nor occasion to bring it lower. He was a passionate lover of the advancement of his Family, for which purpose also he sometimes chang'd the whole face of the affairs of Europe. His Riches were rather in Jewels than Money, as being more proper to dispose unto them he affected. He was provident enough in conducting all Affairs where Arms did not Intervene, but withal so timorous, that it was reproach'd to him. The Historians of those times besides note him to have been of little Faith. Both which properties seem the more credible, that he so often varied in his Treaties with our King. Inasmuch that he may be thought for more than one reason to have wilfully lost him. Into this place succeeded Alessandro of the House of the Farnesi, as being by a full Conclave immediately chosen; neither did his Age, being 67 exempt him, while every one thus might hope in his turn to succeed. Which Opinion also he so cunningly entertain'd, as he was thought to have us'd some Art to make himself thought still more sickly than he was.

Octob. 12.

Our King who still suspected that the Pope and Emperor had their designs upon him, did now labour every where to hinder them, and strengthen himself. For which purpose also this occasion was given; Frederick King of Denmark dying about this time, and leaving the Crown in competition between his Son Christian (yet a Child) and Frederick Count Palatine, who had married Dorothy, eldest Daughter to Christiern II. and the Emperors Sister, the Lubeckers and Hamburgers offer'd our King for the Sum of 100000 Crowns to make a King in that Country which should be at his Devotion, and thereby exclude the Interest which the Emperor or his Niece had to that Crown. Concerning which our King taking advice with his Council, it was thought fit to propose the business to Francis, both that our King might experiment his Affection, (which he had lately found cold) and ease himself of the Charge, half whereof therefore he desir'd Francis to support. But what answer Francis return'd, appears not; only I find by a Dutch History, as well as by our Records, that a great sum of Money was lent by our King, whereupon also they proceeded in their War, which yet at last being compos'd, our King demanded Repayment.

Brantmer. 1535. May 25.

The Lord Dacres of the North (July 9. as our Historians have it) was arraign'd at Westminster of High Treason, but as the principal Witnesses produc'd against him by his Accusers (Sir Ralph Fenwick and one Musgrave) were some mean and provok'd Scottish Men, so his Peers acquitted him, 1534. as believing they not only spoke maliciously, but might be easily suborn'd against him, as one who (having been Warden of the Marches) by frequent Inroads had done much harm in that Country. And thus escap'd that Lord to his no little Honour, and his Judges, as giving example thereby how Persons of great quality, brought to their Tryal, are not so necessarily condemn'd, but that they sometimes may escape, when they obtain an equal hearing. The 11th of August, this year, our King, as he was watchful over the voice and affection of his People, so for the finding out how they would take his design of putting down Religious Houses, began with the remove of some. And therefore suppress'd at Greenwich, Canterbury, Richmond, and other places the Observant Fryars, noted to be the most clamorous against him, and for them substituted the Augustines, placing the Observants again in the room of the Gray-Fryars, as some have it, though others mention not this latter Exchange; which passages, though of no great Moment, in regard of that which follow'd, our King was glad to find no worse interpreted, since they serv'd to establish his Authority.

Regn. 26 Nov. 3.

He is by Act of Parliament declar'd Supreme Head of the Church.

I shall come now to the Laws enacted in the Parliament, held Novemb. 3. this year, which were important, and such as testified the great respect and awe born by our Nation unto their King.

The first was to this effect: That albeit the King was Supreme Head of the Church in England, and so recognis'd by the Clergy of this Realm in their Convocation, yet for more corroboration thereof, as also for extirpating all Errors, Heresies, and Abuses of the same; it was enacted that the King his Heirs and Successors, Kings of England, should be accepted and reputed the Supreme Head on Earth of the Church of England (call'd Ecclesia Anglicana) and have and enjoy, united and annex'd to the Imperial Crown of this Realm, as well the Title and Stile thereof, as all Honours, Dignities, Pre-eminences, Jurisdictions, Priviledges, Authorities, Immunities, Profits, and Commodities to the said Dignity of Supreme Head of the same Church belonging or appertaining. And that our said Sovereign Lord his Heirs and Successors, Kings of this Realm, shall have full Power and Authority from time to time, to visit and repress, redress, reform, order, correct, restrain and amend, all such Errors, Heresies, Abuses, Offences, Contempts, and Enormities, whatsoever they be, which by any manner of Spiritual Authority or Jurisdiction ought or may lawfully be reform'd, repress'd, order'd, redress'd, corrected, restrain'd, or amended most to the pleasure of Almighty God, the increase of Vertue in Christ's Religion, and for the conservation of the Peace, Unity, and Tranquility of this Realm, any Usage, Custom, foreign Laws, foreign Authority, Prescription, or any thing or things to the contrary hereof notwithstanding. Which Act, though much for the manutention of the Regal Authority, seem'd yet not to be suddenly approv'd by our King, nor before he had consulted with his Council (who shew'd him Precedents of Kings of England, that had us'd this Power) and with his Bishops, who having discuss'd the point in their Convocations, declar'd, that the Pope had no Jurisdiction warranted to him by Gods Word in this Kingdom. Which also was seconded by the Universities, and by the Subscriptions of the several Colleges, and Religious Houses so far as they bound their Successors thereunto. The particulars whereof are to be seen in our Records. Howsoever, the business was both publickly controverted in foreign Countries, and defended here by many at this present, while they produc'd Arguments for rejecting the Popes Authority, and together maintain'd it necessary, that such a power should be extant in the Realm for supporting and strengthening of the Religion profess'd in it, and excluding the impertinent and ill-grounded Reformations of many Sectaries of those times. The Arguments of all which, may be seen in the Kings Book De vera differentia Regiæ, & Ecclesiasticæ Potestatis (which we have formerly mention'd) as being printed, and publish'd on this occasion; whence also the Learned Bishop Andrews in his Tortura Torti, seems to have drawn divers assertions of the Regal Authority, to which therefore the curious Reader may have further recourse.

It was also declar'd Treason to attempt, imagine, or speak evil against the King, Queen, or his Heirs, or to attempt to deprive them of their Dignity or Titles.

Also, that no Traytor shall have benefit of Sanctuary. And though he be out of the Realm, yet upon Commission given by the King for his Tryal, if he be found guilty by the Jury, the Law shall proceed against him as effectually, as if he were present.

An Act also made the last Parliament for an Oath to be taken by all the Kings Subjects for the surety of the Succession by Queen Anne was now confirm'd, and the Oath prescrib'd, for the more validating whereof also, it was declar'd that all former Oaths concerning Succession taken by the Kings Subjects, should be reputed thenceforth vain and annihilated.

That towards the Augmentation, Maintenance and Defence of the Kings Royal Estate and Dignity of Supreme Head, the First-fruits of all Benefices, Dignities, Offices, &c. Spiritual, shall be paid to his Highness. As also a yearly Revenue, being the tenth part of all such Livings (the Prior and the Brethren of St. Johns of Jerusalem not excepted.)

Whereas also it was doubted, lest in these troublesome times some Commotion might follow in this Kingdom, and that particularly Wales, as being a strong and fast Country, might be a refuge for ill affected Persons, and the rather that there were so many Lordships Marches in those parts (the several Lords whereof having ampler power than they now enjoy, did protect Offenders flying from one place to the other) Divers Laws were enacted against Perjuries, Murders, Felonies in Wales: Passage over Severn also at unlawful times was prohibited, and Clerks convict in Wales, not to be releas'd till they found Sureties for their good abearing. Notwithstanding which, the year following upon mature Deliberation, Wales was united and incorporated totally unto the Crown of England, it being thought better to adapt that People into the same form of Government with the English, than by keeping them under more severe and strict Laws than others in the Island were subject unto, to hazard the alienating of their affections.

An Act also was made, declaring by whom; and in what manner Bishops Suffragans should be nominated and appointed, and what their Authority and Priviledges should be.

And thus after a free and general Pardon from the King, enacted, the Parliament was prorogu'd. The Act of Supremacy being thus pass'd, the King proceeded more confidently to abolish by Proclamation, the Popes Authority out of his Kingdom, and establish his own, the Doctrine whereof he commanded not only to be often preach'd in the most frequent Auditories, but taught even to little Children, injoyning further that the Popes Name should be raz'd out of

of all Books, his Resolution being after this time to treat with him no otherwise than as an ordinary Bishop. In sequence whereof also, he not only proceeded with an high hand against all the opposers of his Supremacy, (as shall be related in its due place) but accepted a voluntary Oath or Promise, under their Hands and Seals, from his Bishops, declaring their acknowledgment of the same, together with Renunciation of the Popes pretended Authority, and any Oath or Promise made to him heretofore. The form of this Oath or Promise given by Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, Feb. the 10th 1535. may be seen in Fox, to which we remit the Reader.

Emperor offers the Princess Mary to the Dauphin in Marriage without K. Henry's consent.
Mar. Bill.

IN the beginning of this year Philip Chabot Seigneur de Bryon, Admiral of France, being sent to our King, acquainted him how the Count of Nassau had been on the Emperors part with the King his Master, and among other Overtures of agreement, propos'd to him two Marriages; to which yet he would return no answer without our Kings Advice. One was betwixt the Dauphin and the Princess Mary our Kings Daughter (which also Bellay mentions, adding that notwithstanding the Instances which Francis made, the Emperor would not declare his further intentions herein;) the other was betwixt the Emperors Son and the French Kings youngest Daughter. To which points, as also some others here following, our King commanded his Agents in France to return this Answer. That he marvel'd much at the Emperors Malice, in meddling with things which belong'd not to him; and therefore desir'd Francis to surcease this Treaty, since he knew well enough how to keep his Daughter out of the Emperors reach. Secondly, he commanded them to tell Francis that the Emperors intention (notwithstanding all his promises) was to divide him first from his League with England, and afterwards disappoint him; for though he had understood by the said Bryon, that the Emperor upon some Conditions had offer'd to Francis (for one of his Sons) a Pension of a hundred thousand Crowns, payable yearly out of the Dutchy of Milan, and Milan it self after the death of Sforza, he desir'd him to give no credit to such Improbabilities. And here, I must observe that Bellay who speaks of the Pension, saith nothing of the Dutchy it self, so that it may be that Bryon stretched this point. And whereas the said Bryon had told him these things should be treated of by the two Sisters, Queen Leonora, Wife to Francis, and Mary, the Widow of Hungary, (now Regent of the Low-Countries, who, I find by the Spanish History did afterwards meet at Cambray) he thought he disparag'd this Business, to commit it to Women. After these points, and some others (which as they follow'd not, I spare to rehearse) he commanded them to intreat Francis to procure a Revocation of the censures of Clement, late Pope, against him. And to tell him, that he would send Commissioners shortly to treat of a Match betwixt the Duke of Angoulesme (his third Son) and the Princess Elizabeth our Kings Daughter, which should be more advantageous than the Emperors Offer. Whereupon, this year in May, our King who knew there was no so good way, to prevent the danger on the part of Scotland, as by taking off the French, and besides would have been glad that the Popes Censures were retracted, sent the Duke of Norfolk, the Bishop of Ely, Sir William Fitz-William, and Doctor Fox, to treat with the French Kings Commissioners, being Philip Chabot Admiral, and Guillaume de Poyet, afterwards Chancellor of France, to this effect, as I find by their Instructions.

To require Francis together with his Children, as also his Spiritual and Temporal Nobility, to enter into bond to revoke the Censures given at Rome, (which I conceive had his Original from some proposition which Francis made of Reconcilement with the Pope.) That he, his Nobility and Universities should declare the late Marriage to be good, and bind themselves to maintain the same, which if granted, then to proceed to the Treaty of Marriage, upon certain Conditions, whereof these are the Principal.

That all former Treaties shall stand in force. That when the Parties came to sufficient years they should ratifie the Marriage. That Monsieur de Angoulesme should be presently sent to our King to be brought up in England. That if he succeeded to the Crown, the Dutchy of Angoulesme should be free from homage to the French Kings. That he should not change the Laws of the French Realm, and that sufficient security and caution should be given for this purpose. But some of these being thought to be high demands, our King sent shortly after George Bolen Lord Rochford with power to modify and allay some Points, yet so as he insisted still, Francis should bind himself and his three Sons to revoke the Censures; and to declare, that it was enough if the Duke of Angoulesme came hither when the espousals were to be made. At last by third Instructions our King said, he was content to accept the single Bond of Francis for Revocation of the Censures, and that he was pleas'd that the Duke of Angoulesme came six Months only before the compleat Marriage. To the first of which Points the French Commissioners agreed, but the latter they refus'd, affirming that it was sufficient, if the young Duke came to consummate the Marriage. This while Sir John Wallop (Ambassador in France) being commanded to propose the same Conditions to Francis, was so sharply answer'd, that our Commissioners resented it. Nevertheless, as some Articles were agreed on the part of the French Commissioners, so they again demanded what help our King would give to the King their Master towards the recovery of his Mothers Land in Savoy. Whereupon, as also about the Pension usually paid to our King, some wrangling words were interchang'd, while we demanding that which was in Arrear, they desir'd to be exonerated of the whole; and thus the Treaty remain'd imperfect; yet so as I find by a Letter of Sir Gregory Casalis, how Francis had propos'd this Renuntiation with much earnestness, and not a few threats unto the new Pope. Though as Paulus III. was by nature slow (as Casalis observes) and that the Emperor, besides, had his designs in Scotland and Ireland at that time against our King, so no effect followed. For which yet none suffer'd so much as the Pope himself, it being certain our King hitherto passionately, desir'd to be, if not reintegrated, yet at least in good terms with the Roman Church, as far as with his Dignity he might.

This while, Haradin Barbareffa King of Argier, that famous Pirate (who for commanding in an unbounded and higher Element than the Earth, gloried in some sort to be Superior to the Princes thereof) obtain'd the Kingdom of Tunis, so true is the ancient Verse, Ille Crucem pretium Sceleris tulit, hic Diadema. This Man being sent for by Solyman, and constituted Admiral in the Spring, 1534. with 100 Sail of all sorts; 8800 Soldiers, and 800000 Ducats, began his expedition for Christendom the same day that Solyman undertook his for Persia. His principal design was upon Genoia, as being incited thereunto by Francis, as the Spanish History hath it; in his

Some difficulties yet appearing about the design of Genoia, Barbarossa makes for Tunis, which at last between Stratagem and force he took 22 August 1534. and made himself King thereof, Muley Hazem the true Prince flying for his more security unto the Mountains. Which being advertis'd to the Emperor, he thought fit to prevail himself of the occasion. As hoping that Solymans being in Persia, and the troubles and confusions, which are incident to unsettled and usurp'd Governments, would make his design easie. And as he was one who knew the use of Spies in any great Enterprize, he descended so low, as to give particular Instructions to one Luis Presende, a Genouese, well acquainted with Africa, which are at large set down by Sandoval. The effect of which were, that he should have certain Moneys given him, wherewith he should buy a Ship and Commodities to traffick with Tunis, and by those means insinuate himself into the acquaintance of the principal Persons both in the Town, and about Barbarossa, and thereupon either to make a Party with the discontented Citizens, with whom the Emperor might joyn, or else to penetrate the designs of Barbarossa; for which purpose also he had liberty, and Letters of Credence to make himself Ambassador and Negotiate with Barbarossa, when he thought it expedient for the Emperors Service to proceed that way; giving him Authority further, to promise Assistance to Barbarossa for the Conquest of Africa, when he might be drawn to depend on the Emperor. But whether through want of dexterity to use such different Instructions, or that otherwise another who was privy to his Employment did discover him (which some affirm) he was seiz'd on by Barbarossa and put to Death. Which being related unto the Emperor did but hasten his Expedition, wherein he resolv'd to go in Person.

This while, Francis, who was intente to the Actions of the Emperor, both as himself had his designs in Italy at that time, and that he had entred into a secret League with the Turk, thought fit to acquaint Barbarossa therewith, by the means of one Monsieur de Forrest a Frenchman, who from thence was commanded to go to Constantinople, and procure Succours for him; the Success whereof we shall tell hereafter; and now the Emperor being assisted by the Pope, and John King of Portugal, and attended by Don Luis, Son to the said John Andrea Doria, and the prime Nobility of Spain, set sail from Barcelona, May 31. and coming to Calari in Sardinia, departed thence 13 of June, 1535. with twenty-five thousand Foot, and about two thousand Horse, besides the Nobility and Adventurers, and ten thousand Seamen. All which being carried in two hundred and fifty, or three hundred Sail, came before Goleta, a Fort of sixty paces one way, and sixty-five the other, situate on a strait at the Mouth of the Lake or Bay within which Tunis stands. Which place, though defended bravely, was at last taken, together with a great part of the Fleet of Barbarossa. After which, the Emperor leaving the Lake on the left hand, march'd to Tunis, (where Barbarossa was) being a City of about ten thousand Houses, and three Leagues South from Goleta. But certain Slaves whom the Moors intended to burn with their Prison, escaping out of it, and taking Arms at the same time that the Forces which Barbarossa sent to defend the Passage were routed by the Imperialists, Barbarossa with about seven thousand Men, and much Riches, fled out of the Town, quitting his Reign so, after that he had enjoy'd it not a full year. Some of the Townsmen hereupon coming to the Emperor, and acquainting him herewith, Muley Hazem interceded with the Emperor, that two hours space might be given before he permitted the Army to enter, alledging for this purpose also some probable Inducements; when yet the crafty Moor, intended nothing thereby, but the gaining so much time for the Townsmen to hide their most precious Riches, from the rapine of the Soldiers: To which purpose also, he gave them private warning. The Emperor at last entring, and together giving liberty to many Slaves, restor'd it to Muley Hazem upon these Conditions, That he should suffer him to retain Goleta, Bona, Vizerta, and some other places belonging to the Kingdom of Tunis. That certain Churches for Christians should be allow'd. That he shall no more make Christian Slaves, or protect Pirats, from whom that King drew a great Revenue, being a fifth of all they took. And now Charles finding no more to be done in those parts, the year being far spent, and his Men sick of Calentures, and being not ignorant besides of the designs of Francis in Italy, came to Trapaca in Sicily the twentieth of August, 1535. from whence he went shortly to Naples.

During this Expedition Francis fell sick, the supposed cause whereof (as I find by our Records) was a grief he took, that a Servant of Monsieur de Forrest, returning with a dispatch concerning his Negotiation with the Turk was intercepted by the Duke of Urbino, and all the Treaty by this means discover'd to the Emperor; yet, at length taking Heart, and recovering, he sent our King word thereof, who thereupon commanded a solemn Procession to be made in London.

While the Emperor was at Tunis, Francis having provided a great Army under the command of Philip Chabot, Admiral of France, sent to his Uncle Charles Duke of Savoy, for passage through his Country, giving out that he desir'd it only to revenge the death of his Ambassador Merveilles upon Francisco Sforza. But the Duke conscious that he had lent Money heretofore to Bourbon, and bought lately the Contado of Asti (belonging to the House of Orleans) of the Emperor, and besides, had accepted the Emperors Order, when he refus'd the French, wanted not occasion to suspect the entrance of so potent an Army into his Country: Therefore he denied Passage. Whereupon Francis incens'd, sends to require of the Duke the Inheritance, falling to him by Louise of Savoy his Mother. Demanding also Restitution of a great part of Piedmont, and the Marquisate of Saluzzo as belonging anciently to the Counties of Provence and Dauphine, and Seignory of Arles. The Duke (as being allied to Charles, by his Wife Beatrix, Sister to Isabella the Empress) sends to him for Aid, being now in Sicily, and to induce him hereunto, he offer'd to give him all the Lands he held on this side the Mountains in exchange for so much in Italy. This being reported to Francis, inrag'd him so much the more against the Duke, so that he commanded his Army to enter Savoy; whereof in his place.

Charles seeing these preparations of Francis, and being unable for the present to resist them (his Army being return'd sick and much weakened from Tunis) for gaining of time, thought fit to renew 1535. renew the Propositions of Alliance and Accord, formerly mention'd to Francis, not omitting the while to levy Forces in Germany. Neither did he think to find any so strong opposition in Francis, as long as he hop'd that he had given our King enough to do in the parts of Scotland and Ireland. But as that of Scotland by our Kings industry took no effect, so that of Ireland was prevented, as by this Narration drawn chiefly out of our Records may appear.

The Earl of Kildare being (as is above said) now restor'd again to his Liberty and Pardon'd, return'd into Ireland, conducted by Sir William Skeffington, Master of the Kings Ordnance, who was also made Deputy there about 1530, and O'Sory plac'd. But some stirs arising, which Skeffington was not able to quiet, the King thought fit to reinplace Kildare, as a Man much esteem'd by his Countrymen. Thus was he made Deputy in Ireland again, about 1532. where he pacified the Country, and May 19. 1533. under the Title of Deputy to Henry Duke of Richmond and Somerset, Lieutenant of Ireland, held a Parliament at Dublin. But the old grudges between his Family and O'Sory's, beginning to break out anew, and himself being accus'd to have invited O Neale and others to spoil the Country's of O'Sory, not without suspicion of further design, he was sent for by our King, with command to substitute at his departure some able Man, who might govern during his absence. This charge was committed to Thomas his eldest Son: Who shortly after (hearing that his Father was convict, and to be put to death in England) rose up in Arms, and combining with O Neale, O Carol, &c. of the Irish Nobility, committing divers Outrages, and particularly July 26. 1534. murder'd Doctor John Allen Archbishop of Dublin, heretofore Woolsey's Chaplain and Commissary, and forc'd the Citizens of Dublin to take Truce with him till Michaelmas, and in the mean time to admit some Bands of his Men into the City, to lay siege to the Castle, (which was defended against him) while himself with the rest of the Army depopulated the Country of O'Sory. The news whereof being brought into England, the old Earl then in Prison, died as is thought of Grief, and the King appointed Sir William Skeffington by the Name of Lord Deputy of Ireland, under the Lieutenant thereof the Duke of Richmond, with a well-provided Army to suppress the Rebel. For tho' some of the Irish Nobility stood firm to our King, and particularly the Earl of O'Sory, and his Son James Lord Butler, whom Fitzgerald had in vain solicited; yet they were not able to make head against him. And here it is remarkable how politickly that Family strove to preserve it self: For though three of the five Brothers of the late Earl of Kildare were against our King, two others offer'd their Service to him: Who yet (as it was danger either to receive or refuse them) were but coldly welcom'd. Michaelmas now approaching, (when the Truce with Kildare expired) Francis Herbert having been sent from Dublin at the beginning of these Stirs, to give notice thereof to King Henry, return'd with a comfortable promise of Succours, and a command to defend themselves; whereupon the Citizens suddenly laying hold on the Rebels, who besieg'd the Castle, shut their Gates, and stood upon their Guard. Which Fitzgerald understanding, comes with an Army of 15000. and assail'd the City, which yet was stoutly maintain'd by the Townsmen, and particularly by Francis Herbert, who behav'd himself so well, that as I find by several Original Dispatches of Finglas, Chief Justice of Ireland, dated in November 1534. the City by his politick and manful Defence was preserv'd; insomuch, that if he had carried three days longer, it was said, both it and the Castle had been lost. I find also by their Original Dispatches, dated in the same Month, that he shot and kill'd twenty-four of the Rebels with his own Hand, whereof twenty in one day. For which Service also, he was afterward made Knight, and one of the Kings Council in Ireland. Notwithstanding which, as he was single, and the City much press'd by Kildare, who had intercepted all Victuals, Water and Fewel, so at last they were forc'd to treat upon certain Conditions, which were, That the Citizens should set at liberty such of his Men, as they had taken, and labour to procure his Pardon of the King, within sixteen Weeks; and he on the other side should desist from Hostility, during the said Space, and redeliver their Children. Being thus departed from Dublin; two days after Sir William Skeffington arriving on the Coast of Ireland with his Army, a false report came, that the City was yielded, whereupon a Council of War being assembled, the Resolution was, that John Salisbury and Sir William Breton (two of the Captains newly come over) should be sent to Dublin with some Forces, being about five hundred Men, to relieve it (if it were possible,) and that the Lord Deputy should set sail for Waterford, where, about the same time, Sir John Suintlo, and Sir Rice Mansel, landed with five hundred Soldiers; who, joining with the Earl of O'Sory, spoil'd the Country of Kildare; while Breton and Salisbury coming during the aforesaid Truce, enter'd the Town without any difficulty, where also they resolv'd to proceed hostily against Kildare, as having during this Respite, destroy'd some part of the Country adjoining, contrary to his Promise. While affairs pass'd thus, the Generals on either side made use of the time. For as Kildare sent to the Emperor for obtaining Supplies, (in which business a Servant of the Earl of Desmond, in whom the Emperor had a special Confidence, was employ'd) so the Lord Deputy (being now come to Dublin) treated with the Nobility, to discover their Affection, as not knowing otherwise, how to form a Party amongst them, on which he might rely. For which purpose also he thought it not amiss to conclude a Truce with Kildare, until the fifth of January. Kildare in the mean time encouraging his Soldiers with hope of Succours from Spain; the assurance whereof being brought him by the the Earl of Desmond's Servant, he forgot not to write unto the Pope, complaining of our Kings defection from the Roman Catholick Faith, and together desiring that he might hold the Kingdom of Ireland from that See upon payment of a yearly Tribute. In these uncertainties, Sir John Allen Knight, formerly Secretary to the Archbishop of Dublin, now Master of the Rolls there, a dexterous Person, gave the King this Advice, that he should quickly publish, whether he would pardon Kildare, and so save Charges, or otherwise prosecute War against him; since he said, that until this were declar'd, the Gentry of Ireland durst not oppose Kildare, as fearing that when he were restor'd, he would revenge himself on all those who oppos'd him. In the mean while the Earl of Desmond dying, leaves his Estate litigious betwixt his Brother and Grandchild. The Truce now expiring, our Army (which took some few places at their last landing, and made some light Skirmishes) lay idle for the most part; insomuch that having gotten Kildare Castle, they suffer'd it to be lost again. At last, being commanded to proceed, the Lord Deputy in March following took Maynoth or Mynnow Castle, strongly fortified and defended by a hundred of the choicest Servants and Soldiers of Kildare. Which place our Records say was gotten by Battery and Assault, so that Hollinshead seems to be mistaken when he writes, it was betray'd by one Parese, Foster-Brother to Fitzgerald, the Garrison being by him made drunk the Night preceding, and that for this Treachery, instead of Reward, the Deputy commanded him to be hang'd. And further our Records tell us, that one of the said Garrison depos'd, that not only the Emperor had promis'd to send thither 10000 Men, but that the King of Scots had assur'd them of Aid; Arms in the mean time being brought in a great quantity from Flanders, and other places. Some defeats also were given to those Troops of the Rebels which appear'd. Nevertheless as they daily increas'd, and Skeffington was old, weak and slow in all his Enterprises, the Lord Leonard Gray, Brother to the Marquis Dorset, though ally'd to Kildare, was (under the Duke of Richmond, who died shortly after) authoriz'd to execute the place of Deputy Lieutenant of Ireland, to the no little grief and discontentment of Skeffington. Whereof Kildare being advertis'd, and for the rest finding himself reduc'd to some necessity, by the delay of the Emperor, and uncertainty he found in some of his Complices, thought fit to yield himself to the Kings Mercy; yet so as the Lord Gray together with the other Commanders promis'd to intercede effectually with the King in his behalf. Which I find they perform'd, and particularly the Lord Gray, whose Sister the old Earl had married. And thus Kildare was brought by the Lord Gray to London, and his five Uncles not long after; where, upon Examination, the business being found to merit Punishment, they were at last executed. Notwithstanding the earnest mediation of the Lord Gray and others. And now these Troubles of Ireland being ended, our King commanded the Deputy to make Peace with O Neale for a year or two, and together to summon a Parliament, both for giving order to those Grievances whereof the Irish complain'd, and for settling the business of Supremacy and Succession in that form it was establish'd in England. Whereupon it was assembled, May 1. 1536. And in it the Acts of Succession, of Supremacy, of First-fruits, against Appeals to Rome, &c. as also an Act for the attainder of the late Earl of Kildare and his Complices, were pass'd. And because the King had spent in this War forty thousand pounds, he demanded together with a present satisfaction for his Charges, a yearly Revenue for the future, which the Lords Spiritual and Temporal accorded in great part, the Clergy particularly giving him a twentieth part of their yearly Rents, first for ten years following, and at last for ever. And thus the Parliament was prorogu'd till the year following.

Cardinal Poole's Opinion desir'd by the King.

The Supremacy being (as is abovesaid) invested in the King, by the approbation of his Parliament. The Universities and Bishops of this Kingdom did not a little second him; (and particularly Stephen Gardiner, whose Latin Sermon, De vera Obedientia, to this purpose, with the Preface of Doctor Bonner, (Archdeacon of Leicester, and about these times Ambassador with the King of Denmark) being yet extant in Print, and by John Fox digested to a Sum) I shall not mention otherwise; my intention being not (in a History) to discuss Theological matters, as holding it sufficient to have pointed at the places where they are controverted, as far as the notice of them is come to me. Notwithstanding, as our King desir'd to give and receive all Satisfaction herein, so knowing that the esteem of Reginald Poole was great in foreign Countries, and especially in Italy, where he now liv'd at Padua; he sent unto him, desiring his Opinion of his late Actions freely, and in few words; whereupon Poole writes, and dispatches to him his Book Pro Unitate Ecclesiae, inveighing therein against the Kings Supremacy, as also against his new Marriage, and Divorce of Queen Katharine; exciting the Emperor to revenge the injury offer'd her, concluding with an advice to Henry to reconcile himself to the Catholick Church, and the Pope as head thereof. Our King having perus'd this, and knowing it could not long lie hid in Italy, (though Poole had promis'd not to publish it,) sends for him by Post to come into England, to explain some Passages thereof. But Poole knowing that it was declar'd Treason there, to deny the King the Title of Supream Head, which he had principally intended in his Book, refus'd, desiring the King nevertheless, as being now freed from her, who had been the occasion of all this, to take hold of the present time, and to reintegrate himself with the Pope, and accept the Council now summon'd, whereby he might have the honour of being the cause of a Reformation of the Church in Doctrine and Manners, and that otherwise he would be in great danger. He wrote also to Cuthbert Tonsall Bishop of Duresme to incline the King hereunto. But this Bishop (as appears in our Records) reproving him for the bitterness of his Book, and counselling him to burn the Original, denies that King Henry hath separated himself from the Roman Church, but only freed himself from the unjust usurpations of the Bishops of that See. (And to this purpose, another large Letter joyntly written after, from the Bishops of Duresme and London may be seen in Fox.) But Poole being at this time invited to Rome by the Pope, and utterly refusing to burn a Catholick Book (as he said) like an Heretick, our King hastned the publishing at home of a Declaration, call'd the Bishops Book, sign'd by the Archbishop of Canterbury and York, and nineteen other Bishops, wherein is alledg'd out of ancient Histories and Councils, how many hundred years had pass'd, before the Pope took on him this Supremacy over other Bishops, and that it was contrary to the Oath given, when any of them enters the Papacy; which is, that they shall observe and keep inviolably the first eight Councils, that decree a limited power to all Bishops, and particularly the first Council of Constantinople, which both excludes foreign Jurisdiction every where, and allows Bishops within their several Diocesses, an absolute power to determine Controversies arising within their Precincts; and together shews how the Papal Authority was first deriv'd from the Emperors of those times, and not from Christ, whose Kingdom they said was Spiritual and not Carnal; setting forth this Doctrine further by Arguments drawn from Holy Scriptures and some Fathers. But to return to 1535. neither the Example of others which subscrib'd, nor the Terror of the Statute could hinder divers Religious Persons to continue in their former Opinions; insomuch, that they openly spake against the Kings Supremacy. Which being made known, caus'd him to advise with his Council concerning their Punishment, some indeed thought that Imprisonment, Banishment, or the like, was chastisement enough for those, who confessing the Kings Supream Authority in all Temporal Matters, did out of Scrupulosity rather than Malice, impugn the rest. But when it was objected again, both that the Number was too great for either of those Punishments, and that the Law having made the Offence to be Death, it was not safe to go less, especially when some exemplary Justice might contain the rest in Obedience. Our King, who needed now no motive to security, resolv'd to proceed legally against them. Therefore some Priors, and other Ecclesiastical Persons,

1535. Persons, that were Criminal in this kind, being found guilty of the Statute, and this year condemn'd as Traitors, were executed, being the first that suffer'd in this kind. This piece of Justice was not yet grown so familiar to our King, but that it troubled him much, for he would have been glad not to be compell'd to such violent Courses; therefore he not only mourn'd inwardly, but caus'd his Head to be poll'd, and his Beard formerly shaven, to be cut round, though others facetiously interpret it to be nothing else, than the putting upon a new Dignity, a new Countenance; but if he proceeded thus rigorously against the Opposers of his Supremacy, he did no less punish the many pretended Reformers and Contradictors of the Roman Catholick Religion. Therefore, as the last year he had condemn'd John Frith, a Sacramentary, to the Fire, so he now caus'd divers Hollanders in London, who had devis'd some different Opinions by themselves, concerning certain Articles of Christian Religion, to be burnt in Smithfield. Shortly after which again, some others were executed for denying the Supremacy. So that on both sides it grew a bloody time. Only, as our King found the terrors already given, did not suffice to keep the rest in awe, he resolv'd to make some great Examples.

Therefore, he laid hand on John Fisher Bishop of Rochester, who having been imprison'd now a years space, for refusing to swear to the Act of Succession, and attainted therefore by Parliament, was now urg'd with the Supremacy; which he disallowing (as having not given his voluntary Oath or Promise thereunto the last year, together with other Bishops) incur'd the danger of the Law. Which also was taken the worse, that in the Convocation, 1530. he had yielded the Title of Supremum Caput Ecclesie Anglicane quantum per Christi Legem licet. Yet as the Pope for more confirming him in his Opinion, had declar'd him Cardinal of St. Vitale during his said Restraint (though he profess'd that if the Hat lay at his Feet, he would not stoop to take it up.) So our King understanding thereof was much more incens'd, both as the Pope had confer'd his most eminent Honours on a Man kept by him in Prison, and guilty of the highest punishment his Laws could inflict, and as he knew of what consequence it would be, if his Subjects were thus encourag'd to contemn his Authority: Therefore he resolv'd now to defer his Justice no longer. Whereupon, the said Bishop as publickly convicted and condemn'd for divers Points (the particulars whereof yet I have not seen, but only that on the seventh of May last in the Tower of London before divers Persons, he had Falsly, Maliciously and Traiterously said, that the King is not Supream Head of the Church of England,) was by the Kings command openly Beheaded the 22d of June, 1535. Thus did the Popes favour but precipitate the Bishops Ruine; against whom notwithstanding, I find, the King did but unwillingly proceed, as having held him ever in singular esteem, for his Learning and good Parts. All which cannot make me believe yet, that he was Author of King Henry's Book against Luther (as Sanders and Bellarmine will have it) or Sir Thomas More (as others say) though I doubt not but they might both revise it by the Kings favour, and where it was needful also interpose their Judgment. This while, the Pope, who suspected not perchance that the Bishops end was so near, had for more testimony of his favour to him, as disaffection to our King, sent him the Cardinals Hat, but unseasonably, his Head being off. Nevertheless, as he had first desir'd Francis to mediate for him, he omitted not afterwards publickly to justify his Actions, calling him by the name of Sanctissimus Episcopus, and omnium Cardinalium Cardinalis, and declaring, (in a Breve subscrib'd by Blosius (as I find it briefly mentioned in our Records, extracted by Sanders, and extant in the Bullarium.) of which hereafter) both that he was Innocent, and our King an Heretick, &c. But this again was defended in an Apology written here in Elegant Latin, whether by Stephen Gardiner (who as I find in our Records wrote a Justification of the King herein) or some other; which I should have inserted but for the length, and as some would judge it for the vehemency. Though, as the King retain'd still all the chief Articles of the Roman Church, it cannot be wondred if the Author thereof did the more bitterly inveigh against one that had given his Sovereign that odious Title.

Our King being thus many ways exasperated against the Pope, neglected no means of extirpating his chief Agents and Favourers, and, with them, all his Authority in this Country; therefore he proceeded against Sir Thomas More, committed at the same time, and for the same cause, with Fisher. For though (as Sanders saith) he would by the Bishop of Rochester's exemplary Death have brought More to a Conformity, yet finding that it was impossible, he commanded his Counsel in the Law to examine him concerning the Supremacy (now enacted) more particularly. But Sir Thomas More, (as his Indictment hath it) malitiose silebat, saying yet afterwards, I will not meddle with such matters. He was accus'd also for holding secret intelligence by Letter with the Bishop of Rochester, during their Imprisonment; which appear'd both by the confession of the said Bishop, and in that they held the same Language. It being observ'd that both of them said, in their Examinations, the Act about Supremacy was like a two-edg'd Sword, for if one answer one way, it will confound his Soul, and if the other way, it will confound his Body. Yet Richard Rich the Kings Solicitor (made afterwards Lord Rich) comes to him again, and having first protested that he had no Commission to talk with him of that matter,) as believing perchance his former Answer, or Silence had sufficiently convinc'd him,) did, as is in the Record, demand then, if it were enacted by Parliament, that Richard Rich should be King, and that it should be Treason for any to deny it, what offence it were to contravene this Act? Sir Thomas More answer'd, that he should offend if he said no, because he was bound by the Act; but that this was Casus levis; Whereupon, Sir Thomas More said he would propose a higher Case, suppose by Parliament it were enacted quod Deus non fit Deus, and that it were Treason to contravene, whether it were an Offence to say according to the said Act; Richard Rich replied yea, but said withal, I will propose a middle Case, because yours is too high. The King you know is constitute Supream Head of the Church on Earth, why should not you Master More accept him so, as you would me if I were made King by the supposition aforesaid. Sir Thomas More answer'd, the Case was not the same, because (said he) a Parliament can make a King and Depose him, and that every Parliament-man may give his consent thereunto, but that a Subject cannot be bound so in the case of Supremacy, Quia Consensus ab eo ad Parliamentum præbere non potest (for so it is in my Copy if it be not mistaken) Et quanquam Rex sic acceptus sit in Anglia, plurimæ tamen partes exteræ idem non affirmant. All which being produc'd together, and added to his refusal of the Oath of Succession, for which in the Parliament of November, 1534. he was attainted of misprision of Treason, as I find by the

So that notwithstanding many subtil defences made by him, while he contended to have given no offence but in Silence, (unless it were in comparing the Statute to a two-edged Sword, which yet he said, he alledg'd no otherwise, than to shew how dangerous it was to answer,) and notwithstanding also his denying utterly the passage between the Solicitor and himself in that sense (perchance he meant the Latin) which is above related, the Jury in his

July 1. Tryal, July 1. before the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Norfolk, &c. declar'd him guilty of imagining to deprive the King of his Title and Dignity, which by a Statute, Regni 26. was made High Treason. This great Person hereupon going shortly after to the place of Execution, met among many Friends one only Enemy, who openly revild him, for a Sentence heretofore given in Chancery, to which, yet, he made no answer, but that if it were to do, he would do so again. And, now being resolv'd to die, he return'd to his wonted facetiousness. Therefore, being to go up the Scaffold, he said to one; Friend help me up, and when I go down again, let me shift for my self as I can. Being now mounted, the Executioner (as the custom is) ask'd him forgiveness, which he granted, but told him withal, he should never have honesty by cutting off his Head, his Neck was so short. Then laying down his Head on the Block, he bid the Executioner stay till he had laid aside his Beard, for (said he) it never committed Treason. After which, coming to some private Devotions, he receiv'd his Death.

Thus ended Sir Thomas More, with so little Consternation, as even the terrors of Death could not take off the pleasure he had in his conceited and merry Language, which many attributed to his Innocence. For certainly though he fell into the danger of the Law, they thought his intentions were rather to elude it with ambiguous Answers, and an affected Silence, than to declare himself any way. Beside, by an Original of his, (about this time, written to Cromwel) it appears that heretofore upon perusing the Kings Book against Luther, he dissuaded him to exalt so much the Papal Authority, lest it diminish'd his own. Professing nevertheless both out of the reasons urg'd in that Book, as well as his private study of that question afterwards, he could not deny the Pope a Primacy, however yet he could not hold it such, as that the Authority deriv'd to him thereby, was to be prefer'd above a General Council.

This while (as I find in our Records,) our King upon the death of Clement VII. hoping better of Paulus III. gave Sir Gregory de Casalis new instructions to advise him, to regard the King of England, and to consult with some Learned Men, in his Cause, (not imitating Clement, who knowing the truth conceal'd it) and these Learned Men to be chosen out of France. To this also the Pope seem'd to give some ear, until News came to Rome, first, of the Execution of divers Monks in England for denying the Supremacy, and then of the death of More and Rochester. Whereupon the Pope resolving to proceed against our King, begins to minute terrible Bulls, whereof I find there were five several forms. But this which I find in the Bullarium, and extracted by Sanders (dated Aug. 30.) was that which was approved and made use of, being to this effect. First, objecting to him, as well the Divorce of Katharine, as the Marrying Anne, and making Laws against the Popes Authority, and punishing those who contradicted (as lately the Bishop of Rochester.) He warns the King, to reform these faults; or upon refusal cites him, and all that favour him, to appear at Rome within ninety days to answer, which if they neglected, he Excommunicates them all, and deprives the King of his Realm, subjects the whole Kingdom to the Interdict; declares the Issue by Anne, Illegitimate, forbids Allegiance to his Subjects, commerce with other States; dissolves all Leagues of Princes with him; Commands the Clergy to depart out of England, the Nobility to take Arms against him, &c. Having resolv'd this Censure, yet I find, it was not openly denounc'd, till he saw all hope past of reclaiming King Henry, or at least that the Emperor was at leisure to execute it, of which hereafter. Our King hearing of this, entertains friendship with the Protestant Princes of Germany, and the rather that intelligence was brought, how the Pope had declar'd he would give away his Kingdom to some Roman Catholick Prince of that Country, as being (it seems) unwilling to greatness France or Spain therewith, lest afterwards himself should not be so able to sway the Balance. Which I mention not, yet, as if it were probable to be effected, or that our King fear'd any such Attempt, as long as he stood upon good terms with his Subjects, but that by strengthening himself in Germany, he might the better chastise that Person, who upon the Popes Incouragement durst undertake the Enterprize. I do find also, that the French King did concur in this Treaty with the Protestants, both, as upon the death of Pope Clement, the chief support of the great design in Italy did fall, and as he began to give some ear to the Evangeliks in Germany, as appears by his sending for Melancthon, and other passages in Sleidan, which I shall hereafter set down. Howsoever, our King as he found that with no little asperity he maintain'd his Authority at home, so he thought his care should be the greater to justify it abroad. Inasmuch that he sent unto all places, (where he held Correspondence) to give, together with an account of his Actions, the reason why he had taken on him the Supremacy. Therefore, Doctor William Barlow the Kings Chaplain, and elect Brother of St. Asaph, being joyn'd in Commission with Thomas Holcroft to James, labour'd to give him all manner of Impressions, which might bring him to a Conformity; which Buchanan also mentions, saying that James was intreated to read over their Arguments, and consider them. Notwithstanding which, as they were refer'd by him to his Clergy, so (as, the same Author hath it) they together with some Learned Men, whom our King offer'd to send, for further Declaration of this Point, were for the present Rejected. Which again, being advertis'd to our King, he thought fit suddenly to employ the Lord William Howard, Brother to the Duke of Norfolk, and the said Bishop, to James, to make him divers advantageous Propositions, and withal to draw him to an Interview. Whereunto, therefore, being press'd by them, and the rather that it was in sequence of a former Proposition; James, who had no disposition thereunto, sent (as our Ambassadors write) to procure by a private Messenger, a Breve from the Pope, inhabiting this Journey, so that until the receipt thereof he was forc'd to make other excuses; by which, yet, I find he denied not a meeting with our King, but desir'd him only, it might be in France, and the French King present, as hoping, thereby (it seems) to be less constrain'd, than if he came single into our Kings Dominions; all which, as it did but increase our Kings Jealousie of his Nephews Intentions (for he expected War from many hands, as the Pope had threatned) so he endeavour'd but so much more to draw him on his side, as knowing of what consequence it

But his Clergy (however Queen Margaret had given hope thereof) being utterly averse, dissuaded him; yet some Operation I find it seem'd to have. For by an Original Dispatch in May following, 1536. James certified our King, that he had sent to Rome to get impetrations for reformation of some Enormities, and especially, anent the ordering of great and many Possessions, and Temporal Lands given to the Kirk by our noble Predecessors. To which as our King not only gave credit, but a safe conduct to the Messenger, as was desir'd, so he seem'd to receive some Satisfaction, and together hop'd, he would not, at least so soon, be drawn to assist his Enemies, and therefore forbore a while to solicit this Point, pursuing, nevertheless, the propos'd Interview, but more slackly than before; but James had other designs, as shall be told the year following.

Power.

Our King finding thus, that businesses were safe on this part, proceeded more confidently in his intentions of suppressing, together with the Popes Authority, all those who chiefly supported it. And because he thought Monasteries did furnish more able Men to contest with him in this Point, than any part else, he advis'd how to proceed with them. Whereupon, one said thus:

Speech in Council against suppress-
nasteries.

I F in all Affairs, betwixt your Highness, and any else, at home, or abroad, it be the part of a Counsellor to give a free and impartial Advice, I shall, under favour, crave the same liberty in those things that intervene betwixt God and your Highness, both because the Duty we owe unto that Supream Majesty is transcendent, and that general and publick Errors committed against him, are of a more pernicious Consequence than any else. In confidence of Pardon, therefore, I shall presume to opine concerning the business of Monasteries now in question. S I R, if it were first propos'd now, whether it were fit to erect them, I must confess I should give my Assent, not yet that I should allow any excessive number, or perchance approve all the rules observ'd in them. But wholly to exclude so pious a Retrait for Men unapt for secular Business, or otherwise retir'd from the World, were, in my conceit, to leave those unprovided for, who of all other were most proper in a devout life to serve and glorifie their Creator. There is in my Opinion, therefore, a due place left for Monasteries; yet, when they grow to that Multitude, that either the just proportion they should bear in a State, is exceeded, or that, in effect, they should become a Receptracle only for lazy and idle Persons, I should wish to apply some convenient Remedy. But Sir, who shall give it? For if we refer all unto the Pope, how could we ever hope of a Moderation, especially while they are but Retraits for so many Servants entertain'd for him at other Mens costs. And if your Highness (especially since you have taken upon you the Supremacy) should suppress them, what a Scandal would follow? For who would think, Sir, at home or abroad, that your Highness exercis'd your new charge therein, as you ought, or complied with your place? Again, Sir, what a wrong would it be to the Founders of them, who had as much right to give some of their Lands to that use, as their Heirs have to enjoy the rest? Would they not say this were to trench on the publick right, and to frustrate whatsoever either Divine or Human Law have establish'd? Therefore, Sir, be pleas'd not to think so much of their Overthrow, as Reformation; or if there be occasion to suppress some, as being Supernumerary, yet since they are Houses dedicated to God, be pleas'd, by all means, to convert the profit arising thence, to some other pious use, and howsoever, to reserve a sufficient number in every Shire for either Sex; and so shall your Highness both excuse all Obloquy, and together manifest the care you have to keep up those ancient Monuments of Devotion.

To which another, who better understood the Kings mind, answer'd thus:

S I R,

I F it be true, that they speak enviously (that I may say nothing else) who would reduce all reason of State to the sober Principles and Doctrines of Faith, it is no less certain, that they speak prophanely who wholly exclude them. In State there is use of all: Only as it is a Symmetrical Body, nothing in it must pass proportion. Inasmuch, as neither the Secular Magistrature or Clergy, on the one side, nor the Soldier, Merchant, Artificer and Husbandman on the other, shall exceed a just quantity. The due Composition of it being such, as there may be those who may labour and fight, as well as pray for it. Else, who would not change our Generals and Captains to Bishops and Deans, and our Shipping and Forts, to Chappels and Religious Houses? But what a proportion, Sir, doth the Clergy now hold, when the fourth part of the Revenues of the Kingdom is imploy'd that way. For Sir, when the Tenth we pay them in one kind, and the Lands they hold in another, are estimated, they amount to this rate or more, as I am inform'd, I shall not yet be hasty to suppress them. I confess all true which was now said, and do not only admit the piety of their Institution, but the use that may be made of some few, as two or three in every Shire. Neither, shall I ever consent that more should be suppress'd than were needful, and yet the Money imploy'd for your Highness's most urgent occasions only. The Supernumerary part of them, and your Forrests being by me held like Jewels of your State, which though they yield not ready Coin, may ever be converted to it; I should for this reason (when there were no other) conserve them as much as were possible. But Sir, when I consider again, how the Pope or Bishop of Rome (as your Highness commands him to be call'd) hath threatned to joyn all Christian Princes against your Highness, and that in these Monasteries he nourishes a Seminary of factious Persons that oppose your Supremacy; and what Instruments they may be of stirring Sedition in your Highness's Kingdom, at the same time that some foreign Power should invade it, I cannot but wish some good order were given. I should think fit therefore they were instantly visited, and those who were unable to keep the Vows they made at their entrance, to be permitted to go to some more active life, and the vices of the rest, not only chastis'd, but care taken to punish those who henceforth speak or behave themselves licentiously. And, so far forth, certainly your Highness will make but lawful use of your Supremacy. As for the suppression of any, not I, but some violent and inexcusable necessity must be the Counsellor. If your Highness have any

1535. any other way to defend your self against the threatned Invasions, I shall never advise you to this; and yet that, no further than to bring your Estate to a just temper.

Our King considering the reasons on both sides, said he would cause the Monasteries to be severely visited, and the enormous Crimes of them, (having been formerly rather subject to Pecuniary Mulcts, than corrected as they ought) to be exemplarily punish'd, and a Reformation given to all Abuses. Protesting nevertheless, that he would suppress none, without the consent of his Parliament, among whom, he did politicly foresee, that some for Conscience sake, (the Roman Religion being now much cried down) and others for avoiding the charges of War (then menaced) would sooner lay the burden on those Monasteries, than take it on themselves; whereof in its due place. And now Cromwel the Secretary, a Man so disaffected to those Houses, as he was thought a favourer of the Reformers, being made General Visitor, employ'd Richard Layton, Thomas Leigh, William Detre, Doctors of the Law, Doctor John London, Dean of Wallingford, with others, giving them Instructions in 86 Articles, for visiting Monasteries every where; by which they were to enquire into the Government, Behaviour, and Education of the Persons of both Sexes. To find out all their offences, and to this purpose give them encouragements to accuse both their Governors and each other. To command them to exhibit their Mortuaries, Evidences, and Conveyances of their Lands; to produce their Plate and Money, and give an Inventory thereof. Together with which the King gave forth Injunctions to be observ'd, some tending to the establishing of his Supremacy, some touching the good Government of the Houses; as that no Brother go out of the Precinct; that there be but one entrance; that no Woman frequent the Monks, nor any Man the Nuns, &c. And some for Education, as, that a Divinity Lecture be every day read and frequented. That the Abbot daily expound some part of the rule of their Order, shewing yet that these Ceremonies are but Introductions to Religion, which consisteth not in Apparel, shaven Heads, &c. but in purity of Mind. That none shall profess or wear the habit till twenty-four years of Age. That no feigned Relicks nor Miracles be shew'd. No offerings to Images, &c.

Upon these and other Injunctions, joyn'd to the Inquisition aforesaid, the Commissioners found means to make divers Monasteries obnoxious, for upon the Petition of divers Monks who were weary of their Habit, some alledging for their excuse, that they were profess'd before they came to the years of Discretion; others, that the late Injunctions were too strict to be observ'd; the King seizing on the House, commanded that they who were profess'd under twenty-four, should be set at liberty, as being thought too young to make a Vow as they ought, or indeed to keep it. That they who were above twenty-four, when they made their Vow, might have leave to depart if they would. At which time the Men, if in Orders, should have a Priests Habit given them, and forty Shillings in Money; the Nuns should have only a Gown, such as secular Women ware, and liberty to go whither they would. The Condition yet of some being better, who for surrendering their Houses to the King (to which by threats and fair words they were induc'd) got small Pensions during their Lives. Others, by paying great Sums to the King and Cromwel, redeem'd their Monasteries from the present Calamity; yet so, as even from these also, divers Jewels and Church-

Ornaments were taken away to the Kings use. Which being done, Leigh and the rest at their return, gave that account of their Employment, and particularly of their feigned Miracles and Relicks, as well as sinful and sluggish life of the Religious Orders, as not only Cromwel with much violence said, their Houses should be thrown down to the foundation, but the whole body of the Kingdom when it was publish'd to them (which I find industriously procur'd) became so scandaliz'd thereat, as they resolv'd if the King ever put it into their hands, to give remedy thereunto: Yet were not all alike Criminal; for some Societies behav'd themselves so well, as their life being not only exempt from notorious faults, but their spare times bestow'd in writing Books, Painting, Carving, Graving, and the like Exercises, their Visitors became intercessors for them. But of those, as I find not many mention'd, so they were involv'd at last in the common fate, it being thought dangerous to use distinction, both lest the fault of Manners (which might be corrected) should be taken by the People as the sole cause of their Dissolution; and as it was pretended that the Revenues should be employ'd to some better uses. Not long after which again, the King caus'd all Colleges, Chantries, and Hospitals to be visited, not omitting to take a particular survey of all the Revenues and Dignities Ecclesiastical within his Kingdom, which was return'd to him in a Book, to be kept in the Exchequer.

Our King having thus omitted nothing which might prevent or frustrate their designs who were most able to offend him, thought it his part now, to assure those who he thought might be of most use. Therefore he sends Fox, Bishop of Hereford, to the Protestant Princes in Germany, assembled at Smalcald, to exhort them to an Unity in Doctrine, wherein he offered his best assistance by conference with their Divines, as being the only ground of establishing either Peace at home, or Correspondence abroad; that unless this were done, it would be a great prejudice to them in the Council now propos'd, which yet he took to be pretended only as an Intention and Artifice of the Popes to entertain time, and in the mean while to sow Division among them, as he doth now incite Christian Princes against England for rejecting his Tyranny. Therefore they were not to expect a free Council how much soever promis'd, yet if they desir'd a Council, they should attend till all Christian Princes were at peace with each other; and that it ought to be held in an indifferent place, it being impossible otherwise, but that it should be partial and factious. That this being done, as he had expell'd the Popes Authority out of his Dominions, so he would joyn with them to restore God's true Worship. And so the Bishop concluded, desiring only some might be appointed to whom he might speak of these businesses privately. To which after due thanks, they answer'd, that really there was no difference among them, there being none who would not stand to the Augustan Confession: That they took well his Highness's Admonition about the Council General, now promis'd at Mantua. But that, (as they had answer'd Vergerius the Popes Legate) they did not think either that the place was fit, or that the Pope had the sole right of calling or ordering of it, which belong'd as well to the Emperor and other Princes. For the rest, they said, they would appoint some who might communicate privately with the Bishop, as was requir'd, of which we shall speak more hereafter.

Arguments, how well soever disputed, confirm'd the Treaty made 1532. of which the Duke of Saxony (who came from him to Smalcald) advertis'd the Protestants, who (Decemb. 24) decreed, That the League betwixt them, made 1530. for mutual defence in the cause of Religion, now shortly expiring, should continue ten years longer, and that they would take into their Confederation, all who receiv'd the Augustan Confession. To this Diet Guillaume de Bellay Seigneur de Langey (employ'd from Francis) came likewise. But his advices, though for the most part conformable to our Kings, were not so acceptable. For as Francis by confederating himself with the Turk that formidable Enemy of Germany had disoblig'd the whole Nation on the one side, so by burning divers Evangelicks in France, he had on the other side much incens'd them all against him; which displeasure, being fomented many ways by Ferdinand, had interclud'd almost all Correspondence betwixt them, till by Monsieur de Langeys industry it was reviv'd. Who to appease them alledg'd not only some Excusatory Letters formerly sent, but said his Master could not make any Alliance, nor lend any Aid to any Prince against them. Nor would burn any for holding the Tenents of the Augustan Confession, unless they were both Authors of dissension in his Kingdom, and despight'd the ancient Ceremonies of the Church. After which in private Conference with their Divines, he declar'd that the King his Master, was not averse to most of their Tenents set down in Melancthon's Loci Communes; and particularly that he did not hold the Popes Supremacy to be founded Jure Divino, but humano; though Henry VIII. (he said) denied it either way. That Purgatory, being the ground of the Mass, and all their gainful Doctrine, he had requir'd by what place in the Scripture they prov'd it: To which all the answer they made, after divers Months space, was, that they would not give their Adversaries Weapons which might afterwards be return'd or retorted on themselves. As for Monasteries, he said, that he thought it might be obtain'd of the Pope, that none who were not of some ripe age, should vow themselves to that Life. Or if they did, they might leave it and marry if they would. But by no means, that his Master would have them thrown down, or the Revenues taken away, but rather employ'd towards the bringing up of Youth in Learning and Piety. And for marriage of Priests, he thought this the best expedient, that Men already married, might (notwithstanding their Wives) be admitted to execute the Priesthood; but for others, they should not marry, or if they would, they should relinquish the Priesthood. As for Communion under both kinds, that the King had heretofore spoken with Clement VII. at Mar-seilles, and that he thought it might be obtain'd of this Pope, that free use of both might be granted according to the Conscience of him that took it, alledging for this purpose from the King his Master, how he had heard from ancient Men, that about 120 years ago, it was the manner to communicate in both kinds, in the Chapels or Oratories, but not in the body or middle of the Church. Nevertheless, that the Kings of France receiv'd it ever in both kinds. Which when his said Master urg'd, the Priests did answer him, that Kings were anointed, and therefore might communicate in both kinds as well as they. For the Scriptures speak of the Royal Priesthood, but it was not lawful for others to do so. That in the common and ordinary Prayers, the King did acknowledge that many things might be cut off, many things should be wholly taken away. And that the care hereof was heretofore committed by Clement to the Cardinal de la Cruz, though not with any good Success. In conclusion, he exhorted them to send some of their chief Divines to confer with those he had in Paris; and that he would make such a choice, as if some that were appointed, were vehement, and eager, he would also joyn others that were mild and temperate Persons to treat with them, to the intent that all parts being discuss'd the truth might appear. In the mean while he exhorted them by no means to give ear, or agree to any Council, until they knew his mind and the Kings of England, who both were resolv'd to do nothing but by a mutual consent. As for those who had power to call it, that his Predecessor Louis was of Opinion, that it belong'd to the Emperors and Kings, and that the King of Navarre was of the same mind, but that Pope Julius Proscribing or Excommunicating them both, Ferdinand of Spain took that occasion to conquer Navarre. Nevertheless that the King his Master confess'd no Council was Authentical, unless it were both assembled in so safe a place, and held in so free a manner as no Man might suffer for speaking his Conscience. After all which, the said Monsieur de Langey did sollicite them much, to enter into a strict League with the King his Master. But they, whether out of favour for Ferdinand and the Emperor, with whom they had lately made their Peace, or, that otherwise they were not sufficiently satisfied of the French Kings proceedings, formerly mention'd, refus'd this. So that Monsieur de Langey, (though professing on the present Popes part, that if matters were orderly carried, he would be content to comply in many things for a common Good and Peace) return'd without effecting any thing. And thus out of I know not what mistaking or obstinacy, this great overture for bringing all the differences in Religion, to a moderate and uniform accord, was interrupted and broken off, it being probable that Francis would have subscrib'd to the Tenents of Religion, which himself propos'd, when he had found them conformable for the rest. But as Monsieur de Langey told them, they might afterwards repent their neglect of so great an offer; so it prov'd true, as by the sequence will appear. For Francis who would have been glad, both that the Power which the Pope usurp'd over Kings were something diminish'd, and the abovesaid Articles in Religion establish'd, finding there was now no probability of an Union, thought it safer to rule by his ancient Maxims, than to run the trouble and hazard of a Reformation. Yet I find by an Original from Christopher Mount a German, and Agent of our Kings, then in France, that Monsieur de Langey did once receive from the Protestants certain Articles concerning Pacification in Religion, which he deliver'd the King his Master; which thereupon being perus'd, mitigated and chang'd by the Sorbon or Parisian Divines, were again return'd to the Protestants, who likewise advising of them, said they would tolerate this change, Modo spes Concordiae hinc accessura sit. But this was before Langey's Oration above-mention'd, and perchance before they knew or had taken particular notice of the French Kings Actions formerly deliver'd. I find also by the same Original, that Mount was commanded by our King to hasten to Germany, and to dehort Melancthon from going to France, whether he was invited by that King, and to persuade him hither. For as about this time the German Protestants desir'd both friendship and accommodation in Religion with King Henry and Francis, into whose hands they put the arbitrement of their Differences, so both Princes sought to make use of Melancthon; especially our King; having, as I find in the Instructions to Mount, a great opinion of his Vertue, Learning, Temperance and Gravity, and therefore desir'd his presence here, both for framing an accord with the Germans, and (when that succeeded not) for appeasing the differences of Religion in his Kingdom, it being thought a fit work for that pious and modest Man, however he be branded by some, tanquam De omni Religione securus. But if Mount's Relation of his Conference with Monsieur de Langey may be intirely believ'd, or (if you will) Monsieur de Langey himself; one of the Points the said Protestants would have agreed to, was, Se ferre Possé primatum Episcopi Romani, ad servandum Doctrinæ Confersum in Ecclesiâ, modo secundum Dei verbum omnia julicet. Langey himself confessing Impossibile esse probari Primatum Episcopi Romani ex Dei verbo. And that this Point was so far acknowledged by Clement VII. that he said he was content, Ut Primatus hic positus jure deferatur; and that the more learn'd Cardinals in Rome were of this Opinion. But these things I leave to the credit of Mount, the discreet and diligent Sleiden not mentioning any such moderation on either side, and Mount himself giving indeed no other Authority for this, but Monsieur de Langey's word by way of Discourse, who yet when he was demanded for a sight of the Articles and Censure above related, excus'd himself.

This year some Letters from Sevil in Spain, extant among our Records, advertis'd our King, that a Million of Gold was brought the Emperor from Peru, yet that it was thought to be gotten rather out of the spoils of the Country than otherwise, no rich Mines being then found. Nevertheless, that the Inhabitants of Andalusia flock'd thither in so great numbers, that the Country was almost left empty. Which Intelligence, though of great Consideration, was yet pass'd over; the King being intentive wholly to the settling of Religion, and the right of Succession, which I find he did with all industry procure.

Brass Canon first cast in England.

It appears by our Histories that this year great brass Ordnance, as Canon and Culverins were first cast in England, by one John Owen, they having been formerly made only in other Countries, and far from the perfection of which they are at this present, as may be seen in Tartaglia, and some other ancient Authors.

Queen Katharine, or (as the King commanded her to be call'd) the Princess Dowager, finding now no assistance but spiritual from the Pope, nor reparation procur'd by the Emperor but uncertain and slow, and for the rest grieving at the prosperity and fruitfulness of Queen Anne (now with Child again, whereof yet she miscarried) fell into her last sickness at Kimbolton in Huntingdonsire, in the fiftieth year of her Age, and the three and thirtieth since her coming into England; during which time, though comforted by the King and Eustachio Chapuys, Doctor of both Laws, and Ambassador resident from Charles, she fell so desperately ill, as finding death now coming, she caus'd a Maid attending on her, to write to the King to this effect:

My most Dear Lord, King and Husband,
THE hour of my death now approaching, I cannot chuse, out out of love I bear you, advise you of your Souls Health, which you ought to prefer before all considerations of the World or Flesh whatsoever. For which yet you have cast me into many Calamities, and your self into many Troubles. But I forgive you all; and pray God to do so likewise. For the rest I commend unto you Mary our Daughter, beseeching you to be a good Father to her, as I have heretofore desir'd. I must intreat you also, to respect my Maids, and give them in Marriage, which is not much, they being but three; and to all my other Servants, a years pay besides their due, lest otherwise they should be unprovided for: Lastly, I make this Vow, that mine eyes desire you above all things.

Farewell.

Besides which Letter she dictated another to Eustachius, desiring him to procure that the Emperor might put our King in mind of her request, when otherwise he forgot it.

The King having receiv'd her Letter, became so compassionate, that he wept; but her death being related shortly after, he caus'd her Goods (which I find estimated to 5000 Marks) to be imploy'd towards the Funeral chiefly, and after to those that deserv'd recompence; and her Body to be buried with due solemnity in the Monastery at Peterborough, which for the honour of her Memory, King Henry reserv'd (when all the rest fell) and erected it to a Bishops See. The News whereof, not long after, being brought to the Emperor, troubled him much, as holding his Aunt in singular esteem. But as he considered, that in her death all causes of Hostility were ceas'd, and that besides, it concern'd him more to defend himself against the Turk, than to pursue the execution of the Popes Ban (though once undertaken by him) he endeavour'd nothing more than to close handsomly with our King. Nevertheless, as he was discreet and magnanimous, he would not fully discover himself till he had founded first our Kings Disposition. After which (as I find mention'd in the instruction of our King to Doctor Richard Pace) Charles (by his Resident Ambassador here) propos'd a Renovation of the ancient Amity, upon these Conditions. First, that our King would be reconciled to the Pope, wherein he offer'd his Mediation. Secondly, that our King would aid him against the Turk. Thirdly, that (according to the Treaty 1518.) he would help him against the French, who now threatned Milan. To which our King answer'd; That the first breach of Amity proceeded from the Emperor, which if he will acknowledge, and excuse, King Henry is contented to renew it, simply and absolutely; as for the Conditions propos'd: First, touching the Bishop of Rome, the proceedings against him have been so just, and so ratified by the Parliament of England, that it cannot be revok'd. Therefore, though the Bishop himself hath made means to him for Reconciliation, yet it hath been refus'd. Secondly, for aid against the Turk, when Christian Princes shall be at Peace, then King Henry will do therein as to a Christian Prince belongeth. Thirdly, for aid against France, he cannot resolve on that, till the Amity be renewed with the Emperor, that so being indifferent friend to both, he may freely travail, either to keep peace between them, or aid the injur'd Party. And these answers of the Kings, Pace was to signifie to the Emperor then at Rome, and to urge him to renew the Amity without any such Conditions; but, as the Emperor hearkned not thereunto, so King Henry, thinking of nothing less than embracing his friendship on those terms, imploy'd his care chiefly how to defend his Kingdom against the threatned Invasions. And therefore as he had often experienced the Love and Obedience of his Subjects, so in his important occasions at this time, he resolv'd to make use of them, commanding thereupon, the Parliament, which had been Prorogu'd, to sit the fourth of February: In which many Acts pass'd, the most material whereof I have set down briefly, not always according to the order observ'd in the Statute-Book, but rather according

Whereas the trial and punishment of Pirates was heretofore according to the forms of the Civil Law, it was now order'd, That it should be determin'd by the Kings Commission, in like form as offences done upon Land, no benefit of Clergy yet being permitted to those who were convicted: Nevertheless, distinction to be made between Pirates, and those who took something at Sea out of necessity: As is to be seen in the Statute more largely.

Order also was taken upon Penalty, that all they who had Parks, should keep two or more Mares, according to the greatness of the Parks, of thirteen handfuls high, for breed of strong Horses; and that the Stallions should be fourteen handfuls high at least: And this was much to the increase of good Horses.

The course of suing forth Gifts and Grants made under the Kings Signet Manual, and the Clerks of the Signets Fees also were set down.

Also because many Men by Will made Feoffments of their Lands to secret uses, whereby the King and the Lords lost their Wards, &c. It was order'd, that the possession of Lands shall be adjudg'd to be in him that hath the use thereof.

Order also was taken, that no Land should pass by bargain and sale, unless it be by Writing indented, seal'd and inroll'd. And this prevented many mistakes, and took away much deceit.

And now because some Statutes following give me occasion to speak of Wales, it will not be displeasing to the Reader (I hope) to set down those Reasons, which I conceive were the true motives of them.

Reg. 27. History of Wales. Wales and the Marches thereof now having been for a long time so distinguish'd, as the Maritime parts thereof were held by the remnant of the ancient Britains, or Natives of this Island, the other by those who had got ground upon them, much diversity of Government was us'd. For as the Kings of England heretofore had many times brought Armies to conquer that Country, defended both by Mountains and a stout People, without yet reducing them to a final and intire Obedience; so they resolv'd at last to give all that could be gain'd there to those who would attempt it. Whereupon many valiant and able Nobles and Gentlemen won much Land from the Welsh: Which, as gotten by force, was by permission of the Kings then reigning, held for divers Ages, in that absolute manner, as Jura Regalia were exercis'd in them by the Conquerors. Yet, in those parts which were gotten at the Kings only charge, (being not a few) a more regular Law was observ'd. Howsoever, the general Government was not only severe, but various in many parts: Insomuch, that in about some 141 Lordships Marchers which were now gotten, many strange and discrepant Customs were practis'd (as will appear hereafter.) Howbeit, in the greater part, which was the Kings, and particularly those in the East, West, and North-Wales, being about this time administred by my great Grand-father Sir Richard Herbert (Son of Sir Richard Herbert, renown'd for that alone he pass'd and return'd twice through an hostile Army at the Battel in Banbury-Field, 8 Edw. IV.) such Justice was us'd, as I find him in our Records highly commended to the Kings Council by Rowland Lee, now President of Wales. So that they were govern'd in general according to the Laws of England; the Lords Marchers (who conquer'd at their own cost) ruling yet by their own Laws and Customs, and substituting Officers at their pleasure, who again committed such Rapines, as nothing almost was safe or quiet in those parts: whereupon this Statute was made.

Whereas manifold Robberies, Murders, and other Male-facts be daily practis'd and committed in the County-Palatine of Chester and Flintshire in Wales, and also in Anglesea, Caernarvon, Merioneth, Cardigan, Carmarthen, Pembroke and Glamorgan, because Justice is not ministr'd there in such form as in other places of this Realm. For remedy whereof, it is enacted, that the Lord Chancellor of England, or Keeper of the Great Seal, shall nominate and appoint Justices of Peace, Justices of the Quorum, and Justices of the Goal-delivery in the said Counties, and that they shall have like Power and Authority as those in England, &c. And by this means one kind of Justice was establish'd in the said County-Palatine of Chester, and the Shires aforesaid: So that Offenders now were kept in awe, being not able, as before, to escape and fly from one Lordship Marcher to another. Another Act also was made to this purpose.

Whereas in Wales and the Marches, there were Regn. 27. divers and many Forrests belonging either to the Cap. 7. King or the Lords Marchers, wherein sundry actions had been us'd a long time, contrary to the Law of God and Man; insomuch, that if any enter'd the said Forrests without a Token given (by some of the Forresters or Walkers of it) to let him pass, or unless he were a yearly Tributer or Chenfer, he was forc'd to pay a grievous Fine; but if he were found 24 foot out of the High-way, then to forfeit all the Gold or Money about him, and a joynt of one of his Hands, unless he fin'd for it at the discretion of the Forrester, or Farmer of the same. And whereas likewise, if any Cattle stray'd into the said Forrests, it was the custom of the Forresters to mark him for their own with the mark of the Forrest; Order was now given, that People should be suffer'd to pass freely, as in other places, and estray'd Cattel within a year and a day to be restor'd again, the Owners paying for the Herbage.

That whereas by the gifts of Kings of England, heretofore, Regn. 27. Cap. 24. divers of the most ancient Prerogatives and Authorities of Justice appertaining to the Imperial Crown of this Realm, have been sever'd and taken from the same, it was now enacted, that no Person from the first of July, 1536. should have Power and Authority to pardon or remit, Treasons, Murthers, Man-slaughters, or any Felonies, or their accessaries in any part of England, Wales, or the Marches of the same. That likewise none should make Justices of Oyer, Justices of Assize, Justices of Peace, or Justices of Goal-delivery, but they should be made by the Kings Letters Patents: And that all Original Writs, and Judicial Writs, and all manner of Indictments of Treason, Felony, and Trespass, and all manner of Process should be made in the Kings Name; and things done against the Kings Peace, should be suppos'd as done against the Kings Peace, and not against the peace of any other Person. Notwithstanding which, divers Priviledges were permitted, as is to be seen in the Statutes. By all which, as the vast power invested anciently in those who had Counties Palatine, and Jura Regalia in Lordships Marchers may appear; so we may observe how the restoring of them to the Crown, hath establish'd an uniform Justice, and taken away the the occasions of many mischiefs done within the Jurisdictions and Precincts of the said Counties Palatine, and Lordships Marchers, as is before recited; which though a great benefit and ease to the Welsh, yet as they were under many constraints, they hop'd his Highness would further extend his goodness to them: And thus some (as in their name) speak to this effect;

Speech of a Welsh Gentleman to the K. in favour of Wales.

May it please your Highness,
WE, on the part of your Highness Subjects, inhabiting that portion of the Island which our Invaders first call'd Wales, most humbly prostrate at your Highness feet, do crave to be receiv'd and adopted into the same Laws, and Priviledges which your other Subjects enjoy: Neither shall it hinder us (we hope) that we have liv'd so long under our own. For as they were both enacted by authority of our ancient Law-givers, and obey'd for many successions of Ages, we trust your Highness will pardon us, if we thought it neither ease nor safe to suddenly to relinquish them. We shall not presume yet to compare them with these now us'd, and less shall we contest how good and equal in themselves they are. Only if the defence of them and our liberty against the Romans, Saxons, and Danes, for so many hundred years, and lastly, against the Normans, as long as they pretended no Title but the Sword, was thought Just and Honourable; we presume it will not be infamous now; and that all the marks of Rebellion and Falshood, which our revilers would fasten on us, will fall on any, sooner than those who fought for so many years, and with so different Nations for our just defence: Which also is so true, that our best Histories affirm the Christian Religion to have been preserv'd only by us for many years, that the Saxons (being Heathen) either attempted or possess'd this Country. May your Highness then graciously interpret our Actions, while we did but that duty which your Highness would have now done by all your Subjects on like occasion; for when any should invade this Country henceforth, we know your Highness would have us to behave our selves no otherwise. Besides, had not the Assailers found some to resist, they might have despis'd a Country, that brought none forth able enough to assert it: So that we crave pardon, Sir, if we say it was fit for the honour of your Dominions that some part of it should never be conquer'd. We then in the Name of whatsoever in your Highnesses possession hath in any age held out against all Invaders, do here voluntarily resign, and humble our selves to that Sovereignty, which we acknowledge so well invested in your Highness. Nor is this the first time; we have always attended an occasion to unite our selves to the greater and better parts of the Island.

But as the Kings of this Realm, weary of their attempts in Person against us, did formerly give not only our Country to those who could conquer it, but permitted them Jura Regalia, within their several Precincts; so it was impossible to come to an agreement, while so many that undertook this work, usurp'd Martial and absolute power and jurisdiction in all they acquir'd, without establishing any equal Justice. And that all Offenders for the rest, flying from one Lordship Marcher (for so they were term'd) to another, did both avoid the punishment of the Law, and easily commit those Robberies, which have formerly tainted the honour of our parts. So that until the rigorous Laws not only of the several Conquerors of England, but the attempters on our parts, were brought to an equal moderation, no Union, how much soever affected by us, could ensue.

Therefore, and not sooner, we submitted our selves to Edward the First, a Prince who made both many and equaller Laws than any before him. Therefore we defended his Son Edward the Second, when not only the English forsook him, but our selves might have recover'd our former liberty, had we desir'd it. Therefore we got Victories for Edward the Third, and stood firm during all the dissensions of this Realm to his Grandchild and Successor Richard the Second. Only if some amongst us resisted Henry the Fourth, your Highness may better suppose the reason than we tell it, though divers foreigners openly refusing to treat with him as a Sovereign and lawful Prince, have sufficiently publish'd it. We did not yet decline a due Obedience to Henry the Fifth, though in doubtful times, we cannot deny, but many refractory Persons have appear'd. Howsoever, we never joyn'd our selves with the English Rebels, or took occasion thereby to recover our Liberty, though in Richard the Second's time, and during all the Civil Wars betwixt Lancaster and York, much occasion was given. For adhering to the House of York, which we conceiv'd the better Title, we conserv'd our Devotion still to the Crown, until your Highness Fathers time, who (bearing his Name and Blood from us) was the more chearfully assisted by our Predecessors in his Title to the Crown, which your Highness doth presently enjoy. And thus, Sir, if we gave anciently proof of a generous courage in defending our Laws and Country, we have given no less proof of a loyal Fidelity since we first rendered our selves. Infomuch, that we may truly affirm, that after our acceptance of the Condition given us by Edward the First, we have omitted no occasion of performing the duty of loving Subjects. Neither is there any thing that comforts us more than that all those controversies about Succession (which so long wasted this Land) are determin'd in your Highness Person; in whom we acknowledge both Houses to be happily united. To your Highness therefore we offer all Obedience, desiring only that we may be defended against the insulting of our malignant Censurers: For we are not the Off-spring of the Run-away Britains (as they term us;) but Natives of a Country, which, besides defending it self, receiv'd all those who came to us for Succours. Give us then (Sir) permission to say, that they wrong us much, who pretend our Country was not inhabited before then, or that it fail'd in a due Piety, when it was so hospital to all that fled thither for refuge: Which also will be more credible, when it shall be remembred, that even our highest Mountains furnish good Beef and Mutton, not only to all the Inhabitants, but supply England in great quantity. We humbly beseech your Highness therefore, that this Note may be taken from us. As for our Language, though it seem harsh, it is that yet which was spoken anciently, not only in this Island, but in France: Some Dialects whereof therefore remain still amongst the Bas Bretons there, and here in Cornwall. Neither will any Man doubt it, when he shall find those words of the ancient Gaulish Language repeated by the Latin Authors, to signifie the same thing amongst us at this day: Nor shall it be a disparagement (we hope) that it is spoken so much in the Throat, since the Florentine and Spaniard affect this kind of Pronunciation, as believing words that sound so deep, proceed from the Heart. So that if we have retain'd this Language longer than the more Northern Inhabitants of this Island (whose Speech appears manifestly 1511. festly to be a kind of English, and consequently introduc'd by the Saxons) we hope it will be no imputation to us; your Highness will have but the more Tongues to serve you: It shall not hinder us to study English, when it were but to learn how we might the better serve and obey your Highness: To whose Laws we most humbly desire again to be adopted, and doubt not, but if in all Countries the Mountains have afforded as eminent Wits and Spirits as any other part, ours also by your Highness's good favour and imployment may receive that esteem.

Act for an union between England and Wales. The King now considering that it was but reasonable to unite this part of the Kingdom to the rest, and that their Loyalty besides had deserv'd as much as they were Suitors for, caus'd an Act to be past for executing Justice in Wales, in manner as is in England, and reduc'd the Lordship Marchers to Shire-ground. The Statute is to this effect:

Chap. 26. That albeit the Dominion, Principality and Country of Wales be a Member and part of the Temporal Crown of this Realm, whereof therefore the King is Head and Ruler; yet as it hath divers Rights, Usages, Laws and Customs discrepant from the Laws and Customs of this Realm, and because their Language is different from that which is spoken here, and that many rude People hereupon have made distinction and diversity betwixt his Highness's other Subjects, and them, to the causing of much Discord and Sedition; his Highness therefore, out of his love and favour to his Subjects in Wales, and for reducing them to his Laws, doth by advice and consent of his Parliament ordain and enact, that Wales should be unite and incorporate henceforth to and with his Realm of England; and that his Subjects should enjoy and inherit all singular Freedoms, Liberties, Rights, Privileges and Laws which his Highness's Subjects elsewhere enjoy and inherit. And therefore that Inheritances should descend after the manner of England, without Division or Partition, and not after any tenure or form of Welsh Laws or Customs. And forasmuch as there are divers Lordships Marchers within the said Country or Dominion in Wales, being no parcel of any other Shires where the Laws and due Correction is us'd and had, and that in them and the Countries adjoining manifold Murders, Robberies, Felonies, and the like, have been done, contrary to all Law and Justice, because the Offenders, making their refuge from one Lordship Marcher to another, were continued without Punishment and Correction: Therefore it was enacted that the said Lordships Marchers should be united, annexed, and joyn'd to divers Shires specified in the said Act.

Clun. Whereupon 24 Lordships Marchers were united to Monmouthshire, and the Laws of England enjoyn'd in them: 16 to Brecknockshire; 16 to Radnorshire, eleven to Montgomeryshire; and ten to Denbighshire: seven to Shropshire, which were reduc'd again to certain Hundreds, as Donn to Cherbury, &c. ten to Herefordshire, and they likewise reduc'd to Hundreds three; and all the Lordships, &c. betwixt Chepstowbridge and Gloucestershire, to Glocestershire; and they again reduc'd to one Hundred; seventeen to Glamorganshire; eight to Carmarthenshire; thirteen to Pembrokeshire; four to Cardiganshire; one to Merionethshire: By which it appears how much of Wales is continued intire, and how much was gotten by the Lords Marchers. After this again, many Priviledges were given to the Lords Marchers, in regard of the Service their Ancestors rendred the Crown heretofore, in conquering those parts at their own cost, concerning which Histories, Records, &c. may be seen, to which I refer my self. 1512.

Also power was given to the King to alter any thing in this Act, within the space of three years next ensuing, whereof we shall speak again 34 Hen. viii. c. 26. More also is extant hereof, 1 Edw. vi. 10. and 21 Jacobi 10. where through that Kings goodness all power for altering the Laws in Wales is repeal'd.

I will now come to certain Acts of Parliament concerning Ecclesiastical Matters, of which kind there are four chiefly:

The first, having relation to one formerly recited out of 26 Henry viii. whereby the First-fruits and Tenths were given for more augmentation of maintenance of the Kings Royal Dignity, of the Supream Head of the Church of England, doth now declare, that no Tenth shall be exacted that year wherein First-fruits are paid. 1534.

Secondly, whereas 25 Hen. viii. it was enacted, that the Clergy in their Convocations shall make no Constitutions without the Kings assent, as also that the King should have authority to nominate 16 Spiritual, and 16 Temporal Persons to examine the Canons and Constitutions aforesaid, the said Acts were now confirm'd.

Thirdly, Order was given about Sanctuary-men, that they should wear Badges to be known by, and no Weapons; that they should not go abroad but at due hours, and not resist their Governors, &c.

Fourthly, A Court of Augmentation was erected, whereby order was taken concerning the Religious Houses that were surrendred or suppress'd; and how the Kings Revenue should be increas'd thereby, and Officers for this purpose appointed.

These Marks of the Kings Sovereignty being thus premis'd, I shall come to the Act of Suppression of Religious Houses under 200 l. yearly. Which though lamented by many, and no ways so excus'd, that I know, as by the Kings necessities, had yet those Motives. The vicious and incorrigible life of Monastical Persons, confess'd, by the whole Parliament: The Lands not employ'd according to the intent of the Donors and Founders; divers Superstitions and forgings of Miracles practis'd amongst them: That when those under 200 l. yearly were taken away, there remain'd yet many great and Religious Houses: That they were the Seminary of those that oppos'd the Regal Authority in Ecclesiastical Matters; to which some have thought the reason formerly touch'd might be added, that the Parliament was willing to lay the burthen of furnishing the Kings necessities from themselves. And the rather, that the King promis'd to imploy some of the Revenues to other Religious uses: As founding of Bishopricks, Deaneries, and Chapters, and the like. Which indeed follow'd, though not mentioned in the Statute. Howsoever, the Statute without any formal Preamble in the publish'd Book, begins bluntly thus: His Majesty shall have and enjoy to him and his Heirs for ever, all Monasteries, Priories, and other Religious Houses of Monks, Canons, and Nuns of what Habit, Order, or Rule soever, which have not in Lands and Revenue above the clear yearly value of 200 l. as also all such Religious Houses which at any time within one years space preceding, have been given up and granted by any Abbot, Prior, Abbes, or Priorefs under their Covent Seal; (reserving yet all Right to others by Lease and otherwise, and particularly the Right of the Heirs and Successors of the Founders, Patrons, or Donors to any Possession, Rent, Fee, or Office, according to the true intention:)

The King also (as I find in the Parliament Rolls) allow'd the Governors of these Houses Pensions during their Lives, and translated some of the Religious Persons into other greater Foundations.

Lesser Monasteries dissolv'd.

Cromwell's advice to the King herein.

And thus were the lesser Monasteries dissolv'd, with care yet that Hospitality should be preserv'd; for which reason also our King did pass them away at such easie rates. Nevertheless, as the Penalty being not ordinarily requir'd, due Hospitality was for the most part neglected: So the Forfeitures being great, were at the Supplication of the Parliament, 21 Jacobi, wholly abolish'd, at length, by the indulgence of that King. Notwithstanding, it is probable, that not on this occasion only, the Abbey-Lands were scattered and distributed into so many hands, since Cromwell forgot not to tell his King, that the more had interest in them, the more they would be irrevocable. But whatsoever the reasons were, it is certain, that use was not made of them which might have been, while the Revenue of the Crown was so little improv'd thereby. Since it is clear, that if the profits of those which were dissolv'd, had been employ'd for a settled entertaining and payment of a Royal Army at Land, and a great Fleet at Sea, (which as they were the third or fourth part of the Revenues of the Land, might have been easily done) our King without having recourse to any other means, might (besides securing his Realm) have given the Law in great part to all his Neighbours. And now of these ancient Monuments of Devotion, 376 being dissolv'd, a Revenue of about thirty or thirty two thousand pound yearly, fell into the Kings hands, besides Goods and Chattels; which at low Rates were valued at one hundred thousand pound. The People (especially they that got nothing thereby) in the mean while being griev'd to see the Monks and Nuns wandring abroad, and the Churches and Chappels perverted to secular and prophane uses; so that they began to murmur; which being again fomented by some Religious Persons turn'd to Rebellion, as shall be told hereafter. The respect also given to the Relicks there, and some pretended Miracles fell; inso-much as I find by our Records that a piece of St. Andrew's Finger, (cover'd only with an ounce of Silver) being laid to pledge by a Monastery for forty pound, was left unredeem'd at the Dissolution of the said House; the King Commissioners (who upon surrender of any Foundation, undertook to pay the Debts thereof) refusing to return the price again.

Regn. 27. Protestant Princes in Germany make Proposals to the King.

Dec. 25. 1535.

This fall of Abbeys yet did but set forwards the Kings designs with the Confederate Princes and Towns in Germany; who understanding hereof, and believing now the King would wholly renounce all Papistry, and knowing besides that Queen Anne was disaffected to their adverse Party, as her greatest Enemies, thought fit to make our Kings Orators (yet at Smalcald) these Propositions, as our Records shew.

I. That he should approve and imbrace the Augustan Confession, unless some things shall be alter'd therein by common consent according to the Scripture.

II. And, Secondly, in a free Council, if any be, shall defend it with them.

III. That neither part should admit any Summons for a Council, or agree upon a place for the sitting of it, without the others Consent; yet that if such a Council were offer'd, as Vergerius the Popes Legate now propos'd, that is to say, free and pious, that it should not be refus'd.

IV. That if the Pope proceeded otherwise, that they should oppose and protest publicly against him.

V. That the King should joyn himself, as to their Doctrine, so to their League; and thereupon accept the Title of Patron and Defender of it.

VI. That the vulgar Opinion de Primatu Pontificis should be rejected for ever.

VII. That if either of the Contrabents be invaded for Religion, the other shall give no Aid against him.

VIII. That the King shall pay 100000 Crowns towards the defence of the League, and if the War be long, 200000 Crowns, upon Condition, that what was remaining should be restor'd when the War was ended.

IX. That when the King hath declar'd his mind herein, they will send an Ambassage of Learned Men to him.

These Propositions being communicated by Cromwell to the Bishop of Winchester then in France, the Bishop return'd this Advice: That if the first Article were accorded, the King shall do nothing without their consent, though otherwise he be bound in conscience to reform his Church. To the rest, that he conceives no good nor honourable League can be made with those Inferior Princes for Religion, without the Emperor, whom the King must allow to be Supreme Head of Germany, as his Majesty is of England. Again, that they could give King Henry no Reciproque, as lying at that distance: Finally, he admonished, that they be mov'd to approve the Kings Title, since he had understood in France, that they would not agree thereto, lest they should thereby grant the Emperor the same Authority over their Persons. In sequence whereof, on the twelfth of March following (1536.) the Bishop of Hereford, and the other Orators now at Wittemberg return'd the Protestants this answer: That the King their Sovereign lik'd their Propositions with some Corrections; and that though all were quiet here, and no cause why he should fear any Attempts, or when they were, that it was taken away by the death of the late Queen; yet for restoring as well as retaining the true Doctrine, he was content to disburse the sum requir'd, if once the League were made: Whereof therefore he would treat at large with their Commissioners, whom they promis'd to send: As for the honour they did him, in constituting him Patron and Defender of the League, that he render'd them due thanks, and acknowledg'd their good will. And though he understood well, to how much envy this Charge was expos'd, yet that for the publick good he would not refuse it, when they could agree among themselves concerning the First and Second Article. For unless there were an Union and Consent in Doctrine, that he should get no Honour by undertaking it. Therefore that he desir'd their Learned Men and his should concur; for until some places of their Confession and Apology were mollified by private Conference, that there was small hope of an Agreement. Therefore, that he desir'd much that they would send some Commissioners for this purpose, and among them, some one eminent for his Learning, who might confer with his Divines of the Doctrine and Essential part of Religion, as well as Ceremonies of the Church. That since he was so liberal to them, he hop'd they would not refuse, if any made War against him, to furnish for four Months, 500 Foot, or 10 Ships equipp'd at their cost; and at his cost 2000 Horse, and 5000 Foot, or in lieu of these Foot 12 Ships equip-ped; which the King shall keep and maintain as long as his occasions require. Lastly, that they should approve the Sentence given by the Divines of Wittenberg in favour of his Divorce, and second Marriage, and if any Council General were holden, should there defend it. To Answer.

April 24.

To all which the Duke of Saxony replying, that he would advise hereof with the other Confederates, this Answer finally at a meeting at Francfort on the 24th of April, 1536. was return'd, That although divers were entred newly into the League, and divers who were at a distance from home, had no Commission for giving any definitive Sentence: Notwithstanding, that in this meeting it should be resolv'd concerning an Ambassador to be sent his Highness, and they who could not resolve for the present, should declare themselves within the space of one Month. And that there was no question but they would conform themselves to the Opinion of the major part. Whereupon Instructions were given for certain Orators to be sent to England; in which yet it was (saith Sleidan) especially provided, that nothing should be treated of to the prejudice of the Emperor, or Empire. And thus in the Name of the Confederate Cities, Jacobus Sturmius was appointed; the Divines being Melancthon, Bucerus, and Georgius Draco. But as shortly after the death of Queen Anne followed; so all their proceeding (as Sleidan notes) was stopt, until upon occasion given, it was revived. As for the approbation of the Divorce propos'd to the German Divines, Luther, Jonas, Philip, and others, the King was judiciously advis'd by his Agents from thence, not to require any thing of them which would be too hard to grant; the King having attain'd his principal intent concerning the Council and Pope, and the Princes being then in such terms with the Emperor and Ferdinand, as they desir'd not to offend them without an urgent necessity.

Affairs of Scotland.

James King of Scotland, having the year before been install'd of the Garter, and in sequence thereof instructed with the causes of those changes which had follow'd in Religious Government, did not yet altogether incline to our King. For as he had an eye to the troubles that might ensue in England concerning Succession, as long as the Issue of both Queens surviv'd; so he desir'd to strengthen himself by the advice and assistance of Francis: Yet being desirous withal to conserve our Kings affection; and knowing also his designs on that part could not be long conceal'd, he thought fit to advertise our King thereof; discovering himself no farther yet, than that he intended to match in that Country: Who also approving this, rather than that he should bestow himself in the Emperors Family (which he still suspected) gave his consent thereunto, as I find by our Records; yet so as he desir'd the Match might be betwixt him and the Daughter of the Duke of Vendosme, rather than of Francis; upon condition still that the Interview might precede. But King James, who had no disposition thereunto (though I find in our Records, the Queen his Mother once perswaded him,) resolves to go secretly and in disguis'd habit to France. Whereupon also, commanding some Ships to be made ready, he set sail from Lieth, not acquainting any yet with his Journey; so that divers thought he purpos'd to land in some part of our Kings Dominions. But contrary winds arising, he being demanded what course his Pilots should hold, answer'd, to any place but England; wherewith falling asleep, he was ere he waken'd, by the advice of one of the Hamiltons (as Buchanan hath it) carried back. But at last, opening his eyes, and finding himself at home, he was much offended with the Author of this Council, and the rather, that he was thought secretly to oppose the Match: So that he commanded to set sail again. Coming thus at length to the Duke of Vendosme's, and his Daughter not pleasing him (or rather, the Daughter of Francis liking him better) he arrives at Paris, and posting thence to the Liemois, where Francis was raising an Army against the Emperor (as shall be told hereafter) he obtain'd the consent of Francis (though not without some reluctancy on his part, and wholly against our Kings will) for his Daughter Magdalen, whom he married Jan. 1. 1537. The news whereof being brought to our King, troubled him so much, that he writ to Francis, (whom he perfectly lov'd at that time) that his late Interview with the Pope, and Alliance with the Scottish King vexed him no less than it would do a perfect Lover, De voir sa Dame entretenir son mortel Enemi: Whereof more at large in its due place. But as Francis excuse (alleging it was better he match'd there than with his Adversaries) did in some part satisfy our King; so the new married Lady falling into a Heetick Fever, and dying the year following, they both soon return'd to some part of their former Correspondence.

The troubles of Q.
Anne.

Our King now, thought by some to be various in his appetite of Wives, by others to be only unfortunate in them, had, or found, occasion to cut off Queen Anne; I shall not yet determine whether Princes secret Actions be beyond any Scrutiny. I will only lay down the particulars, as far as by Records, or otherwise I could gather them, remitting the rest to the equal Reader.

Queen Anne being now without Competitrix for her Title, thought her self secure. But Prosperity is a dangerous estate to those that use it not reverently. Again, Beauty is not always the best keeper of it self. It may be doubted yet whether either of those did concern her; since she was thought both moderate in her desires, and of discretion enough to make her capable of being trusted with her own perfections, as having liv'd in the French Court first, and after in this, with the reputation of a virtuous Lady; in so much that the whisperings of her Enemies could not divert the Kings good Opinion of her, though yet he was in his own nature more jealous than to be satisfied easily. I do reject all those, therefore, that would speak against her Honour in those times they staid in France; but I shall as little accuse her in this particular of her Affairs at this time; it is enough, that the Law hath condemn'd her; and that whether she, or any else were in fault, is not now to be discuss'd. This is certain, that the King had cast his affection already on Jane Seymour, (Daughter to Sir John Seymour Knight) then attending on the Queen. But whether this alone were enough to procure that Tragedy which follow'd, may be doubted in this Prince; for I do not find him bloody, but where Law, or at least pretext drawn from thence, did countenance his Actions. But suspicion in great and obnoxious Minds, is other than in the mild and temperate; and therefore is to them like a Tempest, which though it scarce stir low and shallow waters, when it meets a Sea, both vexeth it, and makes it toss all that comes thereon. So that I dare say nothing hath been Author of so much Confusion; since aggravating sometimes that which is ill, sometimes misinterpreting that which is good, it perverts all, and finally leaves the mind without Remedy; how far yet suspicion wrought on our King, is not for me to define.

To come then to the Narration, I find by our Authors, that on May-day there being a solemn Jufts at Greenwich (wherein George Viscount Rochford the Queens Brother was chief Challenger, and Henry Norreis Principal Defendant) the King suddenly departed. This much troubled the whole Company, especially the Queen. No cause hereof is related yet, unless (as Sanders hath it)

it) she let fall a Handkerchief, wherewith some one (suppos'd her Favorite) did wipe his Face, and that this was perceiv'd by the King. But our Histories mention not this Passage. The Queen finding the King thus gone, retires herself. He again hastning to Westminster, takes order to commit the next Morning George Lord Rochford, and Henry Norreis to the Tower: After which, her self coming to London in her Barge, was apprehended by some of the Lords, and carried towards the Tower, who telling her Offence, she exclaim'd that she was wrong'd, and that she desir'd to see the King only before she went; but in vain, they having no such Commission. When she entred the Tower, she is said to have fall'n on her Knees, beseeching God so to help her, as she was not guilty of that whereof she was accus'd. This was about five in the Afternoon on the second of May. After which, one William Brereton Esquire, and Sir Francis Weston of the Kings Privy Chamber, and one Mark Smeton a Musician were Committed on the same occasion. The Queen being thus in the charge of Sir William Kingston, Constable of the Tower, much Speech pass'd betwixt them, as appears by an Original of his: Yet as her Language was broken and distracted betwixt Tears and Laughter, (for she us'd both,) little can be inferr'd thence, only she seem'd to exclaim on Norreis, as if he had accus'd her; when yet she said, they both should die together. She nam'd others also, and thereupon confess'd, though not enough to condemn her, yet such Passages as might argue she took the utmost Liberty, that could be honestly allow'd her: But whether she extended it to any further Act, is not there declar'd. For amidst all her Discourses she still protested her self Innocent. By other Originals also of Kingston, it appears that he had made some difficulty to carry a Letter from her to Mr. Secretary, and that she with'd her Bishops were there: For they (she said) would go to the King for her; and that the most part of England would pray for her; and that if she died, a Punishment will fall on the Land; and in effect I find divers Bishops and Learned Men did much honour her, and particularly the Archbishop of Canterbury, who in a Consolatory Letter to the King, (which I have seen) wrote as much in her behalf as he durst; yet so as he made no Apology for her, but rather confesseth that divers of the Lords had told him of such faults as he was sorry to hear of, desiring howsoever, that he would continue his love to the Gospel, lest it should be thought it was for her sake only he had so favour'd it. After which another Letter in her Name, but no Original, coming to my hand, from more than one good part, I thought fit to transcribe here, without other credit yet than it is said to be found among the Papers of Cromwell then Secretary, and for the rest seems ancient and consonant to the matter in question.

SIR,

May 6.
The Queens Letter to the King.

Y Our Graces Displeasure, and my Imprisonment are things so strange unto me, as what to write, or what to excuse, I am altogether ignorant. Whereas you send unto me, (willing me to confess a truth, and so obtain your favour,) by such an one whom you know to be mine ancient profess'd Enemy, I no sooner receiv'd this Message by him, than I rightly conceiv'd your meaning; and as if as you say, confessing a truth indeed, may procure my safety, I shall with all willingness and duty perform your Command.

But let not your Grace ever imagine that your poor Wife will ever be brought to acknowledge a fault, where not so much as a thought thereof ever preceded.

And to speak a truth, never Prince had Wife more loyal in all Duty, and in all true Affection, than you have ever found in Anne Bolen, with which name and place I could willingly have contented my self, if God and your Graces pleasure, had so been pleas'd. Neither did I at any time so far forget my self in my Exaltation, or receiv'd Queenship, but that I always look'd for such an alteration as now I find; for the ground of my Preferment being on no surer foundation than your Graces fancy, the least alteration I know was fit and sufficient to draw that fancy to some other Subject. You have chosen me from a low estate to be your Queen and Companion, far beyond my desert or desire; if then you found me worthy of such Honour, good your Grace, let not any light fancy, or bad counsel of mine Enemies withdraw your Princely favour from me; neither let that stain, that unworthy stain of a disloyal heart towards your good Grace, ever cast so foul a blot on your most Dutiful Wife, and the Infant Princess your Daughter: Try me good King, but let me have a lawful Trial; and let not my sworn Enemies sit as my Accusers and Judges; yea, let me receive an open Trial, for my truth shall fear no open shames. Then shall you see either mine Innocency clear'd, your Suspicion and Conscience satisfied, the ignominy and slander of the World stopped, or my guilt openly declar'd. So that whatsoever God or you may determine of me, your Grace may be freed from an open Censure, and mine Offence being so lawfully prov'd, your Grace is at liberty both before God and Man, not only to execute worthy punishment on me as an unfaithful Wife, but to follow your affection already settled on that Party, for whose sake I am now as I am, whose Name I could some good while since have pointed unto, your Grace being not ignorant of my suspicion therein.

But if you have already determin'd of me, and that not only my Death, but an infamous slander must bring you the enjoying of your desir'd Happiness: Then I desire of God that he will pardon your great Sin therein, and likewise mine Enemies the Instruments thereof, and that he will not call you to a strict account for your unprincely and cruel usage of me at his General Judgment Seat, where both you and my self must shortly appear, and in whose judgment I doubt not (whatsoever the World may think of me) mine Innocence shall be openly known, and sufficiently clear'd.

My last and only request shall be, that my self may only bear the burthen of your Graces Displeasure; and that it may not touch the innocent Souls of those poor Gentlemen, who (as I understand) are likewise in strait Imprisonment for my sake. If ever I have found favour in your Sight, if ever the name of Anne Bolen hath been pleasing in your Ears, then let me obtain this Request; and I will so leave to trouble your Grace any further, with mine earnest Prayers to the Trinity to have your Grace in his good keeping, and to direct you in all your Actions. From my doleful Prison in the Tower, this 6th of May.

Your most Loyal and ever Faithful Wife,

ANNE BOLEN.

But whether this Letter were elegantly written by her, or any else heretofore, I know as little, as what Answer might be made thereunto: Only I cannot omit to tell, that the King was so little satisfied with her Actions or Letters, that not content to have gotten proof enough to put her to Death, he would further be divorc'd from her; which also by due Order and Process of Law (as an Act of Parliament hath it, 28 Hen. VIII.) was perform'd by Cranmer. The causes being not yet set down otherwise than that they were declar'd just, true and law-ful ful impediments of Marriage: I know not how to satisfy the Reader therein; especially since the Lady Elizabeth their Daughter is thereby pronounc'd Illegitimate. For as concerning Precontracts, I find by an Original Letter of the Earl of Northumberland (who it seems, might most be suspected) that he disavows it on his part. So that unless he retracted this Protestation, or that the contrary were prov'd, I cannot so much as imagine a reason. The Letter is thus to Cromwel.

I Perceive that there is supposed a Precontract between the Queen and me. Whereupon I was not only heretofore examin'd upon mine Oath before the Archbishops of Canterbury and York; but also receiv'd the blessed Sacrament upon the same, before the Duke of Norfolk, and others the Kings Council learned in the Spiritual Law; assuring you (Mr. Secretary) by the said Oath and blessed Body, which afore I receiv'd, and hereafter intend to receive, that the same may be to my Damnation, if ever there were any contract or promise of Marriage between her and me.

But if this were not sufficient, I believe such other cause was produc'd for the Divorce, as might satisfy the People, since the Act was publick. Neither is it much material which Hall saith, that the validity of this Marriage was questioned, because the King married this second Wife before he was divorc'd from his first: For it seems contrary to the Act of Parliament, which saith, That the impediments were, till of late, unknown. Shortly after which she was Arraign'd the 15 of May, 1536. before the Duke of Norfolk, High Steward of England for the day, the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Suffolk, and others of the Peers: And there, notwithstanding her discreet Answers, (as our Historians term them) found guilty, and Judgment pronounc'd accordingly. Immediately after which, the Lord Rochford her Brother, was Arraign'd and Condemn'd, as also Henry Norreis Esquire, Mark Smetton Groom of the Kings Privy-Chamber, William Breveton Esquire, and Sir Francis Weston Knight, Gentlemen of it, (the Lord Mayor and divers Aldermen and Citizens being present) and the 17th of May beheaded: The Queens death yet was respited till the 19th of the same. About which time order being taken that all Strangers in the Tower should be remov'd, Kingston in an Original to Cromwel writ these words, viz.

S I R,

May 19.
The Lieutenant of the Tower's Letter concerning her.

I F we have not an hour certain, as it may be known in London, I think here will be but few: And I think a reasonable number were best; for I suppose she will declare her self to be a good Woman for all Men, but for the King, at the hour of her Death: For this Morning she sent for me, and protested her Innocency: And now again, and said unto me, Mr. Kingston, I heard say, I shall not die afore Noon, and I am sorry therefore; for I thought to be dead by this time, and past my pain. I told her it should be no pain, it was so fottell (for so is his word.) And then she said, she heard say the Executioner was very good, and I have a little Neck, and put her hand about it, laughing heartily: I have seen many Men and Women executed, and they have been in great Sorrow; and to my knowledge, this Lady hath much joy and pleasure in death.

The 19th of May being thus come, the Queen, according to the expresse order given, was brought to a Scaffold erected upon the Green in the Tower of London, where our Historians say, she spake before a great Company there assembled, to this effect:

Good Christian People, I am come hither to die;

for according to the Law, and by the Law I am judg'd to die, and therefore I will speak nothing against it. I am come hither to accuse no Man, nor to speak any thing of that whereof I am accus'd, and condemn'd to die. But I pray God save the King, and send him long to reign over you; for a gentler nor a more merciful Prince was there never; and to me he was ever a good, a gentle, and a Sovereign Lord. And if any Person will meddle of my cause, I require them to judge the best. And thus I take my leave of the World, and of you all; and I heartily desire you all to pray for me.

After which coming to her Devotions, her Head was stricken off with a Sword.

And thus ended the Queen, lamented by many, both as she was desirous to advance Learned Men, in which number Hugh Latimer Bishop of Worcester, and Nicholas Saxton Bishop of Salisbury are recounted; and as she was a great Almsgiver; insomuch, as she is said in three quarters of a year to have bestow'd fourteen or fifteen thousand pounds in this kind, besides Moneys intended by her towards raising a Stock for poor Artificers in the Realm. Sanders saith her Father died shortly after for Grief; but our Heralds affirm, it was not till about two years after, 1538. But that we may leave them both to their Grave and Silence, I find by our Records, that the Princess Mary did about those times much endeavour to be restor'd to the King her Fathers good favour and opinion, as hoping now that the Princess Elizabeth was declar'd Illegitimate, she should be receiv'd as Heir to the Crown: Therefore by frequent and earnest Letters written with her own hand, she both acknowledgeth her fault of obstinacy heretofore, and craveth instantly from the King to write to her, or send some token as a sign of Reconciliation. Upon which Submission, our King, by the Duke of Norfolk sent certain Articles for her to subscribe; which were,

First, whether she doth Recognize the Kings Highness for her Sovereign Lord, and King, and will submit her self unto his Highness and all Laws of the Realm.

Secondly, whether she will with all her Power obey and maintain all the Statutes of the Realm.

Thirdly, whether she will Recognize the Kings Highness to be Supream Head in Earth of the Church of England, and utterly refuse the Bishop of Rome's pretended Power, or any Interest she hath or may have thereby.

Fourthly, whether she doth freely Recognize and knowledge both by Gods Law and Mans Law the Marriage heretofore had between his Majesty and her Mother, to be unlawful.

Fifthly, for what causes, and by whose motion and means she hath remain'd in her obstinacy so long.

Sixthly, what is the cause she at this time above all others submitteth, and who mov'd her hereunto.

In satisfaction to which she return'd a Subscription, signing with her own name the four first Articles, but concerning the other two, she demurr'd; some Persons being interested therein, whom she would not discover.

What effect follow'd hereupon appears not otherwise, than that notwithstanding this and other Submissions, the King proceeded to his intended Marriage; which also he so hastned, as some say the day following Queen Ann's Death, others not till three days after, he caus'd it to be Solemniz'd; as not thinking it fit to mourn long, or much, for one the Law had declar'd Criminal; concerning the Ceremony whereof, as well as the Opinion held in these times of the different perfections of the King, and his two Queens, I shall out of our Records produce the 1536. censure of Sir John Russel (afterwards Earl of Bedford) who having been at Church, observ'd the King to be the goodliest Person there; but of the Queens gave this note, that the richer Queen Jane was in Cloaths, the fairer she appear'd, but that the other, the richer she was Apparell'd, the worse she look'd; but this Queen certainly deserv'd all the favour done her, as being reputed the Discreetest, Fairest, and Humblest of the Kings Wives; though both Queen Katharine in her younger days, and the late Queen, were not easily parallel'd. But we will leave them a while, and come unto foreign businesses now a long time intermitted.

Businesses betwixt our King and the Roman See were not so desperate, but that divers Overtures on either side were made for an Accommodation; for while the Pope fear'd, lest our King together with renouncing the Roman Churches Authority, would relinquish the Religion, he not only cover'd his inward and deep Displeasure, but secretly permitted Treaties in divers kinds with our King, and particularly invited him to a War against the Turk; who also gladly entertain'd the Motion, as hoping the Pope would not so soon joyn Christian Princes against him. Infomuch that Sir Gregory Casalis now residing Agent at Rome, the Pope about May 20 sent for him, and told him that he heard of the Queens Imprisonment; and was glad that God having freed the King from this unequal Matrimony, had offer'd his Majesty occasion of gaining eternal Honour, by making Peace between the Emperor and French King; which might be now done by joyning with the Roman See. As for himself, that he never did him but good Offices, as having urg'd Clement VII. to right him in his Diverce, and at Bononia, (being then Cardinal) perswaded the Emperor to suffer it with Patience. As for Rochester, that he made him Cardinal only to use him in the ensuing Council; and when his death was related, being solicited and compell'd to revenge it, he could not but yield for the time to do those things quæ tamen nunquam in animo habuit ad exitum perducere. Wherefore that he purpos'd to send a Nuntio into England to treat of a Peace in Christendom, when our King would bearken thereunto; whence shall follow a General Council, and a War against the Turk: And all this he wish'd Sir Gregory to write (as of himself) to our King; as appears by the Original, May 27. Shortly after which, I find that Cardinal Campejus sending hither his Brother Marco Antonio about other business, as regaining his Bishoprick of Salisbury, and the place of English Protector in the next Council, attempted to induce our King to a Reconciliation: But as the terms propos'd pleas'd not; so the Pope conceiving now all further Treaty to be vain, labour'd to unite all Christian Princes in a War against him, as a deserter of all Papal Authority, and an Heretick. Therefore he both gain'd Charles (who had long solicited a Council) by summoning one to begin at Mantua the year following, May 23. and to oblige James V. he sent him a rich consecrated Sword. He found not yet in France that disposition he hop'd for, the overtures of War being thought unseasonable, in a time when a general Reformation was expected on the Roman Churches part. Therefore I find by an Original dispatch of Mount's, how the Bishop of Chalons in Campagne told him, (upon notice taken in France of the Breve of the Pope, whereby (as aforesaid) he excommunicated our King, and deprived him of his Kingdom, and absolv'd his Subjects of their Oaths of Allegiance, unless he return'd to that See, and abrogated those Laws were made against the Papal Authority,) that the Cardinal of Lorain would warn the Pope, and advise him not to be so bold with Princes, unless he would become a Laughing-stock to the World, (for these are Mount's words;) yet did not Francis fully comply with our King, but held a middle way: For as he approv'd not the Popes harsh proceeding, so when our King by his Ambassador gave him account of his Actions, expecting his Approbation, he return'd this Answer: That notwithstanding all the Kings Realm should agree and condescend never so much to the Right and Title of Succession in the Issue of his second Marriage, yet when foreign parts shall conceive any other, and contrary Opinion thereof, great troubles might ensue. Whereupon Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester then resident in France, was commanded by our King to tell Francis, that he marvel'd much the King his Brother, being a wise Prince, should so long insist upon these Points, since it was ever the manner of Lawful Kings to pursue their Right without demanding the approbation of others. For proof whereof, he said he could give particular instances in Francis his Predecessors, who had done many things contrary to the advice of the Popes (when they were beneficial to the Kingdom,) and that notwithstanding all opposition they had been happily achiev'd. Our King was not ignorant, yet, how much it concern'd him to keep Francis in good Correspondency, as knowing the desire he had to recover Milan (for his second Son the Duke of Orleans) was so vehement, as it would incline him wholly to the Emperor, when it might be obtain'd. And in effect I find by Bellay, that the Treaty hereof begun the last year, as aforesaid, was still prosecuted; infomuch that Charles gave hope of restoring Milan now upon Sforza's Death (who being thought the last of the Line of Aeneas and Mutius Scævola, dyed about the end of October precedent) to the Duke of Angoulesme the third Son of Francis, when he would send the Duke of Orleans his second Son to assist him in an intended Expedition against Algier, and help to reduce the Protestant Princes in Germany, and the King of England to an union with the Church; but Francis reply'd, that to give Milan from his second Son to his third, was to cause a perpetual War betwixt two Brothers. Therefore that he desir'd it for the Duke of Orleans, in which case also the said Duke should renounce all claim to Naples, Florence, Urbino, &c. That to send him to the Emperor, upon what pretence soever, was in effect to do nothing but put an Hostage into his hand: As for the Reformation and Re-union of those who had any way separated themselves from the Church, he should be glad to second him as well in Germany as in England. And that for Henry the Eighth in particular, he thought fit the Emperor should summon all Christian Princes and Potentates to assist him, and as Bellay hath it Donner main fort to constrain the said King to obey the Sentence and Determination of the Church.

During these Treaties, the French Army under the Comte de St. Paul, advanc'd so far in Savoy, as they had taken all but Montmelian, which yet at last yielded: While those of Geneva, thinking the occasion fair, shook off their Obedience to the Duke, and by the help of the Protestant Swiss, asserted themselves into the liberty they now enjoy: Expelling together their Bishop, and changing the form of both their Civil and Ecclesiastical Policy. Of all which the Emperor being advertis'd, thought how to gain time, especially till he had reinforc'd his Army, not yet fully made up since his late Voyage to Tunis, and assur'd himself of the Pope: Therefore he promis'd the Dutchy of Milan to the Duke of Orleans, so that the Dutcheff, being the Relict of Sforza, might be provided for, intending thereby 1536. thereby (as my Author hath it) that she might be given the Scottish King: Yet in the manner of performing thereof, so much caution and delay was propos'd, as their former jealousies did but increase. And indeed, neither was the overture of Francis his requiring the Emperor to press the Pope against our King, more than device to make our King more firm unto him: Nor the Proposition of the Emperor for restoring Milan, other than an invention to gain time, he being resolv'd to succour Savoy at what price soever: And the rather, that (as is before said) there was a project of giving all that Country to the Emperor for some other Lands in Italy; whereby also the Emperor should have wholly invironed France: So that all was but dissimulation on either part. For while these things were treating, the Emperor (though injoyning silence to the French, and promising it himself) yet both acquainted the Pope with divers Passages, and together made him jealous of the intentions of Francis to invade Italy, and drew the Venetians to his side, and made sundry Propositions of Alliance and Friendship with our King, (some whereof we have before shew'd) and rais'd great Forces by Sea and Land, upon pretence of employing them against Infidels: While Francis on the other part, being well inform'd hereof, resolv'd so to proceed in his War, as he neglected nothing which might strengthen himself, or weaken his Enemies. Therefore, having with a choice Army of fifteen or sixteen thousand under the command of Chabot Admiral of France, taken the chief places in Savoy, he commanded it to advance over the Alps towards Turin in Piedmont, which was rendred to him, as also divers other places there. And thus it is probable they might have enter'd and taken Milan; for as the Duke was newly dead, and the Government unsettled; so there wanted all things which might serve to defend the Country. Nevertheless, out of I know not what scrupulosity or presumption, Francis commanded Chabot to stay until he had sent to demand again the Investiture thereof from the Emperor in the name of his Son the Duke of Orleans. I am not ignorant yet, that some French Writers say, that Francis checkt this command by private Instructions: But Chabot thought it safer to follow those directions he had under the Hand and Seal of Francis, than to comply with an intimated and contradictory Advice. Howbeit, the overtures of Peace continued still (at Naples, where the Emperor then was) betwixt both Princes, the French Ambassador Monsieur de Velly alledging, that the business of Savoy was but a particular difference betwixt their King and that Duke, and that it should not hinder the General Treaty. To which the Emperor seem'd to give ear also; not omitting yet to raise Forces daily, nor to march towards Rome, where the Pope attended him: Having for the more enlarging his entry to that City, thrown down the Relicks of the Temple of Peace built by the Romans: And indeed, the Popes desire was he should never put up his Sword, till he had reduc'd our King, and the Protestants to their former Devotion, and afterwards invaded the Turk. Of which our King being well inform'd, (for no Prince had better intelligence) commanded Richard Pace his Ambassador, to treat with the Emperor, though not with intention to joyn with him, so much as to discover his designs. For I find by Bellay, that our King had acquainted Francis (by means of his Ambassador then resident here) with a Letter of the Emperors, about this time sent him, wherein the said Emperor advertis'd, that he meant to go to Rome, and what he would say and do there; requesting our King further to interpose Offices with Francis for restoring all he had taken in Savoy, and to divert him from attempting Milan. For the rest, desiring our King to forget not only what discontentment soever had past betwixt them by reason of the Divorce with Queen Katharine (since she being dead, all cause of offence was ceas'd) but to renew their ancient Treaties of Confederation and Amity, and together to assist him against the Turk. So that by this free communication of the Emperors Letters, as well as by an Advertisement which I find Francis gave our King of certain following passages at Rome, one may perceive what strait Correspondence was then held betwixt them. Howsoever, Pace in his Negotiation found that the Emperor took nothing so ill as the Illegitimation of the Princess Mary: For though our King had given Succours in Denmark against his Niece, and encouraged the Princes in Germany to take Arms against him; yet these affronts the Emperor said might be pass'd over, but not the Princess Mary's Illegitimation; whom therefore he desir'd our King to restore, giving hope (as Pace writes from Rome) on that condition to procure a General Council which might give the King contentment in his desires; or if he would refer all things to the Popes Authority, to make his Peace with him, to validate his last Marriage, and together establish his Succession, Honour and Conscience in all he could wish. These were indeed thought great offers: But our King, considering that they were little more than Solicitations and Discourses of Granvele, and that to legitimate the Princess Mary, was in effect no less than to declare her his Heir, what disguise soever the Emperor would put on it, and desiring, for the rest, nothing so much, as to settle the Succession in his future Issue, (which he hop'd would be Masculine) gave no good Audience hereunto.

The Emperor having now at Rome saluted the Pope and Cardinals, and communicated his Reasons in private, Monsieur de Velly was referr'd again to them for an answer concerning his Demand of Milan. But the Pope gave him no hope thereof; adding, that the Emperor had no such intention; and when he should assent, the Venetians would not, who had enter'd into a League defensive for that Dutchy. Whereupon Velly goes to the Emperor, requiring performance from him: But the Emperor demanded whether he had Commission to treat thereof: But Velly saying he had none, the Emperor would hear him no more. Nevertheless, to shew a desire to come to a solid Peace with Francis, and avoid effusion of their Subjects Blood: The Emperor in the presence of the Pope, the Cardinals, and the Ambassadors of France, of Venice, and many great Prelates and Noble-men assembled, made a long Oration in Spanish, his Hat in his Hand; declaring first the cause of quarrel and unkindness betwixt Maximilian and Lewis VII. deducing them after to his times, with much particularity; and shewing still the fault was on the French side: After which, in the presence of this great Assembly, he made three offers to Francis, first, That if a sure Peace might be concluded, he would give the Dutchy of Milan to one of the Kings Children (but not the Duke of Orleans, since he knew Francis did not demand it so much to fix there, as to serve himself thereof as a step to pass further to the State of Florence, and Urbino, in the right of the said Dukes Wife: Neither would he accept any disclaim thereof, since he knew it would prevail no more, than that Francis had already made of the Dutchy of Burgundy.) Therefore that he would grant it to the Duke of Angoulesme his third Son, when Francis

1536. would declare in what manner he would assist him towards the celebration of a Council, a Reformation of Christendom, and War against Hereticks and Infidels: Which because it would not be done except all offences were remov'd, he requir'd first that his Army should be withdrawn out of Piedmont. Secondly, if within twenty days Francis did not approve this, he offer'd to end the business in a Duel betwixt their two Persons; not out of bravery yet, but for avoiding the effusion of Blood betwixt their Subjects, too much whereof had been shed already. And that he thought there would be no more difficulty in assigning a fit place for this Combat, than for an Interview, and that it might be in some Isle, or on some Bridge or Boat on a River: And for Arms, he thought them all good, whether they were Swords or Poignards, in their Shirts; only in this case, that whosoever overcame, should give his Forces to the Pope, for the more strengthening him to summon a Council, and reduce all disobedient Persons to the Church, and resist the Turk: For which purposes he did there ingage himself to the Pope and Apostolick See; requiring besides, that the Duchy of Milan and Burgundy should be deposited in some good hand, and the Victor have both. The third offer was War; to which yet he protested not to come without necessity; though he had sufficient cause. Francis having taken Arms against him while he talk'd of a Peace by the entremise of one who had no power to treat thereof: Only if he were constrain'd to this course, nothing should make him leave it, till one of them both remain'd the poorest Gentleman in their Country. Thus bowing his Head to look upon a scroul lapt about his Finger, he made a pause: After which the Pope began to speak; but the Emperor interrupting him, said he had not yet concluded, but would, when he had refer'd all to his Holiness, whom he desir'd to bestow his favour on him who had most reason and equity on his side. This being done, the Pope commended the Emperor's Propositions, as tending to a Peace, and hop'd the French King would be no less inclin'd thereunto. After which, the Bishop of Maseon step'd forth, and said, the protestation being in Spanish, he understood it not well: But for the point concerning Peace, he knew the King his Master would be inclinable to it; reserving the further Declaration thereof to Monsieur de Velly, who drawing near, and desiring to be heard, the Emperor stopt him, and said he had already spoken to him too often of Peace, and that he desir'd Deeds and not Words; and that he would grant him no other Audience at that time, only what he had there publicly said, should be given in Writing, and therewith arose. So that though Velly desir'd to answer for his Master, yet the Emperor still laid the fault on him; and thus went with the Pope to Mass. But that Evening the Pope, who knew of what consequence a War betwixt these Princes was, sent for the French Ambassadors, desiring them to do good offices in their dispatches to Francis, protesting that he was surpriz'd on his part: And that whatsoever he said, he would keep neutrality betwixt them. The Emperor being now ready to take his leave of the Pope, the French Ambassador desir'd Audience, and thereupon told the Emperor in the Popes presence, That whereas he had spoken of a Combat with his King in case no Peace were made, without declaring other cause than to spare effusion of their Subjects Blood; he desir'd to know whether his Majesty had made a Challenge to fight: And that if it were so, he durst answer on the part of his King, that it should not be refus'd. And that the Emperor might well remember that heretofore there was question hereof, but not now that he knew; the King his Master desiring to have Milan by Treaty, and having given express command to his General in Piedmont, not to invade any thing in the Emperors possession. As for the Treaty betwixt them, that it was set down in Writing, and the Pope might judge of both; and therefore that he would say no more of it, but know only whether the Emperor would charge the King his Master, as having fail'd in his Word or Honour, and whether he had defied him. There were not many present when this pass'd; which the Emperor observing, call'd all those in the Sala and Chamber of Audience, and said, as he spake publicly before, so he would again. Many hereupon repairing to him, he said in Italian, That he indeed did most desire Peace; but if that could not be, he did then think best that they two in Person should end the business; which yet he spake by way of Advice, and not as a Challenge; especially since it was in the Popes presence, without whose permission he would do nothing. And therefore that he propos'd it only to avoid a greater Inconvenience, as thinking it better to do so, than suffer a War in Christendom: Which was the reason also why he appointed him twenty days time to retire his Army out of Piedmont. But these sharp words (at the Pope's request) were not openly advertis'd to Francis, nor some others, whereby he vilified the Commanders and Soldierry of that Nation in comparison of his, (as Bellay hath it;) who relates the business somewhat more in favour of his Nation, and Monsieur de Velly, than Sandoval doth, or indeed our Records; amongst which I find divers of these passages certified by Richard Pace. But though the French Ambassadors (at the Pope's intreaty) were sparing in their relation of the Emperors words, which (if we may believe Sandoval) were very high, yet order was given to his Ambassadors in France (as Sandoval hath it) to acquaint Francis with them; adding only four days more to the term of twenty formerly prefix'd: Though Bellay doth not acknowledge this particular.

While these things pass'd thus at Rome, the Cardinal of Lorain was employ'd by Francis to the Emperor: Who in his way coming to the French Army, charg'd Chabot not to march further, or innovate any thing, (which troubled him, as being inform'd that the Emperor both rais'd great Forces, and drew near him.) After which he went to Antonio de Leyva, and the Spanish Army, requiring the same of them, at least till he had spoken with the Emperor; whom yet when he found ambiguous in his answers, and uncertain, he acquainted the Pope therewith, and afterwards the French King; who having in the meanwhile understood by the Emperors Ambassadors resident with him; the effect of his Masters Oration at Rome (though yet he would give no copy of it) sent to the Pope a Justification, (set down at large in Bellay) in the conclusion whereof he return'd this Answer to the Emperors offer of a Combat, That if ever they came near each other (as might well be if they led their Armies in Person) and the Emperor then sent a Challenge, he would fight with him. But the Pope, who had more use of their Swords than to imploy them one against the other, endeavour'd still to procure all good Amity and Correspondence betwixt them: Therefore he sent (upon the request of the Cardinal of Lorain) the Cardinal de Carpi, and the Cardinal Trivulcio to mediate an end; for which purpose they were to go joyntly to the Emperor first, and then one of them to the French King, according to the occasion.

But nothing now could hinder the Emperor from going into France, where in sequence of a Protestation (as Sandoval hath it) to attend the French King thirty days to see whether he would come in Person to fight, he resolv'd to march. Having gotten together therefore an Army of about sixty thousand Men, and an hundred pieces of Artillery, he came to Asti the 22 of June 1536. Jun: 22. while while his Sister Mary (Governess of the Low-Countries) by his order had rais'd an Army of twenty thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse under the command of Henry Count of Nassau, to invade France on that part: It was yet advis'd whether in his way he should take the places in Savoy and Piedmont, which the French held, or go strait to France. Antonio de Leyva said, that wild Beasts were to be fought in their Dens; and therefore wish'd the Emperor not to spend his Men in Sieges, but march on; which Counsel being follow'd (and the rather, because the Emperor desir'd personally to be in France to acquit himself of his promise,) the Army having first taken some Towns, came near Marseilles: Where Andrea Doria with his Gallies was appointed to meet him. But Antonia de Leyva (a valiant, but covetous and cruel Commander) dying there, and about thirty thousand more of Sickness and Disorder, the Emperor, who had now stay'd 33 days (as Sandoval hath it) in the French King's Dominions, return'd to Genoia, and (not long after) to Spain, leaving order yet for War in Savoy and Piedmont. But whatsoever retarded Francis, it was not want of Courage: Though I find by Bellay, he was resolv'd by his Council rather to weary and famish the Emperors Army, than to fight with him; though yet having rais'd a considerable Army in those parts under the command of Montmorency, Grand-Maître of France, he was not unprovided to resist him; besides which, he had another under his own command at Valence, not far off; which he yet left at last to come to his other Army. But the Emperor, as having (even by the confession of Bellay) lost half his Army, was now remov'd, leaving behind him so many dead Soldiers unburied, that they infected the Air. Hereupon Francis took Advice, whether it were better to follow the Emperor into Italy, or to return and raise the Siege from Peronne, being then in some danger; the latter pleas'd him, his affairs in Italy at that time succeeding well, and Winter besides drawing on: Only before he return'd, he thought good to visit Marseilles, commanding the Seigneur de Langey to repair the ruins of Aix, where the Emperor had lodg'd. This being done, and he now going homewards, the glad news was brought him, that the Siege of Peronne was rais'd; which (as Sandoval hath it) hap'n'd the same day the Emperor dislodg'd from Aix to return into Italy. And thus did those vast Preparatives of the Emperor come to nothing; (great Armies as well as little ones having their Inconveniences, especially where Sickness and Disorder doth intervene.)

Francis being yet upon his way home (as Bellay hath it) received Letters from his Ambassador in England, how our King was inform'd by his Agents in the French Court, that the Emperor's Retreat was out of Stratagem, that the French might follow him, and so be taken at an advantage: And that this Rumour of his Men's Death, was rais'd only to draw them on the sooner; but that in effect he had not lost 2000 Men since his coming out of Italy. Upon which false Advertisements also, our King forbore to comply with Francis as he was wont; where he on the other side estrang'd himself a little from King Henry, insomuch, as he began to cherish and love the King of Scotland more than before; who also had promised him assistance in his Wars (which our King had neglected, contrary to Francis's Expectation) and was now in France; for which reasons he gave him his Daughter Magdalene (as is before related): Nevertheless, that he might proceed formally, he sent Gilles de Pommeray hither, to tell our King: First, the true Cause of the Emperor's Retreat: Secondly, the Cause of his accepting the Scottish

King for his Son-in-law: Thirdly, to propose a Marriage betwixt the Duke of Orleans (his Son) and the Princess Mary. But when the Marriage with King James, and the Excuse for it was produced, our King was in that Passion, that he would not hear him again for four days space; though yet he forgot not by his Council to shew how ill he took it. So that Pommeray, without almost daring to speak of the Marriage with the Princess Mary, return'd; and the rather, because our King knew well that the Emperor had a good while since propos'd it to Francis, only to sow Diffention betwixt both Princes. Our King finding this Coldness on the French King's part, began to think how he might fortify himself by the Emperor's Friendship; for which purpose also (as is aforesaid) several Overtures had been made; but the Declaration of the Princess Mary to be illegitimate hindred all (which though much labour'd by the Emperor, King Henry yet could not be persuaded to revoke) tho' he profess'd himself much inclin'd to return to his ancient Friendship with Charles; so that till after the Death of Queen Jane, being the Year following, all things remained in suspense. In which terms also, he thought fit they should be continued till he saw the Event of the War, renewed now betwixt the Emperor and French King with more Ardor than ever, (as shall be told hereafter;) of which occasion therefore our King thought fit to prevail himself, for giving order to his Businesses at home: Which that he might do by the Advice and Consent of his Parliament, he commanded it to sit the eighth of June, 1536.

The principal Act was touching the Succession of the Crown; in which after a rehearsal of the Statute 25 Henry VIII. touching the King's Marriages, and limitation of Succession to the Crown, and another of 26 Henry VIII. it is declared, That whereas a Marriage heretofore was solemniz'd betwixt the King's Highness and the Lady Anne Bolen, that sithence that time, certain just, true and lawful Impediments of Marriage, unknown at the making of the said Acts, were confessed by the said Lady Anne before Thomas Lord Archbishop of Canterbury; by which it plainly appeareth, that the said Marriage betwixt his Highness and the said Lady Anne was never good nor consonant to the Laws; and therefore his Highness was lawfully divorc'd from the said Lady Anne: Moreover, that she and her Complices before-mention'd, were convict by due course of Law, and have suffer'd according to their Merits.

And whereas it has pleas'd his Highness, notwithstanding the great Perils suffer'd by occasion of his first unlawful Marriage betwixt the Lady Katharine, and this unlawful Marriage betwixt the Lady Anne, at the most humble Petition of his Nobles in this Realm, and for Conservation of the same, to enter into Marriage again with the Lady Jane, according to the Laws of the Church; and that there is hope she may conceive by his Highness; That it is the most humble Petition of his Nobles and Commons, that for extinguishment of all Ambiguities and Doubts, it may be enacted in manner and form as followeth. And first, that the Marriage between the King and Queen Katharine should be void and of no effect; as being grounded on a Dispensation, in a Case not dispensable by Human Authority; and so determin'd by the whole Clergy, and both Universities of this Realm; as also by the Universities of Bononia, Padua, Paris, Orleans, Tholous, Anjou, and divers others, in regard, she being Wife to his elder Brother Prince Arthur, was carnally known by him, as was sufficiently proved before Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury, and therefore, that any Dispensation to the contrary here-

And furthermore, sith many Inconveniences have fallen by marrying within degrees prohibited by God's Law; which Marriages yet have been often dispenced with by some usurped Power; when yet no Man hath Power to dispense with God's Law. Therefore it was enacted, That if any were married within the said degrees, or took to Wife the Sister or Daughter, &c. of her whom he had before carnally known, he might and should be separated by the definitive Sentence of the Archbishops, and other Ministers of the Church of England: And their said Sentence to be good and effectual, without suing any Appeal to or from the Court of Rome.

Further, it was enacted, that the Issue betwixt his Highness and Queen Jane should be his lawful Children and Heirs, and inherit according to the course of Inheritance of the Laws of this Realm, the Imperial Crown of the same, with all Dignities, Honours, Preheminences, Prerogatives, Authorities, and Jurisdictions to the same annexed or belonging.

But if it should happen that Queen Jane should decease without Issue-male of the Body of her Highness to be begotten, then the same Imperial Crown and all other the Premises to be to his Majesty, and to his Heirs Males by any other lawful Wife, and to the Heirs of the Body of the same Son and Heir Male lawfully begotten; and so from Son and Heir Male to Son and Heir Male, and to the Heirs of every such Son and Heir Male lawfully begotten according to the course of Inheritance, as is above-said. And for default of such Issue Male, then the said Imperial Crown and Premises should be to the Issue Female, betwixt his Majesty and Queen Jane begotten, and so again to the Issue Female by any other Wife in like manner; that is to say, to the eldest Issue of the Issue Female, and to the Heirs of her Body lawfully begotten; and so from Issue Female to Issue Female, and to their Heirs of their Bodies, one after another by course of Inheritance, according to their Ages, as the Crown of England hath been accustomed, and ought to succeed and go, in case when there is Heir Female inheritable to the same. And forasmuch as it stands in the only Will and Pleasure of Almighty God, whether his Highness shall have Heirs, and that if they fail, and no Provision be made in his life, who should govern this Realm, that then this Realm after his transitory life should be destitute of a lawful Governour, or incumbred with such a Person that would covet to aspire to the same, that in this case, his Highness might limit the Crown to any Person or Persons in possession and remainder by his Letters Patents under the great Seal; or else by his last Will assigned with his hand, after such manner as should be expressed in his said Letters Patents; and that such Person and Persons should have and enjoy the same after his decease in as large and ample manner as the lawful Heirs of his Body should have done.

After which, order was taken to prevent Usurpation of the Crown, and the Penalty of High Treason impos'd on Usurpers, as on those also who believ'd either the Marriage of his Highness with the Lady Katharine, or the Lady Anne, to be good; and did call the Lady Mary or the Lady Elizabeth legitimate, and who used certain Words and Actions tending to this purpose: As is to be seen more largely in the said Statute.

Furthermore, it was enacted, That if his Majesty should decease before any Heir Male of his Body inheritable to the Crown of this Realm should be of the Age of eighteen Years, or any Heir Female which should be inheritable as aforesaid, should be married, or be of the Age of sixteen Years, that then they, or any of them, shall be and remain until they came unto the said several Ages, at and in the Governance of their natural Mother, and such other his Counsellors and Nobles of his Realm, as his Highness should name and appoint by his last Will in writing, signed with his Hand, or otherwise to be at and in the Governance of such his Counsellors and Nobles of his Realm, as his Highness should name and appoint by his last Will in Writing, and sign'd with his Hand, (as is aforesaid) and that an Oath should be administred for performance of this Act, and the Penalty of High Treason inflicted on those that shall refuse it.

Furthermore, it was enacted, That the King should have Power by his Letters Patents or last Will, as aforesaid, to advance any Person or Persons of his most Royal Blood to any Title, Stile, or Name of any Estate, Dignity or Honour, and to give to them or any of them any Castles, Honours, Lands, &c. in Fee-simple, Fee-tail, or for term of Lives, or the Life of any of them, saving the Rights and Estates of all others, in and to the same.

Finally, it was enacted, That every Clause, Article and Sentence therein, should be taken and accepted according to the plain Words thereof. How yet this Act was alter'd, 35 Hen. VIII. shall be declared by me, God willing, in this History; referring the Reader to: Mary I. when it was repeal'd.

Howsoever, I thought fit to set it down with much particularity, both as it is Relative to many precedent Points touch'd in this History, and as it leads the way to some that follow; by which also it may appear unto the Reader, with how high a hand the King did authorize his Actions, while each part justified the other, and all his Subjects Voices being comprehended in his Parliament, no Man could accuse him, who did not in some sort first condemn himself; so that if in those two Divorces he had not reason, the chief of his Kingdom seem'd to err with him: Unless ill Arts with the Nobility, and undue Election of the Knights and Burgesses be suppos'd; which though possible in many, and (for that I have seen) there be cause to suspect it in some; yet to believe a general Corruption in the prime Persons of a Kingdom, or to allow an Argument drawn from thence only, as conclusive, what is it else but to overthrow and subvert the Columns and Foundations of Laws? And then what Statute can stand? What Decree will be in force? I will not yet take on me every where to defend the Actions of a Prince, whom so many have bitterly censur'd, as it may be doubtful whether he were more extoll'd at home in his first times, or depress'd afterwards abroad. But thus much I cannot but observe of him, that if where he did ill, he made or found many Complices; where he did well, he had almost the Glory alone; as being so active and knowing in all he undertook, that he was capable of both: Only towards his latter time, as he was thought to decline in his singular Perfections of Nature, so all things almost fell to the worse; while divers of those ill Accidents which befel him, were reveng'd some-1536. sometimes with so severe a Justice, as might be called Summum Jus; sometimes repaired with furnishing his Wants in that large manner and extent, both on the Spirituality and Temporality, as little else remained, either to be demanded or gotten. In procuring whereof, though he lost much of his former Love and Esteem, yet he kept himself still upon the high steps of Authority, without stooping either to Fear or Necessity; so that his most irregular Actions represented such a Type of Greatness, as crooked Lines drawn every way, which tho' not so compendious and direct as the strait, seem yet to have in them somewhat more of the infinite; but as these things are set down by way of Description, and not of Apology, so I will leave them to come to my History, which for being free and impartial, will speak him better to the judicious Reader than my Annotations can.

She is also committed.

Aug. 12.

Several Acts passed.

This Year Thomas Howard, youngest Son to Thomas late Duke of Norfolk, and Brother to the present Duke (but by another Mother) had so obtain'd the Favour of the Lady Margaret Douglas, Daughter to the Queen of Scots (then living in the King's Court) that some affiancing or privy Contract pass betwixt them: whereof the King being inform'd, was much incens'd; as conceiving that one so join'd in blood to him and his Nephew the Scottish King, should not be given nor taken without his consent, especially when she lived so near him; wherefore he was committed to the Tower, and she not long after. The business thus being in July brought to the Parliament, and certain Sulpicions and Accusations alledged of aspiring to the Crown, (some Circumstances being drawn thereunto) he was there attainted of High-Treason; and in sequence thereof a Statute made, that none should Marry in the next degrees of the Blood Royal, without the King's Licence first had, &c. which yet being repeal'd 1 Edw. VI. 12. and 1 Mary I. I mention no otherwise. The News hereof being brought with speed to Margaret Queen of Scots, afflicted her much; so that it retarded her Journey into England, whither she was coming; being desirous also to be reconciled to her former Husband Archibald Douglas Earl of Angus. Nevertheless she thought fit to write to the King, That whereas she heard he was displeas'd with her Daughter for promising Marriage to the Lord Thomas Howard, intending to punish her for the same, she desir'd his Majesty to pardon her; and if he so pleas'd, to send her into Scotland, that she come no more in his presence; and not to be extream to his own Blood. Notwithstanding which, both she and the Lord Thomas Howard were committed to the Tower, without suffering other Punishment, where also she remain'd till the death of the said Thomas Howard; but then releas'd to be a Mother of that great Offspring which after follow'd.

Besides these two Statutes formerly mention'd, I find some others concerning State-Government enacted this Sessions which therefore I shall insert here.

Whereas in the 19 Hen. VII. 7. a Law was made, That no Masters, Wardens, and Fellowship of Crafts, or Rulers of Guilds and Fraternities, should take upon them to make any Acts or Ordinances, ne to execute any heretofore made by them, or hereafter to be made, in disheritance or diminution of the King's Prerogative, nor of other, nor against the common profit of the People, except the same Act were examined or approved by the Chancellor of England, or Chief Justice of either Bench, or three of them, or before the Justices of Assize in their Circuit or Progress, in the Shire where such Acts or Ordinances are made, upon pain of forfeiture, &c. Sith which time, divers Acts and Ordinances contrary to the meaning of the said Act have been made; it was now order'd that Apprentices should pay but little Fees at their Entry, and that no other should be given to restrain them from keeping Shops when they were Freemen. And as this was much to the benefit of those who would learn and set up Trades and Occupations, so it was thought by some it would be much more, when the Mysteries of the said Trades (as far as could be expressed by Words) might be commanded to be published in Print; to the end that all Men (who would) might learn them, and an honest Emulation (who should do best) might quicken Industry, and bring down the Prices of things: Or if this were not permitted, that at least due Order were taken, that the Masters in all Trades might be restrain'd from packing together to enhance Wares and Commodities, but by the approbation of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, &c. as being to that common profit of the Subject, (mention'd in the Statute) which is more to be esteem'd than any Man's particular Gain.

In sequence whereof, also another Act was made concerning the Prices of Wine, to this effect; that no French Wine should be sold by retail above Two-pence a Quart, and no Malmesies, Rammies, (being Wines of Romania as I take it) Sack or Sweet-Wines, should be above Three-pence the quart. Provided always that the Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, Lord President of the King's Council, Lord Privy-Seal, and the two Chief Justices of either Bench, or five, four or three of them should have Power and Authority by their directions to set the Prices of Wines; the said Prices to be published in Chancery, in the Term-time, or in such Cities, Towns and Places where Wines are sold in gross; the Contents or Quantity of Liquor also, to be held in every Vessel, was expressed in the said Statute; and Remedy given for loss sustain'd in those which wanted measure: § And though this prevented much Couzenage, yet Order being not taken to punish those who falsified and corrupted Wines, much Abuse in this kind followed.

Order was also taken how Pirates at Sea should be punish'd.

All Bulls, Breves and Dispensations also from the Bishop, or See of Rome, were declared void; nevertheless, that all Marriages solemniz'd before the third of November, 26 of the King's Reign, and not contrary to God's Laws, should be good and effectual. And also that Archbishops, Bishops, and all Ecclesiastical Persons and Orders of this Realm, might keep and retain their Archbishopricks, Bishopricks, &c. and exercise all things pertaining to their Dignities, Offices, Orders, Cures, &c. And that the Effect and Contents of all Bulls, Breves, Faculties, &c. purchas'd of the See of Rome, which be allowable, and may be lawfully granted by the Archbishop of Canterbury, by the Authority of the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, should be confirmed under the Great Seal at the humble suit of the Petitioners for the same.

Also, for the more confirmation of the King's Supremacy (enacted two Years since) it was now ordained, that every Ecclesiastical and Lay-Officer, shall be sworn to renounce the said Bishop and his Authority, and to resist it to his Power; reputing any Oath (heretofore taken for the maintenance of the same) to be void. And the refusal of this Oath shall be adjudged High-Treason.

Some Ecclesiastical Constitutions also were made, during this short Sessions of Parliament, Bulls, &c. made void.

1536. (beginning the eighth of June, and ending the eighteenth of July next following.) But to leave the less important to be seen in their places, I shall here briefly set down the Resultance of certain Articles, concluded in the Convocation concerning Religion. These Articles (as I gather out of our Records) were devised by the King himself, and recommended afterwards to the Convocation-house by Cromwell, who being lately made Baron, and Lord Privy-Seal, and then Vicegerent General of the King's Authority in Ecclesiastical Affairs, gave much Subject of Discourse. For tho' the King substituted him for due Administration of Justice in all Causes and Cases concerning Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, as well as for Godly Information, and Redress of all Errors, Heresies, and Abuses of the Church, as the Act of Parliament hath it, 31 Henry VIII. 10. yet because there was no Example, either of King of Israel, they said, (tho' lawfully in their own Person, enjoying this mixt Power of Spiritual and Temporal) or of Popes, that derive their whole Ecclesiastical Power immediately on any else, especially a secular Person, they thought it strange: But that I may pass by those things whereof no Publick Reason, that I have seen, is extant, I shall in these Articles observe rather the chief variation they had from the former Doctrines, than repeat the Doctrines themselves, as being sufficiently known.

After establishing (therefore) the Bible, and three received Creeds, with the Explication of the Fathers and the four first Councils, as the grounds of Religion: He made, according to his definition of Sacraments, three only. First, Baptism for washing away of Sins. Secondly, Penance for satisfaction of Faults afterwards committed both towards God and our Neighbour. Thirdly, the Eucharist: Changing in any of them little yet of the ordinary, (as I conceive) unless Auricular Confession seem not there altogether so strictly commanded as before; nor otherwise much than in case of mortal Sin. And that Prayer, Fasting, Alms-deeds, as being Fruitus digni Penitentia, are not to be held as means of our Salvation by way of Merit, but of Mercy only. For Justification, that it was attained by Contrition or true Repentance and Faith, which was to be accompanied with Hope, Charity, and other Inward and Spiritual Motions and Graces, and outward good Works.

Concerning Images, That they had been used in the Old Testament, and sometimes (for the abuse of them) taken away; and allow'd in the New, (as good Authors declare) Therefore that the true use of them should be taught by Bishops and Preachers every where, they being permitted to stand in Churches no otherwise than as Representatives of Virtue, and Stirrers of Devotion; and not that rude People should take Superstition thence, as in times past, or that Idolatry should ensue; and that the Censing of them, kneeling before them, and all other Honours should be done as in the Honour of God only, although they be done before the Images of Christ, the Cross, or of our Lady, or any Saint besides.

Concerning honouring of Saints; That we should not trust to obtain at their hands that which is to be had only of God: Yet that they were to be honour'd because they reign'd in Glory, and were Examples of Virtue, as not fearing to die for Christ; and therefore to be taken (in that they may) to be the Advancers of our Prayers and Demands unto Christ, but not to be had in other Reverence and Honour.

Concerning praying to them: That it is very laudable to use these Words, All holy Angels and Saints in Heaven, pray for us, and with us, unto the Father, that for his dear Son Jesu Christ's sake we may have Grace of him, and remission of Sins, with an earnest purpose (not wanting Ghostly Strength) to observe and keep his holy Commandments, and never decline from the same again unto our lives end. And that in this manner we should pray to our blessed Lady, Saint John Baptist, and other Apostles, so that it be done without any vain Superstition, as to think that any Saint is more merciful, or will hear us sooner than Christ, or that any Saint doth serve for one thing more than another, or is Patron of the same. And that we should keep Holidays in memory of him, and his Saints, upon such Days as the Church hath ordain'd, except they be mitigated or moderated by the Assent or Commandment of the Supream Head; in which case the Subjects ought to obey it.

Concerning the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, as using certain Vestments in God's Service, sprinkling of Holy-water, giving of Holy-bread, bearing of Candles on Candlemas-day, giving of Ashes on Ashwednesday, bearing of Palms on Palm-Sunday, creeping to the Cross on Good-Friday, and offering there unto Christ before the same, and kissing of it, setting up of the Sepulchre of Christ, the Hallowing of the Font, and other like Benedictions made by the Ministers of God's Church; as also all other laudable Customs, Rites, and Ceremonies; that they were not to be condemn'd and cast away, but to be us'd and continu'd, to put us in remembrance of those spiritual things that they do signify, not suffering them to be forgotten, but renewing them in our memory from time to time: But that none of those Ceremonies have Power to remit Sins, but only to stir and lift up our Minds unto God, by whom only our Sins be forgiven.

Concerning Purgatory: Forasmuch as according to due order of Charity, and the Book of Maccabees, and divers ancient Writers, it is a very good and charitable deed to pray for Souls departed: And forasmuch as such Uses have continued in the Church even from the beginning, That all Bishops and Preachers should instruct and teach the People not to be grieved with the continuance of the same: But forasmuch as the place where they be, the Name thereof, and the kind of Pains there also, be to us uncertain by Scripture; that therefore this and all other such things were to be remitted to God Almighty, unto whose Mercy it is meet and convenient to commend them, trusting that God accepteth our Prayers for them; referring the rest wholly to God, to whom is known their state and condition. And therefore that it was necessary that such should be clearly put away, which under the Name of Purgatory have been advanced; as to make Men believe, That through the Bishop of Rome's Pardons, Souls might be clearly delivered out of Purgatory and all the Pains of it, or that Masses said at Scala Celi, or elsewhere in any place, or before any Image, might likewise deliver them from all their Pain, and send them strait to Heaven; and other like Abuses. This was subscribed by Thomas Cromwel, Thomas Cantuariensis, Johannes London, and sixteen Bishops more (Rowland Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield being comprized by his Proxy) and William Abbat of Westminster, with 39 Abbats and Priors; and by the Lower-House, consisting of 50 Archdeacons and Proctors of the Clergy; among whom, in the Original, I find two Italians, Polydore Virgil Arch-deacon of Wells, and Peter Vannes Arch-deacon of Worcester, who not long before was made Coadjutor to Richard Pace Dean of Salisbury, being then thought commonly distracted and out of his Wits.

The King's Zeal-Records.

And thus the King having taken on him the Title of Supream Head of the Church in his Dominions, would shew how capable he was of it: Though yet he published not these Articles without much consultation with his Bishops and Divines, who stood divided in opinion; some leaning to the Lutheran, as Canterbury, Ely, Salisbury, Worcester, Hereford, Rocheſter, St. David, and the rest: Others cleaving to the old Doctrine and Rites, as York, London, Durham, Wincheſter, Chicheſter, Norwich and Carlisle; whose Arguments on either ſide, the King himſelf took pains to peruſe and moderate, adding Animadverſions with his own hand, which are to be ſeen in our Records: Yet was not his Doctrine approved by the Romiſh Party, becauſe it took away much of their Authority and Revenue: Nor by the Lutheran and Zuinglian, (then beginning to appear in theſe Parts) becauſe it differed from theirs. But whatſoever any of the Reformed might ſay for their only two Sacraments, it was thought by ſome, that according to the King's Inſtauration, Penance might have been retained ſtill upon ſome terms as a third; both as there is no other general way than Aversion from Sin, and Conversion to God, known to all Mankind for making their Peace with him, and obtaining Pardon. And as the other two Sacraments being particular Rites only of the Chriſtian Church, are in their explication ſubject to ſo much Difficulty and Diſputes, as no leſs than a Man's whole Age is requir'd to ſtudy them; when as this other, being an uncontroverted Sign of the Operation of God's Spirit in our Hearts, produceth ſuch holy effects, as it ought to be acknowledg'd not only as a particular Sacrament of Grace, but an Universal of the reaſonable Nature of Mankind, whereſoever it be found; and therefore worthy its former Name and Authority, where Abuses in Abſolution were taken away: For performing whereof, they ſaid the Priſt ſhould never pronounce it but in caſe of ſuch a ſerious Repentance as might totally efface the Fault, and make the Sinner a new Man; without which therefore he ſhould be told, he was as much liable and obnoxious to Sin and Punishment, as if no ſuch Abſolution had ever been given. Whereas now the common Abſolution of Priſts, extending (for the moſt part) no farther than to require Attrition, or Sorrow for their Offences paſt, and to command, for the reſt, ſome formal Prayers, eaſy Faſts, or ordinary Pilgrimages, not only made Men believe they were quit of their Sins at ſo eaſy a rate, as they feared not much to return to them again, but uſurped on the Power of God, while they brought the Forgiveness of Sins within their own particular Jurisdiction, and together put off Heaven and Everlaſting Happineſs at a cheaper price than either they could juſtly promiſe, or frail Man expect. So that they concluded, that Priſts ſhould be allow'd indeed to abſolve, but ſo as Men might not think their Sins paſt, as much pardon'd as if they had not been committed, unleſs they never do the ſame offence again; leſt greater occaſion and liberty of Sin ſhould thereby be given.

And now, as the Reader hath formerly ſeen the Reformation Francis would have ſtood to, when it might have been imbrac'd in Germany; ſo here he may perceive what our King requir'd in England: Neither of which yet could ever be accepted, as long as contentious Preachers and factious School-men on all ſides would have rather diſturb'd the Peace of the whole World, than relinquish'd or retract'd one Particle of thoſe Opinions they had publickly taught their Auditors and Diſciples. For which Obſtinacy alſo, as the Reformers, being the weaker, ſuffer'd moſt, they being uſually burnt in theſe times; and among them one William Tindal, who had tranſlated into English a great part of the Bible, (a witty, but violent, and ſometimes railing Diſputant) at a Town near Brussels; ſo on the other ſide, theſe Cruelties made the Romiſh Party ſo odious, as their Differences grew almoſt irreconcilable.

Our King having thus begun to rectify the Frame of Religion, endeavour'd new to prevent foreign Oppoſition: And becauſe he knew of what conſequence the General Council now appointed at Mantua was, he obtain'd this Decree to be ſign'd by the Bishops while their Synod Records laſted.

AS concerning General Councils, like as we (taught by long Experience) do perfectly know that there never was, ne is any thing deviſed, invented, or inſtituted by our Fore-fathers more expedient, or more neceſſary for the eſtabliſhment of our Faith, for the extirpation of Heresies, and the abeliſhing of Schiſms; and finally, for the reducing of Chriſt's People unto one perfect Unity and Concord in his Religion, than by the having of General Councils, ſo that the ſame be lawfully had, and congregated in Spiritu Sancto, and be alſo confirm and agreeable, as well concerning the Surety and Indifferency of the Places, as all other Points requiſite and neceſſary for the ſame, unto that wholeſome and godly Inſtitution and Uſage for the which they were at firſt deviſed and uſed in the Primitive Church. Even ſo on the other ſide, taught by like Experience, we eſteem, repute, and judge, That there is, ne can be any thing in the World more peſtilent and pernicious to the Common-weal of Chriſtendom, or where by the Truth of God's Word hath in times paſt, or hereafter may be ſooner defaced and ſubverted, or whereof hath and may enſue more Contention, more Diſcord, and other devilish Effects, than when ſuch General Councils have or ſhall be aſſembled not Chriſtially, nor charitably; but for and upon private Malice and Ambition, or other worldly and carnal Reſpects and Conſiderations, according to the ſaying of Gregory Nazianzenus, in his Epiſtle to one Procopius, wherein he writeth this Sentence following: Sic ſentio, ſi verum ſcribendum eſt, omnes Conventus Episcoporum fugiendos eſſe, quia nullius Synodi finem vidi bonum, neque habentem magis ſolutionem malorum, quam incrementum. Nam Cupiditates Contentionum, & Gloria (ſed ne putes me odioſum eſſe ſcribentem) vincunt rationem. That is to ſay, 'I think this, if I ſhould write truly, that all General Councils be to be eſchewed. For I never ſaw that they produced any good end or effect, nor that any Proviſion or Remedy, but rather increaſe of Miſchiefs proceeded of them. For the deſire of maintenance of Men's Opinions and Ambition of Glory (but reckon not that I write this of Malice) hath always in them overcome Reaſon. Wherefore we think that Chriſtian Princes eſpecially and above all things ought and muſt, with all their Wills, Power, and Diligence foreſee and provide, Ne ſanctiſſima hac in parte Majorum inſtituta ad improbiſſimos Ambitionis aut Malitiæ effectus explendos diverſiſſimo ſuo fine & ſcleratiſſimo pervertantur. Neve ad alium pratextum poſſint valere & longe diverſum effectum Orbi producere, quam ſanctiſſima rei facies præ ſe ferat. That is to ſay, 'Leſt the moſt noble wholeſome Inſtitutions of our Elders in this behalf be perverted to a moſt contrary and moſt wicked end and effect. That is to ſay, to fulfil and ſatiſfie the wicked Affections of Men's Ambition and Malice; or leſt they might prevail for any other colour, or bring forth any other effect, than their moſt virtuous and laudable countenance doth outwardly to the World ſhew or pretend. And firſt of all, we think that they ought principally to conſider who hath the Authority to call together a General Council. Secondly, whether the Cauſes alledg'd be ſo weighty and ſo urgent, that neceſſarily 1536. necessarily they require a general Council, nor can otherwise be remedied. Thirdly, who ought to be Judges in the General Council. Fourthly, what order of proceeding is to be observed in the same, and how the Opinions or Judgments of the Fathers are to be consulted or asked. Fifthly, what Doctrines are to be allowed or defended: with divers other things which in General Councils ought of reason and equity to be observed. And as unto the first point, we think that neither the Bishop of Rome, nor any one Prince of what Estate, Degree, or Preeminence soever he be, may by his own Authority call, indite, or summon any General Council without the express Consent, Assent, and Agreement of the residue of Christian Princes; and especially, such as have within their own Realms and Seignories Imperium merum, that is to say, of such as have the whole intire and supreme Government and Authority over all their Subjects, without acknowledging or recognizing of any other Supreme Power or Authority. And this to be true, we be induced to think by many and sundry, as well Examples, as great Reasons and Authority. The which, forasmuch as it should be over-long, and tedious to express here particularly, we have thought good to omit the same for this present. And in witness that this is our plain and determinate Sentence, Opinion, and Judgment touching the Premises, we the Prelates and Clergy under-written, being Congregate together in the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, and representing the whole Clergy of the same, have to these presents subscribed our Names the twentieth of July, in the year of our Lord, 1536. 28 Hen. 8.

See Injunctions laid on the Clergy.

After which, he set forth an Injunction to restrain the number of Holy-days, now grown to that excess, that there was scarce time to gather in Harvest, or hold the seats of Justice in Term time; which as it was inconvenient, so again the abuse of Holy-days in Drinking, and other Vices and Idleness was so great, as many Riots and Disorders were committed; for which reason, though the number was limited, yet Priests were suffered to do their duties in Churches on these days, and all who would to hear them. And now as the poorer sort were at liberty to work for their living on those days, so they approved well this Reformation. Whereby it came to pass that the Reverence of supposed Saints (whereupon much of the Roman Religion was built) growing to an excess, became one of the first degrees to the Ruine thereof in this Kingdom. In sequence of which, the same year he commanded (under the name of Cromwell his Vice-gerent) these Injunctions following to be observed of the Deans, Parsons, Vicars, Curates, and Stipendiaries resident, or having care of Souls each where.

Ex.

1. And First, that in all Parishes and places of Preaching, once every Sunday for a quarter of a year together, the Doctrine of Supremacy should be taught, and the Laws to that purpose read, and that the Bishop of Rome's Authority having no establishment by the Law of God was justly taken away.

2. That in the Kings Articles, lately set forth, the Real Doctrine of Salvation should be distinguished from the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, and so taught the People as they might know, what was necessary in Religion, and what was instituted for the decent and politick order of the Church, according to such a Commandment given heretofore in that point.

3. That the late order concerning abrogating of certain Superstitious Holy-days, should be read to the People, and they persuaded to keep it.

4. That they should not extol or set forth Images, Reliques, or Miracles, or allure People to Pilgrimages otherwise than as permitted in the late Articles, but rather exhort them to keep Gods Commandments, and provide for their Families, and what they can give, to bestow it rather on the Poor, than upon the said Images, or Reliques.

5. That in their Sermons, they admonish Fathers to teach their Children the Pater noster, Articles of our Faith, and Commandments in their Mother-tongue; which also should be often repeated by the said Youth, and to bring them up in Learning, or some honest Occupation or Trade, whereby to avoid idleness, and get their Living.

6. That Sacraments and Sacramentals be duly and reverently administered by the Parsons, Vicars, and Curates; and if any be absent from their Benefices by Licence, that Learned Curates be left in their place.

7. That every Parson or Proprietary of a Church should provide a Bible in Latine and English, and lay the same in the Quire for every Man to read, exhorting them thereunto, as being the word of God, teaching them withal to avoid Controversie amongst themselves in the places they understood not, but to refer themselves therein to the better Learned.

8. That the said Deans, Parsons, Vicars, and Curates should not haunt Taverns nor Ale-houses, or use Tables, Cards, or any unlawful Games, but rather at their leisure that they should read the Holy Scripture, and be example to others in purity of life.

9. That because the Goods of the Church are the Goods of the Poor, and yet the needy in these days not sustained with the same, therefore all Parsons, Vicars, and Prebendaries, and other Beneficed Men, which may dispend twenty pounds yearly, or above, should distribute amongst the poor Parishioners in the presence of the Church-wardens, the fortieth part of the Revenue of their Benefices, lest they should be noted of Ingratitude, as receiving thirty-nine parts, and yet not vouchsafing to bestow the fortieth.

10. That every Parson, Vicar, Clerk, or Beneficed-man, being able to dispend in Benefices or Promotions of the Church 100 l. yearly, or more, shall for one, or every of the said 100 l. yearly, give a competent exhibition to maintain one Scholar, or more, either in Grammar-Schools, or the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, who when they have profited in Learning, may be partners in their Patrons Cure and Charge, in Preaching and otherwise, or else profit the Common-wealth with their Council and Wisdom.

11. That all Parsons, Vicars and Clerks having Churches, Chappels, or Mansions, shall bestow yearly upon the said Mansions or Chancels of their Churches (being in decay) the fifth part of their Benefices, till they had fully repaired the same.

That all these Injunctions should be observed, under pain of Suspension and Sequestration of the Benefices until they were done.

Other Injunctions also at divers times were set out, which may be seen in Fox. But as the People were not generally satisfied with the Kings alterations, and proceedings in Religion and 1536. and Laws: So certain fifteenths, granted by Act of Parliament, which were demanded of them (about these times) being more than for their Poverty and former Taxes they were well able to pay, made them not a little murmur; but if this were a Crime in them, Cromwel was not altogether free from Error; since to charge the Purse at the same time, that he would make a Reformation plausible, could be no safe Counsel; and in effect, it prov'd so. For the People did rise in many places; though as they agreed not alike in the causes of their Discontentments, they neither took Arms at once, nor altogether for the same Pretexs. The Lincolnshire-men set on by one Doctor Mackrel (Prior of Barlings in the said County, but calling himself Captain Coblet) began first, though the moderatest in their demands, as hoping, perchance, the sooner to have them granted. But as this was not the way, so neither could they long subsist, when no such necessary motive united them.

The Grievances they sent the King in the quality of most humble Supplicants, were, The suppression of so many Religious Houses: The Act of Uses, as restraining the Subjects liberty in the Declaration of their Wills: The fifteenths, for which yet Poverty is only pleaded: That his Grace had ill Counsellors, and of mean Birth about him, (among which Cromwel was not forgotten;) That divers Bishops had subverted the Faith, and that they fear'd the Jewels and Plate of their Parish Churches should be taken from thence, as lately from the Religious Houses. For Reformation of which, yet, they, as his poor and true Subjects, humbly desir'd his Gracious Majesty to call to him the Nobility of the Realm, and to see such order and directions concerning the Premises given, as they might accept his Grace to be their Governour and Supreme Head of the Church of England, which they did acknowledge to be his Graces true Inheritance and Right: And that his Grace should have the Tenth, and First-fruits of Spiritual Promotions of the value of twenty pounds and above, and of all other under the said value, which do not keep Residence and Hospitality.

And now these Articles being publish'd in the Neighbourhood, and thence voiced abroad, drew many to them; while yet for more colouring their Actions, they swore to be true to God, the King, and Common-weal. Nevertheless, as they reserv'd the interpretation of the Oath to themselves, they began a dangerous Rebellion. All which being advertis'd to our vigilant King, caus'd him immediately to dispatch Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, against them, about the seventh of October (as I find by an Original) with Commission to raise Forces: Together with which he writ a Letter to them in such a Stile, as though he might promise Justice, he yet requir'd many things, and particularly that two of the chief Rebels should be deliver'd to him. Whereupon the Knights and Gentlemen, who were associated with these Rebels, wrote to the Duke of Suffolk, how ill the People were satisfied with the Kings Reply; and that upon reading of it, they cry'd they would march on, and make the Gentlemen go along, or else destroy them. And that for this cause they had taken on them to be their Heads and Captains; as also that by Policy they might the better stay them: Which yet they thought would be hard to do, in regard the People rose in so many other parts. Adding further, that if they had not found means to keep them back, and perswaded them to Petition the King, they had before then been at Huntington; and that there was no ways to appease them but a General Pardon. This Letter made it self considerable; for when it were a true Allegation, it had its Pretext, though not sufficient to excuse the Gentlemen: And when nor, it was cunningly remonstrated; for it serv'd both ways. Howbeit, the Duke of Suffolk finding that the end thereof, at worst, was to obtain a General Pardon; and that the Commotion might end thereby, solicited on their behalf: Yet so as he offer'd withal to go against the Rebels with the Forces he had there assembled, if the King gave him leave. In the mean while, he order'd the business in that manner, that he obtain'd of them not to proceed till the Kings Answer were return'd. But the King, who was inform'd already from divers parts (but chiefly from Yorkshire) that the People began there also to take Arms; and knowing of what great Consequence it might be, if the great Persons in those parts (though the rumour were false) should be said to joyn with him, had commanded George Earl of Shrewsbury, Thomas Manners Earl of Rutland, and George Hastings Earl of Huntingdon, to make a Proclamation to the Lincolnshire-men, summoning and commanding them under their allegiance and peril of their Lives to return: Which as it much disheartned them, so many stole away, while the rest (being assured from the Duke, that as long as they were in Arms, it was in vain for him to mediate their Pardon) scatter'd themselves to divers parts; the more stubborn and poorer sort yet retiring to the Yorkshire-men. Besides they had heard, that (notwithstanding the foul ways of this Country, and the Winter season approaching) the great Ordinance was coming on, and the King in Person following: All which Considerations, together with the danger that divers of the principal Ring-leaders found themselves in, as being Men of good Fortunes, and sure to suffer most, caus'd them to persuade those who remain'd, to make their submission as the King requir'd; which was, That they should acknowledge their fault, deliver up their Armour, and approve and maintain all the Acts of Parliament made since the Kings Reign.

And so this business ended: Though not that of Yorkshire, which pass'd in this manner: While the Lincolnshire Commotion was on foot, the Yorkshire-men made an Insurrection under the command of one Robert Aske; they would have it call'd yet only a Pilgrimage of Grace; while, for giving it Reputation, certain Priests with Crosses led the way, the Army following with Banners, wherein were painted the Crucifix, the five Wounds, and the Chalice. And because they desir'd to draw in as many good Persons as they could, they attempted first William Lord Dacres of Gilsland, advising him (as being of late wrongfully accus'd, and in danger, had not his Peers acquitted him) to joyn with them, but he refus'd: Then they sent to invite divers others, using threats, where persuasions serv'd not; insomuch, that at last they made fundry Persons of quality swear to be faithful to them: For they pretended only the good of the King and Commonwealth, the Church and Religion, and the depressing of Hereticks.

They being now assembled in great number, the dispossessed and discontented Monks every where made Petitions to Aske for remedy; who I find also re-establish'd them in divers places, wishing them to pray for the King, and to take up Victuals of the Farmers of the said Monasteries upon Bill, till their suit were granted. Which being advertis'd to the King on the one side, and (presently after) that the Commons of Richmont, Lancashire, Durham, Westmerland, &c. were up in another place, and had fir'd the Beacons, made him think what he had to do: Yet was not his Service neglected by some of the Nobility 1536. lity there, especially George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, who raising many Men before he received the Kings Commission for it, did by this dangerous discretion much advance his Service. For though his zeal for the welfare of the State were above scruples, and that some Learned Men in the Law besides had told him, that his Intention being good, his Action could not be construed ill: He yet said, he knew his danger so well, as he had sent to the King for a Pardon; while for deterring the Rebels, as well as the satisfying many, who otherwise might have suspected him, he gave an Oath to his Men to be true unto the King; protesting further, that according to the ancient Loyalty of the Talbots to the Crown, when it had been upon a stake, he would have liv'd and dy'd in defence of it. And now the first order the King gave was to command the Duke of Suffolk's stay in Lincolnshire, lest they should rise again. Then he appointed the Earl of Shrewsbury as his Lieutenant, to march with a great Army and the Canon, against the Northern Men: He writ also to Edward Stanley Earl of Derby, to raise what Forces he could, promising to repay his Charges. Henry Courtney also Marquis of Exeter, Cousin-german to the King, and the Earls of Huntingdon and Rutland offer'd themselves to the Kings Service. And because now divers Monks in those parts were restor'd to their Monasteries by the Rebels (as I find particularly those of Sally, Whally, Norton, and Hexam) he commanded them to be taken out, and Martial Law to be us'd against them. Yet as the noise of this Insurrection was by continual Courriers augmented, Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk about the twentieth of October, was dispatch'd with Forces to assist the Earl of Shrewsbury: Who writ to the King, that the Yorkshire-men, as being us'd to Arms, were more considerable than those of Lancashire, yet that they could not long continue together, but for lack of means to provide Victuals otherwise than by Rapine; and the season of the year: And that the best way was to persuade them to lay down their Arms, or sow Sedition among them.

They force the Arch-bishop of York and Lord Darcy to take their Oath. This while Aske and his Company advancing forward, forc'd Edward Lee Archbishop of York, and Thomas Lord Darcy to surrender to them Pomfret Castle, and take the Oath; which was, That they should enter into this Pilgrimage of Grace for the love of God, the preservation of the Kings Person and Issue, the purifying of the Nobility, and expelling all Villan blood, and evil Counsellors; and for no particular profit for themselves, nor to do displeasure to any, nor to slay nor Murder any for Envy; but to put away all fears, and take afore them the Cross of Christ, his Faith, and the Restitution of the Church, the Suppression of Hreticks and their Opinions. But as this Castle was strong, the Archbishop and Lord Darcy (though pretending want of Furniture and Provision to hold out) were suspected to have render'd it in favour of the Rebels. They stay'd not yet so, but took the City of York and Hull; and betwixt Force and Intreaty drew most of the great Persons in those parts unto them. While not content to have pretext of Religion, they by false tales got many Partizans: Therefore they gave out as before they had done in Lincolnshire, that all the Gold in England should be brought to the Tower to be touch'd; and that the King claim'd all the Cattel unmark'd as his: As also all the Goods and Ornaments of Parish Churches; that they should pay Fines for Christenings, Weddings and Buryings, and for Licences to eat white Bread, and the daintier sorts of Mears, &c. And this again stirr'd rancor in the Peoples Hearts.

Aske and his Followers being now in Pomfret, Lancaster the Herald came with a Proclamation from the Earl of Shrewsbury, requiring it to be read. But Aske sitting in State, and having the Archbishop on the one hand, and the Lord Darcy on the other, desir'd first to know the Contents; which being told, he said it should not be proclaim'd. Nevertheless, he gave the Herald a safe conduct, as long as he wore his Coat. But the Rebels not contented thus, requir'd Henry Clifford Earl of Cumberland (being then in his Castle of Skipton) to joyn with them: But he by Letter assures the King, that though 500 Gentlemen (retain'd at his cost) had forsaken him, he would yet continue the Kings true Subject, and defend his Castle (in which he had great Ordnance) against them all. Sir Ralph Evers also kept Scarborough Castle with no less courage against the Rebels; he and his Company having no sustenance but Bread and Water for the space of twenty days that they Besieg'd him.

The King being now in Windfor, intends in Person to go against the Rebels, commanding his Nobles for this purpose to meet him at Northampton November 7. And it was time to take some good order, for they were now grown to be thirty thousand Men; in which number (being divided into three Battels) they presented themselves before Doncaster: Near which, the Duke of Norfolk, Earl of Shrewsbury, and Marquis of Exeter were encamp'd with an Army, though little in number (as being but five thousand) yet better furnish'd. And two ways they had to pass the River Don to the Town; a Bridge, and a Foord: The Bridge the Duke took on him to defend; not neglecting yet to entertain them with a Treaty, as expecting daily more Forces: The Foord was undertaken by the rest of the Army. This alone yet could not have stay'd the Rebels; but a great Rain falling that Night, so increas'd the Water, that it was not passable the next day: Besides, by the coming of some Shot, the Bridge was so fortified, that it was now defensible. This hindered not the Treaty; for the Duke of Norfolk and the rest knowing of what Importance it was to gain time till all the Kings Forces were assembled, and having intelligence besides among the Rebels, got a Petition from them to be deliver'd to the King, which Sir Ralph Elecker and Robert Bowes should carry, (who though manfully defending Hull against the Rebels, were at last forc'd to joyn and take the Oath.) The Duke himself also promis'd to go with them, upon condition that there might be a Cessation from Hostility in the mean time; which was condescended to. Coming thus to Court, and the Duke being first heard (who acquainted the King with the state of all things) the aforesaid Commissioners presented the intrusted Petition with many excuses on their own part. But the King, who desir'd still to gain more time, would return no present answer; and the rather, because he was inform'd by the Duke that the Rebels began to disband; for the Treaty disheartned and divided them, while Rumours were dispers'd every where, that some of the Chiefs would compound for themselves, and leave the rest to the Gallows. In-somuch that daily and nightly they ran away, especially the poorer sort, who had neither means to subsist, nor might have leave from their Captain to take any thing by force; which being advertis'd to the King, made him both give private order to discharge those Troops he had appointed to meet him at Northampton, and to detain Elecker and Bowes, upon pretext that some Innovation had been attempted by the Yorkshire-men.

men since their coming up; nevertheless, at last for clearing all suspicion (since the Commons took this detention of their Messengers so ill, that they encourag'd one another to be in Arms again at an hours warning) the King thought fit to send his answer; yet not by them, but by the Duke of Norfolk, together with a safe conduct (under the Great Seal) for three hundred Persons to meet in the Town of Doncaster for concluding all things; neither did the King doubt to admit this great number, as being confident they would not only less agree among themselves, but that some would be won to his Party. After which, the said Elecker and Bowes had their dispatch too, as being commanded to say, that his Majesty took it marvelous unkindly at their hands, that knowing his Benignity, they would rather rise in Arms than Petition his Majesty, and that they had left their Country open to the Scots, who prepar'd to invade them; referring the rest to the Duke of Norfolk, who brought (as I gather out of those Originals I have seen) the offer of a Pardon to all, except six nam'd, and four un-nam'd, when the rest would submit. But as the four un-nam'd concern'd every body, so it was declin'd. Nevertheless, certain Books the King sent down, which were, as I take it, the Articles of Religion, devis'd by himself, being receiv'd by them, took away much misunderstanding and ill impression which their discontented Priests had given; while for accompanying hereof, express order was sent to the Bishops in their several Diocesses, not to neglect the usual Ceremonies of the Church. Hereupon the Clergy of those parts met at Pomfret, and agreed on certain Articles of Religion, to be propos'd in the following Treaty. The Archbishop of York being present, and taking occasion to tell them, that though Pilgrimages were good, yet an arm'd Pilgrimage could not be lawful. After this, a day of meeting at Doncaster was appointed, in which John Lord Scroop, Lord Latimer, John Lord Lumley, and Thomas Lord Darcy, Sir Thomas Percy, Robert Aske, and about 300 Persons, were to treat with the Duke of Norfolk, Sir William Fitz-William Admiral of England, and the rest: But concerning Aske, there was some difficulty, the Rebels demanding Hostages for his safe return. But the King inform'd hereof, answer'd, that he knew no Gentleman or other, whom he esteem'd so little, as to put him in pledge for such a Villain; therefore he wish'd the Duke of Norfolk and the rest, to assure the passages over the River Don, and to secure Doncaster: And whereas the Rebels had demanded an abstinence from War for fourteen days, in case no agreement should be made; not to grant it, as being time given them to fortifie themselves, whereas he should rather win it from them by Policy for his own Advantage. But the Duke of Norfolk supposing, that a General Pardon and a Parliament in those parts (which they requir'd) might quiet all, had by Letter to our King, perswaded him to accord it, or else to march towards the Rebels with an Army of Gentlemen and Household Servants, and not to trust the Commons; since the Rebels, though they had laid down Arms, had yet (upon firing of Beacons and other Signals) agreed among themselves to resume them again on all occasions. And now on December the sixth, the 300 on the part of the Commons came to Doncaster to the Kings Lieutenants, where their first demand was a General Pardon, then a Parliament to be held in those parts, and a Court of Justice, that none beyond Trent might be cited to London in Law-Suits. After which, they desir'd a repeal of the Act of Parliament for the last Subsidy, for Uses, for Misprision of Treason for words, for Tenths and First-fruits; then that the Lady Mary might be restor'd to her Legitimation, the Pope to his wonted Jurisdiction, and the late expuls'd Monks to their Houses; the Luthe-rans to be punish'd, the Lord Privy-Seal and Lord Chancellor to be excluded from the next Parliament, and the Doctors Leigh and Layton to be imprison'd for Bribery and Extortion. But as these demands were more insolent than those of the Lincolnshire-men, and howsoever such as the King would not accord, the Lords rejected them; whereupon the Rebels assembled in great numbers, divers others also, desirous to know the Success, appearing among them. Which caus'd the Duke of Norfolk to write again to the King what a multitude was gotten together, and if no agreement follow'd, his Highness Army was in ill estate to resist. Therefore, he and his Associates desir'd his Grace to send them instructions for divers degrees of proceeding with the Rebels, and that the last might be for gaining of time, in case they came to no Agreement.

The King finding these difficulties, and suspecting besides that the Emperor had or would have a hand therein, and that the Rebels might have assistance from Scotland; and for the rest, believing that all was but mis-understanding in the simpler sort, which yet he hop'd his Book of Articles, and other good orders would in time rectifie, sent to the Duke of Norfolk a General Pardon for the Rebels, and promise of a Parliament, with directions yet to the Duke, that he should not make use thereof, but in case of extremity. But the Duke and the other Lords finding so many gather'd together, as their number was very great; and being not able to distinguish those who came on the Rebels part, from such as curiosity only brought thither; and considering that the first denial of their demands had so inflam'd them, that they intended to have fallen upon the Town of Doncaster, (had not the River this second time swelling by Rain the Night preceding, prevented their attempt) made use of the Kings General Pardon and Promise of a Parliament, which they all gladly accepted, and return'd home. The Contents of this Pardon, dated December 9. at Richmond, and Sealed with the Great Seal, was, as our Records shew, that the King granted them all a general and free Pardon of all Rebellion, Treasons, Felonies, and Trespases, unto the day of the date hereof; provided that they make their Submission to the Duke of Norfolk and Earl of Shrewsbury (the Kings Lieutenant,) and that they rebel no more. I find also by our Records, that to the Petition (formerly mention'd) sent by Elecker and Bowes, the King sent a Reply pen'd by himself; which I doubt not gave much satisfaction (as another had before done to this effect sent to the Lincolnshire-men.) It was this:

First, as touching the maintenance of the Faith, the terms be so general, that it would be very hard to make certain answer to the same; but if they mean the Faith of Christ, to the which all Christian Men be only bound, we declare and protest our self to be that Prince that doth intend, and hath always minded to live and die in the Maintenance, Defence and Observation of the purity of the same. And that no Man can or dare set his foot by ours, in proving of the contrary. Marvelling therefore much, that ignorant People would go about to take upon them to instruct and teach us (which hath been noted something Learned) what the Faith should be. And also, that they being ignorant People, be so presumptuous (seeing that we and our whole Clergy in Convocation, hath in Articles declar'd 1536. declar'd it) as to take upon them to correct us all therein. Or that they would be so ingrate and unnatural towards their most Rightful King, and Natural Sovereign Lord, without any our desert, upon false reports or surmises to suspect us of the same, and give rather credence to forged light Tales, than to the very truth by us these twenty-eight years us'd, and by our Deeds approv'd.

The second, which toucheth the maintenance of the Church, and the Liberties of the same; we say it is so general a Proposition, that without distinctions no Man with troth can answer; neither by Gods Laws, nor by the Laws of the Realm. For first, the Church which they mean, must be known. Secondly, whether those things which they call Liberties, and say they would maintain, be things lawful and beneficial to the Prince and Commonwealth, or otherwise. And these known, we doubt not but they shall be answer'd according to Gods Law, Equity, and Justice. Nevertheless, for all their generality this we dare affirm, that (meaning what Church they list) we have done nothing that may not be abiden by, both by Gods Laws and Mans Laws, or that is prejudicial to our Commonwealth, if our proceedings may be indifferently consider'd. And in our Church of England, whereof we be the Supream Head on Earth, we have done nothing so onerous and chargeable to them, as many of our Predecessors have done upon much lesser grounds. Wherefore, sithence this Article pertaineth nothing to any of our Commons, nor that they bear any thing therein, we cannot but reckon a great unkindness and unnaturalness in them, which had leaver a Churl or Twain should enjoy those profits of their Monasteries for the supportation and maintenance of abominable Life, than that we their Prince should receive the same, towards our extreme Charges done, and daily sustain'd for their defence against foreign Enemies.

The third Article toucheth three things, the First is the Laws, the Second is the Commonwealth, the Third the Directors of the Laws under us. Touching the Laws, as it becometh not blind Men to judge of Colours, ne to take upon them to be Judges of the same; so we dare expressly and boldly affirm, as a thing that may be easily and duly prov'd; that there were never in any one of our Predecessors days, so many wholsom, commodious and beneficial Acts made for the Commonwealth, as have been made in our time; and sithence some of them had credit and doing in our Affairs, that would now perchance pick them thank without desert; for our Lord forbid that both we and our Council should have lost so much time, as not to know better now, than we did in the beginning of our Reign, what were a Commonwealth, and what were against the good and commodity of the same; seeing we have been a King these twenty-eight years, and by experience learn'd the perfectness thereof. And although the folly and unkindness of some will not perchance let them so knowledge it, yet we trust and doubt not but the most part of our loving Subjects, especially those which be not seduc'd by false report, do both think it, accept it, and find it so. Now touching the Commonwealth, what King hath kept his so long in Wealth and Peace, so long without taking or doing wrong one to another, so indifferently ministred Justice to all Estates both high and low, so defended them from all outward Enemies, so fortified the Frontier of his Realm to his no little, and in manner inestimable Charges, and all for their Wealths and Safeties? What King hath given among his Subjects more general and freer Pardons? What King hath been loather to punish his Subjects, or shew'd more Mercy among them? These things being so true as no true Man can deny them; it is an unnatural and unkind demeanour of you our Subjects, to believe or deem the contrary of it, by whose report soever it should be set forth against us. And at the beginning of our Reign where it is said, that so many Noblemen were Counsellors, we do not forget who were then Counsellors; for of the Temporality, there were but two worthy to be call'd Noble, the one the Treasurer of England, the other the High Steward of our Household. Others, as the Lord Marney and Darcy, but mean born Gentlemen, nor yet of any great Lands, till they were promoted by us, and so made Knights and Lords; the rest were Lawyers and Priests, saving the two Bishops of Canterbury and Winchester. If these be then the great number of Noblemen that is spoken of, and that our Subjects seem'd then contented withal, why then be they not much better contented with us which have so many Nobles indeed, both of Birth and Condition of our Council. For first of the Temporality of our Privy Council, we have the Duke of Norfolk, the Duke of Suffolk, the Marquis of Exeter, the Lord Steward, (when he is present) the Earl of Oxford, the Earl of Suffex, the Lord Sands our Chamberlain, the Lord Admiral Treasurer of our House, Sir William Paulet Comptroller of our House. And of the Spirituality, the Bishop of Canterbury, Winchester, Hereford, and Chichester: And for because it is more than necessary to have some in our Privy Council Learned in our Laws and Pactes of the World; we by the advice of our whole Council, aforementioned, did elect and chuse into our Privy Council, and also in their Rooms, our Chancellor and Privy-Seal; thinking them Men in all our Opinion most meet for the same Rooms; and we with our whole Council think it right strange, that ye which be but Brutes and inexpert folk, do take upon you to appoint us who be meet for our Council, and who be not. Mark therefore now, how these seditious Persons, which thus wrongfully have born you thus in hand, have falsly abus'd you; that reckon there were then more Noble-men in our Privy Council than be now: But yet though of our great Clemency and Princely goodness we declare now the truth to pull our Subjects from that error and blindness they were led and train'd to by false and untrue surmise and report; we would again that every of them knew, that it appertaineth not to any Subject to presume to take upon him the appointment of his King and Sovereign Lord's Council, ne for our part we will take any such thing at any of our Subjects hands. Wherefore, we would that from henceforth they should better remember the Duties of good Subjects to their natural Liege Lord, and meddle no further with those or such like things as they have nothing to do withal.

To the fourth Article, where the Commons do name certain of our Council to be subverters both of Gods Law, and the Laws of this Realm, we do take and repute them as just and true executors both of Gods Laws and ours, as far as their Commission under us doth extend. And if any of our Subjects can duly prove the contrary, we shall proceed against them, and all other offenders therein according to Justice, as to our Estate and Dignity Royal doth appertain. And in case it be but a false and an untrue report, as we verily think it is, then it were as meet, and standeth as well with Justice, that they should have the self-same punishment which wrong-

1536. wrongfully have objected this to them, that they should have had if they had deserv'd it. And one thing among others causeth us to think that this slander should be untrue, because it proceedeth from that place which is both far distant from that where they inhabit, and also from those People which never heard them Preach, nor yet know any part of their Conversation. Wherefore we exhort all ye our Commons to be no more so light of credit in believing of evil things spoke of us your natural Prince and Sovereign Lord, nor of any of our Prelates and Counsellors; but to think that your King, having so long reign'd over you with the advice of his Council, hath as good discretion to elect and chuse his Counsellors, as those, whofoever they be, that have put this in your heads, or ye either, being but ignorant People, and out of all experience of Princes Affairs.

Here in this final Point, which ye our Commons of Yorkshire, Westmerland, Cumberland, the Bishoprick of Durham, Richmond-shire, Craven, Dent, Sedbane, and all other places that have been seduc'd to this Insurrection to desire, and also in the matter of the whole discourse of your Petitions; we verily think that the rest of all our whole Commons of many Countries, to whom you be in manner but an handful, will greatly disdain, and not bear it, that you take upon you to set order to Us and them, and especially to Us, being Sovereign Lord to you both. And that (you being Rebels) you would make them as bearers and partakers of your Mischief, willing them to take Pardon for Insurrections, which verily we think and doubt not, they never minded; but like true Subjects, to the contrary, have both with Heart and Deed been ready to our call to defend both Us and themselves. And now for our part, as to your demands, We let you wit, that pardon of such things as you demand, lyeth only in the will and pleasure of the Prince: But it seemeth by your lewd Proclamations and safe Conducts, that there be among you, which take upon them both the parts of Kings and Counsellors, which neither by Us, nor by the general consent of our Realm hath been admitted to any such room. What Arrogance is then in those Wretches, being also of none experience, to presume to raise you our Subjects without Commission or Authority; yea and against Us, under a cloaked colour of your Wealth, and in our Name, and as the success and end would declare, if we should not be more merciful unto you, than you have deserv'd, to your own utter Confusions? Wherefore, we let all you our said Subjects again wit, that were it not that our Princely Heart cannot reckon this your shameful Insurrection, and most ingrate and unnatural Rebellion to be done of Malice or Rancor, but rather by a lightness given in manner by a naughty nature to Communalty, and a wondrous sudden surreption of Gentlemen; we must needs have executed another manner of punishment, than if you will humbly knowledge your fault, and submit your selves to our mercy, we intend to do (as by our Proclamations we doubt not ye be inform'd.)

And now this great Company being dispers'd, began to take Books of Controversies in hand, and inform themselves concerning the Kings Articles of Religion. But the Clergy of the North in general wholly opposing the Kings Reformation, kept the Rebellion still on foot, though outwardly smother'd for a while (as will appear in his place.)

Sandov. I shall come now to Foreign History.
Barbarossa being driven from Tunis, repairs to the Turk, newly return'd from the Expedition to Persia; and persuades him to take Arms against the Emperor; who wanted (he said) only Albarbarossa to command intirely all that Coast of Affrica. The Counsel pleas'd him; and the rather that Monsieur de Forrest the French Ambassador concurr'd therein, and one Pignaselo a Renegado of Naples. Assembling thus an Army of 200000 Men, and 400 Gallies and Ships, (in which were 3000 Pieces of Ordnance) under the command of Lutifi Bassa, he appointed them to be ready at Velona, being not above 15 Leagues distant from Otranto in Italy; from whence a small part of the Fleet being sent to enter that Continent, they chose rather to fall on Castro than Otranto, or Brindisi, being stronger than that they could be gotten easily. This great preparative yet, at last, came to nothing: For those of Apulia not rising in favour of the French (which was hop'd) nor Francis having any Army near to second him, and Doria (besides that) having taken some of their Gallies from them, the Bassa having gotten Castro, and taken store of Captives, neglected the Enterprize, and return'd; while Forrest the French Ambassador died at Verona.

About this time Alexandro de Medicis, first Duke of Florence, was betray'd by his Kinsman Lorenzo de Medicis, who promising to help him to a Lady much desir'd by the Duke, entic'd him to his House in the Night: But in stead of the Lady, Lorenzo with two Assassins came in and kill'd him; which yet was reveng'd by Cosmo de Medicis, his Successor.

Though the Emperor were now retir'd to Spain, (as is told before,) he yet continu'd his Wars against the French in the Low-Countries (and the rather, that our King had promis'd to be Neuter betwixt them,) giving order thereupon to besiege Therouenne; which being advertis'd to Francis, caus'd him to raise an Army of 25000 Men under Anne Montmorency his Lieutenant, wherewith (the King being present) Hesdin, St. Paul, and divers other places were taken: While by a publick Act in Paris the Emperor was declar'd a Rebel and Felon, and that he had forfeited all the Estate he held of the French Crown, being Artois, Flanders, Charolois, and some others. But some considerable Forces being rais'd on the Emperors part, and half the French Army being diminish'd by reason of Garrisons put into the Towns won, and other occasions, Francis with the rest of his Army return'd. The Imperial Army hereupon, commanded by the Count de Bures, took * back St. Paul, † surpris'd Monstruel, and defeated Claude de Annebault Mareschal of France, though bravely defending himself after his Victualling of Therouenne. Things being brought to these extremities, Mary Queen of Hungary, Regent of the Low-Countries, mediated and effected a Truce on those parts between the two Princes for three Months: While in Savoy some Towns revolting, the Count de St. Paul was sent thither by Francis, who recover'd all again, and freed Turin then besieged by the Imperials. Yet Alonso de Avalos, Marquis of Guasto, won back the greatest part of the Marquesate of Saluzzo in the behalf of Francois Marquis thereof; who for falling away to the Emperor, was by the French King not long since depriv'd of his Possessions. But the Marquis enjoy'd not this Restitution, being kill'd soon after with a small shot, while he play'd the part of a Canoneer at the Siege of the Castle of Carmagnola, Francis understanding now the progress of the Spaniard in those parts, commands the Seigneur de Humieres with some German Foot to pass to Piedmont, both to defend the places he had gotten there, and take others; who thereupon besieged Asti, but in vain, it being 1536. ing well defended; so that raising the Siege, he went to Albe, which was rendred him without Resistance.

Octob. 10. Busineses passing thus with various Success on both sides, Francis thought fit to send Henry the new Dauphin (his Elder Brother Francis after four days Sicknes, being the last year dead of a Surfeit of drinking cold water after Tennis-play, rather than Poyson by the Emperors procurement, though one suffer'd for it) and Antonie de Bourbon Duke of Vendosme, and Montmorency, who made their way over the Alps, by force took divers Towns, and perform'd many brave Exploits; which being advertis'd to the King, made him resolve to go thither in Person, where advising with the Dauphin, and Montmorency what was further to be done, News was brought of a general abstinence of War concluded by the mediation of the Queen of Hungary, from that time being 28 of November 1537. till the 22th of February following; for as upon a Truce made a little before in Picardie for three Months (as above said) Commissioners were sent to the Emperor to treat of a Peace, or at least a General Truce, and that for a longer time, so this Cessation was accorded: And the rather, that the Pope had now a long while mediated it. And by this means, as the Siege was rais'd from Therouenne, so the French remain'd in possession of all they had in Piedmont. This Truce being publish'd, the Marquis of Guaſto demanded leave to kiss the hands of Francis; which being granted, he with many Spaniards in good Equipage came towards the Army at Carmagnola, while Francis for more honouring of Montmorency, (as a Man who for his rare Merits, he thought deserv'd that Esteem) took him in the middle, betwixt himself and the Dauphin, and so expected the Marquis, who having first done his due Respects, and after treated of an agreement concerning the Soldatesque in the places taken on either part, departed with much satisfaction of the Reception which Francis had given.

Nov. 28. The Emperor this while not unmindful of the Princess Mary, us'd all means for restoring her to her Legitimation and Possibility of Inheritance. Therefore, desiring of the Pope that Reginald Pool (who a little before had written his Books de Unione Ecclesiastica) should be made Cardinal, the Pope both easily granted it, and in the beginning of 1537. imploy'd him as Legate to Flanders, that by this means he might confirm the Roman Catholics in England, and advance his Designs, being to stir up Enemies to our King. Though as Pool was of the Blood-Royal (his Mother Margaret Countess of Salisbury, being Daughter to George Duke of Clarence, Brother to Edward IV.) many wanted not, who believ'd that his zeal was complicate with some Ambition to intitle his Line to the Crown, when our King might be depos'd, and his Posterity, especially by Queen Anne, declar'd Illegitimate. Being now on his way, our King who was inform'd hereof, writ to Francis to deny him passage through his Kingdom, or to deliver him up as a Rebel, or at least not to treat with him as a Legate; who thereupon dismiss'd him. Coming thus to the Low-Countries, his Servant Michael Throgmorton was very inquisitive (as our Records tell us) whether the Queen (being now great) were thought by the Physicians to bear a Man-child or Female: Which, as it made the intentions of the Cardinal more suspected, so it gave occasion to John Hutton, the Kings Agent in the Low-Countries, to gain Throgmorton. He was also commanded by our King to charge the Queen-Regent there with breach of Treaty, if she receiv'd the Cardinal, being (as he call'd him) a Traitor; which he seconded also in that manner, that though at first she said it was not fit for her to refuse the Pope's Legate, yet being now urg'd again, at a time when she was (as is before related) in War with Francis, she forbade the Cardinal to enter; telling him, that since he was an Englishman of that Quality, his Negotiation could not be hidden, and that it might be to her prejudice. Howsoever, the Cardinal sent a Letter to the Lord Cromwel, to clear himself of all design against our King, and dispatch'd John Matthei Bishop of Velona to the Regent, both to charge her with disobedience to the Apostolick See, and to protest that Legate was never so us'd: Adding, that his business was chiefly to dispute the errors of our Kings Reformation. But the Lady Regent not liking disputations of Religion in her Dominions, again refus'd him: So that he was forc'd to hold his Correspondence in England by more clandestine means: Whereof, as also his other proceedings, his Servant Throgmorton, and one Frier Peto certified some part, as I find by our Records; as also his return to Rome in November 1537. where he was receiv'd with much Triumph (as the said Throgmorton affirm'd.) This proceeding of the Pope's on the other side made our King cherish the Princes of Germany: For November which he took this Occasion.

The Protestants finding their late Pacification with the Emperor not observ'd in all Points, met again at Smalcald, Feb. 7. 1537. to consult what was to be done. Hither Heldus came on the Emperors part, who exhorted the Princes, First, to accept the Council indicted: Secondly, to aid the Emperor with Money against the Turk; or (if he stirr'd not) against the French (now usurping Savoy,) &c. Thirdly, he objected to them, that they had receiv'd into their League new Confederates since the Treaty at Noremburg. To this the Protestants answer'd, that for the Council, it was not propos'd in a due manner nor place (the Emperor and Princes having decreed that it should be in Germany,) therefore they could not admit it. For the Treaty of Peace at Noremburg, it was not broken by them, but by the Emperors Officers, who in the Camera Imperialis, contrary to the Conditions agreed on, had question'd Men for causes touching Religion. And as for those entred into their League since the Treaty of Noremburg, it was desir'd that they also might be comprehended in that Peace; upon which condition they promis'd to furnish the Emperor such Monies as he requir'd. Howbeit, if he offer'd violence to them, they protest- ed to defend them as their Confederates.

Things standing thus, King Henry privately dispatch'd William Paget and Christopher Mount to Smalcald, with Instructions to take France in their way, and acquaint Stephen Gardiner his English Ambassador, and the French King therewith, and by their directions to do all things, and that the Voyage was to be perform'd in disguis'd Habit. In conclusion, the sum of their Instructions was, to dehort the German Princes from according either with the Emperor, or to the Council indicted; but rather to refer all their differences to him and the French King. And herein as the King pretended to shew his love to the said Princes, (who, if the Emperor made a Peace with them, should (he said) be singly and separately oppress'd) so he had his own ends, as knowing that if a Council were held, his Actions would receive no favourable Censure; so that though not only the French King, but the Emperor had promis'd (as I find in our Records) that in the Council his Affairs should not be question'd; yet he gave them no intire credit. Therefore, after the Protestants had sent him their Recusation of the Council, he made a publick Protestation against it; shewing, that the Indiction belong'd not to the Bishop of Rome, but to the Emperor, and the Princes who should send or come thither. That the time was unfit, War being then betwixt the Emperor and Francis; the place inconvenient for the English, as being in Mantua, whether they could neither come safely, nor declare themselves freely; that the manner of deciding Controversies in Religion was unjust, the Bishop of Rome being Judge in his own Cause; that therefore the Pope's intention was rather to establish his Authority on this occasion, than to yield to a Reformation, and after all to glory that a Council had damn'd the contrary Opinion. That for his particular therefore, he would not come there, as having more reason to keep home, and provide against the Rebellions and Mischiefs that the said Bishop had now for three years space procur'd or rais'd in his Kingdom, than run new dangers. In conclusion, that nothing remain'd to be done, but that every Prince should reform in his own Kingdom; all other ways being suspect, perillous, and unequal: Yet if any could shew a better Expedient, he would give ear to it. The French King would not declare himself yet so far; and indeed he had use of the Pope at this time. Nevertheless, he publicly protested again to the Princes, that he would never consent to a Council which was not assembled in a safe place, and free manner: And that his Son-in-Law, the King of Scots was of the same mind.

Cont. Trid.

May now approaching, Frederic Duke of Mantua requir'd Money of the Pope to maintain a Guard for the security of his City during the Council. But the Pope denying this, or at least requiring, that if he paid this Guard, it might be at his command, found the Duke averse; so that he deferr'd the Council from May to November, and then to May next, and lastly, transferr'd it to Vicenza, being in the Venetian Territory.

Cont. Trid.
Sleid.

And because (by reason of these delays) many doubted whether the Pope really intended a redress to the Enormities then generally complain'd of, he resolv'd privately to proceed in a Reformation a year since propos'd. And this was a singular ingenuity: Yet as he referr'd the business to the Cardinals Contarino, Theatino, Sadoleto, and Reginald Pool, and some others who were passionate on their own side, they produc'd, after many Conferences, no more than a Remonstrance of divers abuses in the Government and Administration of Ecclesiastical Persons and Affairs; for in the Church Doctrine they would not admit an Error. But there were few Princes then living who would not have been glad that something more had been done; but as their Subjects were so much at the Pope's dispose (when he would use his Authority,) and as no little Sums were drawn out of their Kingdoms; that I may say nothing of Theological Points vexed on either side. Howbeit, this Reformation (being extant in Sleidan lib. 12.) is worth the seeing: For certainly it was the occasion of rectifying divers abuses in that Church; so that it hath been better, or at least warier ever since: Whereby it appears, that Controversies in Religion, though they produce many pernicious effects, have yet this one good, that they make both sides more careful not to offend; while fear lest personal faults should redound to the detriment of the Religion they profess, becomes a caution for Verrue and good Example; so can God draw good out of evil; and so can Man pervert all again: For though indeed there was hope at this time that a further Reformation might have follow'd, (and certainly it had been the safest way to begin there) yet as Luther, Stermius, and others hearing what was done by the Delegates at Rome, both irrided it publicly, and rejected all Reformations but their own; so all hope of Reconciliation in this kind was precluded: While the Pope and Cardinals hearing thereof again, found now so little probability of an accord by endeavouring to come nearer the Protestants, that they thought it would rather derogate from the Authority of the Church (as if it might err) than establish a General Peace.

It is time I return now to those home Affairs which pass'd while those foreign Businesses formerly related were in Action.

The Insurrection of the North was not yet so quieted, but that the King thought fit to hold a hand over them: Therefore he commanded the Duke of Norfolk to stay there, and together with the Earl of Shrewsbury to compose all things: Who thereupon took the submission of the Commons; which was, First, to revoke all Oaths and Promises made in the former Insurrection, asking the King forgiveness on their Knees. Secondly, to be true to the King, his Heirs and Successors. Thirdly, To observe and maintain all Acts of Parliament since the first year of the Kings Reign. Fourthly, Not to take Arms again, but by his Highness's Authority. Fifthly, To apprehend all seditious Persons. And Sixthly, To remove all the Monks, Friars and Nuns they had replac'd in the late dissolv'd Monasteries. Together with which these Lords had private Instructions to bring in the Lord Thomas Darcy and Robert Aske; and for Aske, I find by our History and Records, that he came to our King, and that upon the Submission aforesaid, and Oath not to depart for any long season without the Kings leave, being well receiv'd for the present, he was dismiss'd again. But the Lord Darcy, suspecting he should be question'd, excus'd himself to Cromwel; saying, that all he did was only for retaining so much credit among the Commons, as might better enable him to do his Highness Service: Adding thereunto a note of the Services he had done the King and his Father for fifty years. But this did not avail; for he was sent for to London, and Imprison'd, that so he might no more run such hazards, the King foreseeing the Rebellion would break out again, as indeed it happen'd: For Nicolas Musgrave, Thomas Tilby, and others Besieg'd Carlisle with 8000 Men, but were repuls'd by the City; and in their return encountred by the Duke of Norfolk, who caus'd all the Captains (save Musgrave, who escap'd) and about seventy Persons, by Law-Martial to be hang'd on Carlisle Walls.

Sir Francis Bigot, and one Halam attempted also to surprize the Town of Hull; but were prevented, and they both taken and executed. For which Insurrections, and some lesser which follow'd, I find yet no reason deliver'd, but that the People were unsatisfied because a Parliament was not held at York, according to their expectation; and that they imagin'd the Duke of Norfolk had order secretly (notwithstanding the Pardon) to chastise the principal Offenders. But our King on the other side, alledg'd, that since they had not restor'd all the Religious Houses, in which they had replac'd the Monks, he was not bound strictly to hold promise with them. Howsoever, these new Revolts ended quickly: And now the Duke having this occasion, proceeded severely; for having by the King's Commandment spread his Royal Banner, he thereupon executed Martial-Law where he thought it needful. In conclusion, so many were found to

The Lord Darcy was Beheaded at Tower-Hill, and the Lord Hussey at Lincoln: Others were hang'd at Hull, and at York, some elsewhere, among whom were divers Religious Persons: The news whereof being certified by the Duke of Norfolk to Court, the King by Letter to him, said, he would close this Tragedy: For he sent now a General Pardon; which was receiv'd with great joy, many being terrified with the Dukes proceedings. All this great Service of the Duke of Norfolk yet could not exempt him from Calumny: For the Lord Darcy during his Imprisonment, had accus'd him, as favouring the Rebels Articles when they first met at Doncaster. But the Duke denied it, offering the Duel; saying, that Aske (who suffer'd at York before the said Lord) told him the said Lords Intentions; who (he said) bare him ill will ever since the Duke had solicited the said Lord to deliver Aske into his hands, when he was in chief credit with the Rebels; which Darcy denying, some expostulation had pass'd betwixt them. Nevertheless, I find the King was so well satisfied of the Duke, that those things were pass'd over without further questioning.

Of all which proceedings (from the beginning) though James the Scottish King (now in France) were advertis'd; yet he stir'd not. And it was happy for our State; for had he joyn'd, he might have endanger'd the Northern parts, as People stood then affected. Howsoever, our King who thought his absence was not security enough, had employ'd Sir Ralph Sadler thither, with command to reside till James return'd, (which was about Whitsontide, 1537.) and to inform him of all Occurrents. Howbeit, I find that James in his way touching on the Coast of England, divers English cast themselves at his feet, and desir'd him to assist them, saying, he should have all: (For so the Original hath it.) But the King would not suddenly discover himself. Coming thus to Edinburgh with his new married Queen, (who was brought up under the Queen of Navarre, and not disaffected to the Reformation of Religion) he was receiv'd with much joy, which yet continued not long, the dying shortly after of an Heetick Fever: (As hath been formerly related.) Whereupon Cardinal Beton and Robert Maxwell were sent into France to treat of a Marriage betwixt him and Mary of the House of Guise, and Widow of the Duke of Longueville, which also follow'd.

The Affairs of Ireland.

The King having appeas'd all things in these parts, procures the establishment of his Authority in Ireland; but as now the vigorous and many Executions done upon all sorts of Persons had made him terrible; so that sweet temper of love and fear, which ought to be equally mix'd in all Subjects Hearts, was turn'd into that awe and dread as few thought themselves safe; which though it might have caus'd some apprehension in him, had he been capable thereof, yet without being troubled for any thing, he resolv'd to hold his way, and where occasion was, to punish severely: Therefore he gave order that Thomas Fitz-Gerald, Son to the Earl of Kildare, and five of his Uncles after a long detension in Prison, at this time should suffer death at Tyburn; who yet had he not hop'd for Pardon by the intercession of the Lord Grey, to whom he yielded himself, (as is formerly mention'd,) he would have died some other Death. All the race yet ended not so; for Gerald, younger Brother to Thomas Fitz-Gerald, being sought for, was packt up in a bundle of Clothes, and convey'd to his Friends in Ireland, and so to France, and from thence to the Low-Countries, in both which places being requir'd of our King, he did at length fly to Cardinal Pool in Italy, who being his Kinsman, and finding him a fit Instrument for his Purposes, kept, and cherish'd him, until he obtain'd in after-times, that he might be restor'd to his Country and Place.

This being done, our King devis'd certain Acts to pass in the Parliament of Ireland; being for the avoiding of all Bulls, Breves, Dispensations, &c. granted by the Pope; and that the People should use the English Tongue. That Marchers should dwell upon their March Lands: That certain Religious Houses there should be suppress'd: Against alliance with the Rebels; for establishing Succession; for the First-fruits and twentieth part of Spiritual Promotions; that those who took part with Kildare might be pardon'd, when they find for it, &c. of which more may be seen in the Irish Statutes.

This year at Hampton Court Prince Edward was born, October 12. 1537. who (to use Polydore's words) was Princeps natus ad Imperium; yet was not the happiness entire; for Queen Jane, two days after her delivery, died, and was buried in the Quire at Windsor; whose loss much afflicted the King, as having found her always Discreet, Humble, and Loyal; for which reason also, he was not so forward to match again. Inasmuch that notwithstanding some good offers made him, he continu'd a Widower more than two years; which in his declining Age and Corpulence (for he grew now very unweildy) was a long space. The Prince yet not being above six days old, was made Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester: Sir Edward Seymor also, Brother to the Queen, lately made Lord Beauchamp, was created Earl of Hertford. And Sir William Fitz-Williams (made Admiral of England lately) Earl of Southampton. And in March following Sir William Paulet, Treasurer of the Kings House, was made Lord St. John; and Sir John Russel Comptroller, Lord Russel.

And now (as I find by our Records) Queen Margaret hearing of this Princes Birth, Congratulates it, and together complains of some unkindness in her Son, desiring she might end her days (being now about forty-nine) in quietness; but if our King could give no remedy thereunto, it comforted her yet, that she understood how (upon the Death of the Lord Thomas Howard) her Daughter was at this time releas'd out of the Tower.

I shall conclude this year with a prodigious effect of Mount Aetna, the flames whereof lifting up a huge mass of burning Sulphur, by slow degrees, to a great height, sustain'd it there, till at length it scatter'd over all the Country, and kill'd (as my Author Sandoval hath it) innumerable Men and Beasts.

In March 1538, the Protestants meeting at Brunswick, our King sent thither Christopher Mount, with Instructions, First, To see who were the Confederates. Secondly, Whether their League was for General Defence, or limited to matter of Religion only. Thirdly, To require a final Answer, whether they would send the great Legation with Melancthon, as they had promised. But they desiring King Henry should first declare what Points he disliked in their Confession, lest the Ambassador should after so great expecta-

And as to the other two Articles, they declared, that their League was only in the Cause of Religion, and sent the Names of their Confederates, being (as the Record shews) twenty six Cities and twenty four Princes; among whom the King of Denmark was newly admitted. Nevertheless, to ripen matters for a further Treaty, they gave Commission to their Agents now sent (being Francis Burgrat, and two other Men not unlearned) to dispute with the English Divines about Religion, which they did, till being recall'd home, they craved dismissal of the King, leaving with them their Remonstrance touching divers Abuses in England: As, I. The Administrations of the Eucharist in one kind only. II. Private Mass. III. Celebration of Priests. Against which they urged Scripture, and the ancient Fathers; adding, that their Princes would never admit the same; and that it belongs to his Majesty to restore the Purity of Religion, as did the Kings, David, Josias, Jehoshaphat, Ezekias, &c. This, though commended to the King and Cromwel by Archbishop Cranmer, was yet opposed by divers others, and particularly by Cuthbert Bishop of Duresme, (who extracted the said Declaration for the King, and gave him Arguments against it.) So that the King for all Answer to the said Orators, defended the Points they would have reformed. Infomuch, that they return'd unsatisfy'd and frustrate. King Henry the while proceeding in his own Reformation, as hoping the Protestants in Germany would be drawn to him. And because he had been often importuned to authorize a Translation of the Bible, He committed the Care thereof to Cromwel, and the Printing to Richard Grafton; who pretending the want of good Paper here, got our King's and Francis's License to print it at Paris, both in Latin and English, in a large Volume: Which therefore by Cromwel the Vicegerent's Injunctions this Year (1538) was to be set in every Church for the People to read; yet so, as the King by Proclamation gave them to understand, that this was not his Duty, but his Goodness and Liberality to them; who therefore should use it moderately, for the increase of Virtue, not of Strife. And therefore no Man should read it aloud to disturb the Priest while he sang Mass, nor presume to expound doubtful places without advice from the Learned.

The King having Issue Male, proceeded more confidently in his Designs: And because he knew that the pretended and false Miracles of Priests had seduced many ignorant People to a superstitious Obedience to the Romish See, and Reverence of Monasteries, he resolv'd to detect them, at least, as many as he could; for divers were so cunningly represented, as they had kept their Credit for some Ages; the manner of these times being, if a Man were restor'd to his Health upon a Pilgrimage, or obtain'd any thing he desir'd upon a Vow to some Saint, never to study other Cause.

And here out of our Records I shall mention some of the Images and Relicks to which the Pilgrimages of these times brought Devotion and Offerings; as our Lady's Girdle, shew'd in eleven several places, and her Milk in eight; the Bell of St. Guthlac, and the Felt of St. Thomas of Lancaster, both Remedies for the Head-ach; the Pen-knife and Boots of St. Thomas of Canterbury, and a piece of his Shirt, much reverenc'd by great-belly'd Women; the Coals that roasted St. Lawrence; two or three Heads of St. Ursula; Malchus's Ear; and the paring of St. Edmond's Nails; the Image of an Angel with one Wing, which brought hither the Spear's Head that pierc'd Christ's Side; an Image of our Lady with a Taper in her Hand, which burnt nine Years together without wadding, till one forswearing himself thereon, it went out; and was now found to be but a piece of Wood; our Lady of Worcester, from which certain Veils and Dressings being taken, there appear'd the Statue of a Bishop ten Foot high. These and others were now brought forth, and with great ostentation shew'd to the People; among which were two notable Trumperies I cannot omit; one was the Rood of Grace at Boxley in Kent, which being made with divers Vices to turn the Eyes and move the Lips, was shew'd publicly at Pauls Cross by John Bishop of Rochester, and there broken and pull'd in pieces. The other was at Hales in Gloucestershire, where the Blood of Jesus Christ brought from Jerusalem, being kept (as was affirmed) for divers Ages, had drawn many great Offerings to it from remote places: And it was said to have this Property, That if a Man were in mortal Sin, and not absolved, he could not see it; otherwise, very well: Therefore every Man that came to behold this Miracle, confess'd himself first to a Priest there, and then offering something to the Altar, was directed to a Chappel where the Relick was shew'd; the Priest who confess'd him (in the mean while) retiring himself to the back part of the said Chappel, and putting forth upon the Altar a Cabinet or Tabernacle of Crystal, which being thick on the one side, that nothing could be seen thorow it, but on the other side thin and transparent, they used diversly: For if a rich and devout Man enter'd, they would shew the thick side, till he had paid for as many Masses, and given as large Alms as they thought fit; after which (to his great Joy) they permitted him to see the thin side, and the Blood. Which yet (as my Author, a Clerk of the Council to Edward VI. and living in those times, affirms) was proved to be the Blood of a Duck every week renew'd by two Priests, who kept the Secret betwixt them. Besides which, the Images of our Lady of Walsingham, of Ipswich, of Penrife, of Iffington, and St. John of Osulston (called otherwise Mr. John Shorne) who was said to shut up the Devil in a Boot; and divers others were publicly burnt: Infomuch, that a huge Image call'd Darvel Gardner being fetch'd out of Wales serv'd to burn Frier Forrest, (Condemn'd for counselling People in Confession not to believe the King's Supremacy) and to elude I know not what old blind Prophecy.

And by this means the Monasteries grew infamous where most of these Images were kept, and divers were undeceived, who before held a reverend Opinion of these pretended Relicks and Miracles; yet, as this way, there was danger left the People should not believe those Miracles which the Church had delivered for true, the King held a hand over his Subjects, and found means to humble them; for they were taught, that howsoever the Miracles of those later times proved counterfeit and false, yet that God hath done, and can again do Miracles, when it is for his Glory and Service; and that it did not repugn to Faith, that for honouring the Memory of his Saints, he permitted them sometimes, where the People were not withdrawn thereby from his Worship, to the Worship of the Creature.

Upon the Cessation of Arms betwixt the Emperor and French King formerly mention'd, the Pope endeavour'd a further Peace and good Correspondence, as thinking them capable both of making War with the Turk, and revenging his Quarrel on our King, against whom he was much

But there are many Difficulties in procuring two potent Princes to concur in the same Enterprize, when it was for nothing else, but that they can never agree who should have the Advantage of it. Nevertheless, both of them were disaffected to our King at this time, not yet so much for their particular Interests, as that his overthrowing of Religious Houses, and many rigorous Executions of his Subjects, had given ill impressions of him; which our King understanding, procures to hold his Treaty with Francis. And therefore recalling from Spain Edmond Bonner elect Bishop of Hereford, and his Ambassador then with the Emperor, he employ'd him in France in the place of Stephen Gardiner, who had soured all things; since, being one who both disliked the King's late Proceedings, and secretly favour'd the Emperor, he did his Master little service in that Court. Bonner being now come, was roughly received by Gardiner, and coldly by the French King (as I find by an Original;) yet he obtained at first that the Old and New Testament in English might be printed at Paris in the largest Volume, whereof yet Complaint being made by the Clergy there, the Press was stay'd, and as much as was already printed, publickly burnt, save some few Copies, that being gotten for Waste-paper, were recover'd and sent into England, whither also the Printers themselves follow'd shortly after, and finished their Work. Howbeit as Bonner had in his other Affairs here but little satisfaction, he was repeal'd at last on this occasion; being commanded by our King to deliver a high Message, concerning his Pension, now four Years detain'd, as also touching a Fugitive and Traitor, who was receiv'd and favour'd by Francis, he utter'd it in so haughty a manner (as was thought) that Francis return'd both to our King and him some harsh Language; nevertheless, as he fear'd lest it should cause War, he sent to England an express Messenger both to interpret and excuse himself, and to desire Bonner might be recall'd; which the King did, (as thinking him henceforth an unuseful Servant in that place) yet so as he forgot not to bestow the Bishoprick of London on him for his Reward, and to employ him to the Emperor afterwards. But as Francis (having about this time made a ten Years Truce with the Emperor, as shall be told hereafter, and a Treaty with Scotland) talked louder than before; so the Lady Regent in the Low-Countries, permitting divers Exactions on our Merchants, shew'd disaffection to our State, without that our King in his present condition knew well how to repair himself, since being resolv'd to take order about his Home-busineses not yet fully settled, he thought of Foreign Affairs no otherwise, than to attend the occasion, and confederate himself where it might be for his best Advantage. For which at last divers Overtures were made. The first it seems came from the Emperor, whose Ambassador here signified to Cromwel Lord Privy-Seal his Master's Desire, that a Match might be had betwixt our King and Christiana the Dutches of Milan, being a beautiful Lady, and at that present lately come into the Low-Countries. Cromwel answer'd, that he would first see her Picture, and then speak to the King; which being granted, one Hans Holin (or Holbin I believe) being the King's Servant, was sent over, and in three hours space (as John Hutton our Agent there hath it) shew'd what a Master he was in his Science. Our King hereupon seem'd inclinable, giving charge to Hutton to treat of the business. But the Lady Regent (though said to have sufficient Power) referr'd all to the Emperor, who having appointed an Interview with Francis, was so slow in returning an Answer, that our King understood it as a delay, and therefore neglected the business a while: And he had reason; for a Treaty was now formed betwixt Francis and the Emperor, for his Son the Duke of Orleans and her, and the place nominated at Comptean, where Francis (now return'd from the Interview, whereof hereafter) met Queen Mary Regent of Flanders: Whereof our King being advertis'd, sent some privately thither, to inform him of that which pass'd; but Milan being refused as Dowry to the Duke, the Treaty was suspended. This made our King proceed again, employing Thomas Wriothesly, and some others, to the Lady Regent for this purpose; but this Treaty produced others, so that a Match was propos'd betwixt Don Lewis of Portugal and our Princess Mary, in the terms she then was, excluded by Act of Parliament from all Claim to the Succession, except such as the King shall give her: As also a strict Confederation and Amity. The Conditions our King requir'd with the Dutches of Milan were great; for though she was but the second Daughter of Denmark, Dorothea the elder being married to Frederick Count Palatine of the Rhine, and Duke of Bavier, yet he demanded with her the whole Kingdom of Denmark, (there being no Issue Male now alive of Christiern II.) desiring for this purpose the Emperor's assistance, which also the Emperor seem'd to promise, as offering to treat with Duke Frederick about renouncing his Title to it; and the rather, that he was more suspected at this time in the German Affairs, than that the Emperor desir'd to greaten him, by such an accession. And with Don Louis the Emperor offer'd Milan, when the King would shew how to defend it, and give only a Dowry of three hundred thousand, or two hundred thousand Crowns; promising further, if the French King, upon this occasion, deny'd the Pension usually paid our King, to take no Peace with him till he had paid it; he offer'd also to endeavour a Reconciliation with the Pope, if our King so pleased. Nevertheless, divers Jealousies and Cavils arising (especially after the Interview) betwixt the Emperor and Francis, (whereof presently) the Treaty, though continuing, went on but coldly; the Lady Regent objecting sometimes that our King treated of a Match in France with the Daughter of Guise; another while saying, that in regard of the Dutches's nearness of Blood to the late Queen Katharine, there needed a Dispensation from the Pope, which she knew the King would hardly accept; but these Answers being taken as illusory, the Treaty at last not only broke off, but a cruel War was intimated betwixt the Emperor and our King; especially after he heard of the Treaty betwixt him and the Lady Anne of Cleves, which follow'd. But Francis omitted not likewise to make his Propositions, offering our King what Lady he pleased in his Country, which yet came to nothing, as will appear hereafter; neither ought their Motions of Alliance to seem strange, both as there were ever Causes of Jealousy betwixt these great Princes, and as they knew well, our King had settled his Affairs at home.

While things pass thus, the Truce expiring in February betwixt the French King and Emperor, the Pope obtain'd yet that it should be continued for six Months; hoping in the interim to conclude a Peace; whereunto as his good Intentions might concur, so his particular Interests wanted not; he employing the Cardinal Carpi to the Emperor, and Cardinal Jacobaccio to the French King for concluding two Matches for his Family; one betwixt his Grand-child Ottavio Farnese and Margaritha Relict of the Duke of Florence, natural Daughter of the Emperor: The other betwixt Victoria Farnese 1538. Farnese and Antoine de Bourbon Duke of Vendosme; and for bringing them to an Interview, at which himself would be present. All which was accorded, and the time and place of meeting appointed at Nizza about the beginning of June, 1538. where they all came; but so as the Emperor being lodg'd in Villa-Franca, and the French King in Villa-Nova, they neither saw one another in their several Courts, nor at the Pope's at Nizza: Infomuch, that notwithstanding the Pope's solicitation, their mutual Jealousies of the Pope's Affection, the number of their Attendants not to be regulated as long as third Persons interven'd, their late Defies, and greatness of Business to be determin'd betwixt them, permitted no safe terms of meeting. Nevertheless, the Pope (after he had in vain desir'd them to send some Bishops to the Council now at Vicenza) concluded a Truce betwixt them for ten Years, and so the Meeting dissolv'd. The Pope presently recalling his Legates from Vicenza, and deferring the Council till Easter the next Year.

June 18. And now the Emperor and Francis being near each other, and, for the rest, Princes of so great Courage, as they heard with some Indignation the Difficulties their Counsellors had represented about an Interview, resolv'd betwixt themselves to meet. Francis sent an Invitation to him to repose at Aiguemortes and Marseilles, in his way to Spain; and Charles accepted it; who coming thereupon near the Shore, Francis, attended with Montmorency (now Constable) and few others, without all difficulty pass'd in a Shallop to the Emperor's Galley; and after an hour's stay, and some Complements in French (which Language both spake) Francis return'd to Land. And now the Emperor was pensative and doubtful whether he should go on shore; many of his Council oppos'd it; but the Duke of Alva said generously, He should go; which Counsel the Emperor follow'd: And thereupon landing, the French King and his Queen, the Dauphine, and a huge Train, receiv'd him with demonstration of Joy: And two Meals they did eat together, at which the Dutcheff of Estampes (much regarded by Francis) was present. But the next Day after, (being the sixteenth of July) rich Gifts having pass'd on both sides, the Emperor departed for Spain.

July 15. Emperor and French King have an Interview. And now it was disputed at Rome, Whether these two Princes should join in a War against the Turk, or bring our King to reason? The former took place; the Turk, as being much animated against the Christians, having made great Preparatives: And when he had not, our King being a Person with whom they would not easily have fought in the Pope's Quarrel: Which also is the more probable, for that Francis would not so much as concur with him in a War against the Turk, though solicited by the Pope, Emperor and Venetians, no more than our King: Tho' (as I find by our Records) intreated by the said Venetians, as having a particular War with the Turk at this time in Morea and Sclavonia; so that they above-named only join'd, according to a League made at Rome, Feb. 8. the Pope furnishing thirty six Gallies, the Emperor eighty two, and the Venetians as many; who yet being led by Andrea Doria, and coming to fight with the Turkish Fleet of 130 Vessels, under Barbarossa, were on the Coast of Epiro, towards Night, September 24. defeated; when such a huge Tempest of Thunder and Lightning arose, as scatter'd them every way: Yet few Days after they took from the Turk Castel Novo, a Fort in the Gulf of Cararo, and leaving a Garrison there, return'd.

All which Engagements of War, though in effect they were so many diversions of it from us, could not secure our King from suspicion either of Treachery at home, or Invasion from abroad. 1538. Therefore he took especial Care of the Sea-Coasts, and particularly had an eye to the Actions of those who might stir in favour of Cardinal Pool; who being encouraged by the Pope, had no little Intelligence from our Kingdom. Notwithstanding all which Attention, divers Messages pass'd betwixt the said Cardinal and his Friends and Kindred; which cost some of them their lives not long after.

And now the King knowing that while any superstitious Worship reigned here, the Fryers and Priests would oppose his Reformation, especially as long as such were accounted Saints who had resisted their Prince, resolv'd, after he had burn'd so many Images, to burn the Bones of Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury in the time of Henry II. (though others mention not the burning; and one living in those times, affirms only, that his Bones were scatter'd amongst so many dead Men's, that they could not be found again without some great Miracle.) Together with which, our King seiz'd on that immense Treasure and Jewels which were offer'd to his Shrine; there being few since Henry the Second's time which pass'd to Canterbury, that did not both visit his Tomb, and bring rich Presents to it. Among which, there being one Stone eminent, which it was said, Louis the Seventh coming hither on Pilgrimage from France, Anno Dom. 1179. bestow'd; our King wore it in a Ring afterwards. For which reasons, as also for being so great an Example of Contumacy against his King, he was (as Sanders hath it) constrain'd Causam iterum ad Tribunal dicere; that is to say, his Life and Actions being examin'd, it was declar'd by our King that he deserv'd no Canonization; and prov'd besides, that the Skull which the People did so much venerate (and which was now burnt as an Imposture) was not his own, (it, together with his Bones, being found in his Tomb) and scatter'd, as aforesaid) and that there was Forgery in divers Miracles there exhibited; with which yet our King being not content, caus'd his Name to be raz'd out of the Kalendar, and forbid the keeping of his Holiday. But that it may appear what a kind of Saint this Man was, I will repeat some part of his Life; not out of his Legend, or indeed Polidore Virgil, who most fabulously affirms, that certain Men of Kent for cutting of Becket's Horse Tail, their Progeny ever after, as long as any of them remain'd, had Tails like Beasts; but out of a Book of the said Clerk of the Council, formerly mention'd, leaving to every Man yet the choice of believing what relation he pleaseth.

This Man (as my Author hath it) being born of an English Merchant, and a Woman of Barbary, having been brought up in Learning, and promoted to the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, contested with King Henry II. for the Pope's Authority: Infomuch, that in his Pontificalibus, with his Mitre upon his Head, and gilt Cross born before him, he publicly excommunicated all those who oppos'd the Church; wherewith the King being offended, Becket fled to the Pope, who cherish'd him so much, as in contemplation of him, he excommunicated the King and Kingdom; so that for about four Year's space, neither Mass, nor other Publick Service was used in the Church. But by the Intercession of the French King, Becket and the Mass being restor'd, and our King and Kingdom absolv'd, all things seem'd quiet, till he began new Quarrels: At which the King being displeased, said, If he had faithful Servants, he should not be so wronged; which some Gentlemen that served him hearing, went to Canterbury, and taking their time, upon some ill 1538. ill Language given, kill'd him in the Cloister of his Cathedral Church, and so fled. Whereupon the Monks shut their Gates, and persuaded the People that the Bells rung of themselves; nor content herewith, they cast a certain Composition into a Well adjoining, and made the People believe that it appeared bloody by Miracle, for that holy Martyr, which at last obtain'd such credit, that Henry II. came in Person, together with Louis of France, to visit that holy place, and give many rich Possessions to the Monastery; for further testimony of his favour to them, refusing ever to receive again, or pardon the Murderers; yet these Wonders ended at last, for our King on some occasion coming to Canterbury, discovered the Fraud of the Well, and abolished the Miracles.

Pope ex-communicates K. Henry in Flanders, Scotland, and France. Dec. 17. But what Pretext soever our King had to proceed thus with Becket, nothing was taken to be a greater Cruelty and Rapine: Infomuch, that upon News hereof, the Pope deferred no longer to publish his Bull of Excommunication (formerly decreed 1535) against our King; wherein he also mentions this Fact with much Horror and Detestation; sending also his Agents abroad with the said Bull, who set it up in divers places of Flanders, France and Scotland; being such a Bull (saith the Writer of the Council of Trent) as neither his Predecessors left him Example for, or his Successors ever imitated. But the Pope gain'd little hereby; for all his Rigours were but so many Incentives to King Henry to oppose him; therefore as he had sent Publick Protestations every where against the Council to be assembled at Vicenza, affirming the same Difficulties would be about holding of it there, which must have been at Mantua; so having made way by the discovery of the former Impositions, he suppress'd more Monasteries, and every day more and more divested the Clergy of their former Authority. Howbeit, on the other side, he oppos'd all Reformation but his own; as appears both by burning two Dutch Anabaptists, and by a Dispute he publickly held in Westminster-Hall, with one John Nichelson alias Lambert, a Priest; against whom he maintained the Presence of Christ in the Sacrament, after the manner he set down in his Articles; concluding, that he should have mercy if he recanted; otherwise, that he should be burnt. But Lambert despising Mercy on those terms, the Sentence was executed. So deep a tincture doth Religion give to the Soul, as being once thoroughly enter'd, nothing afterward can either change or efface it.

Nov. 19. Two Dutch Anabaptists and one Popish Priest executed. Nov. 22. The King having thus made it appear, that howsoever he rejected the Papal Authority, he concurred not every where with the Reformers, thought he might with more reason now confront the Report which Cardinal Pool and his Friends had rais'd, that he had wholly altered his Religion. In which number, because Henry Courtney Marquis of Exeter (the King's Cousin-german, as being Son of Katharine, Daughter to Edward IV.) and Henry Pool Lord Montacute, and Sir Edward Nevil Brother to the Lord Abergavenny, and Sir Jeffery Pool Knight, were eminent; he took occasion (upon secret Information given by Sir Jeffery) to cause them to be indicted, for devising to maintain, promote, and advance one Reginald Pool late Dean of Exeter, Enemy to the King, beyond the Seas, and to deprive the King; upon which the two Lords, before Thomas Lord Audley (for the present sitting, as his High Steward of England) were found guilty: Not long after which, Sir Edward Nevel, Sir Jeffery Pool, two Priests, and a Mariner, were arraign'd, and found guilty also, and Judgment given accordingly. The two Lords and Nevil were beheaded, the two Priests and Mariner hang'd and quarter'd at Tyburn, and Sir Jeffery pardon'd: Sir Nicholas Carew also (Knight of the Garter, and Master of the Horse to the King) for being of Council with the said Marquis, was beheaded. The particular Offences yet of these great Persons are not so fully made known to me, that I can say much. Only I find among our Records that Thomas Wriothesley Secretary (then at Brussels) writing of their apprehension to Sir Thomas Wyatt (his Highness's Ambassador in Spain) said, that the Accusations were great, and duly proved. And in another place I read that they sent the Cardinal Money.

I find little more of this Year for our parts, save that notwithstanding all these Severities, neither was one Combesby, Groom of the King's Chamber, deterr'd from counterfeiting the King's Seal Manuel; nor one Clifford from counterfeiting his Privy Signet; both which therefore suffer'd death.

The Emperor now in Spain, among his home-busineses, thought none more requisite, than to take order for Money: Therefore he assembled at Toledo a Cortes or Parliament of both States; so that the Grandees of Castilla and Leon on the one side, and Cardinal of Toledo and Clergy on the other, did enter into it: Where the Emperor's Necessities being represented by occasion of his late Wars, it was declared, That neither his ordinary Revenues, nor the Indies, nor the Cruzades, Tenths and other Helps granted by the Pope, did suffice to keep him out of debt. Wherefore the Emperor desir'd, that at their Charge all his Estate and Dominions every where might be preserv'd and secur'd both by Sea and Land; so as he might have the ordinary Rent of Castilla and the Indies for paying his Debts, and spending Money. The Clergy hereupon agreed, That their most ready and equal way for supplying the Emperor's Wants, was to grant a Sisa or Tax for a certain time, with a limitation to what it should extend; since less Corruption and Extortion would follow this way than any other: Only they desir'd the Emperor, That he should procure a License and Commandment from his Holiness to this purpose. But the Grandees and Nobles, who had immediate Power in their hands to consent unto the Emperor's Demand, would yet resolve nothing suddenly in their own Name or the Peoples, nor before they had committed the Business to twelve elect Persons among them; among which the Condestable being chief, spake much against Impositions; desiring rather to supply the Emperor some other way: And that they might confer with the Burgeses or Procuradors of the chief Cities hereof; beseeching his Majesty withal, that he would stay at home and study Peace, as having made eighteen Years of continual War both by Sea and Land: Which Answer being brought the Emperor, it was reply'd on his part, that he demanded Money, and not Advice. Hereupon, certain amongst them propos'd to lay Imposition upon Commodities exported; but the rest agreed not. Whereupon the Cardinal of Toledo came and told them in his Majesty's Name, That he assembled them to the intent he might communicate his own and his Kingdom's Necessities; it seeming reasonable, that as they were general, so should the Remedy be: But by as much as is done, he conceiveth there is no cause to detain you any longer, and therefore gives you leave to depart.

The Cortes being thus dissolv'd, the Emperor upon occasion, told the Conestable he had done ill, and deserv'd to be thrown out of a Corredor or open Gallery, where they were: To which he answer'd, of Castilla, Your Majesty will please to advise; for though I am little, Charles V.

1539. little, I weigh much. But it seems the Emperor spake neither in earnest, nor the Constable as one that resented; so that nothing follow'd. Howsoever, the Grantees and Nobles of Spain behav'd themselves insolently at this time to the Emperor; who having commanded a Just or Tourney, wherein all the principal Persons were, to meet: It happen'd as they rode in their Equipage and Order to the place, an Alguazil strook the Duke of Infantados Horse, on some occasion; whereupon the Duke turning about, demanded, Do you know me? And the Alguazil saying, yea: He with his Sword cut him on his Head; who with blood about his Ears, coming to the Emperor (then on Horse-back,) incens'd him so much, as he sent presently to apprehend the Duke; But the Constable being present, said to the Officer, you have no Authority, as long as I am in place; and so forc'd him thence. The Emperor now much offended, that all these Accevements were done in his presence, sends another Officer to apprehend the Duke; at which the Grantees and others were so displeas'd, that they all rode away in a Troop; so that the Emperor having few or none to attend him in this great Solemnity, was forc'd to desist and return; both to his own great Scandal, and those who came to be Spectators. But the Emperor found means afterwards, to let them know how sensible he was of this Contempt.

The German Protestants, this while, being solicited for Aid against the Turk, and denying it, unless the Emperor first granted them such a solid and intire Peace in the cause of Religion, as might comprehend both the present and future Confederates; the adverse Party enter'd a Counter-league to that of Smalcald, calling it Holy, and stipulating mutual Defence, if they were molested for the Roman Religion. The Emperor notwithstanding giving Commission to Heldus and others, to treat with the said Protestants of an Accommodation; which yet took no effect, though there were a meeting held at Francfort, to this purpose. Howsoever, our King omitted not to send his Agents (Christopher Mount and Thomas Paynel) thither, shewing, he took it ill, that they treated of a Pacification without his knowledge, desiring to understand the Conditions thereof, and whether they intended to be constant to their profess'd Doctrine: To which, Burgart and others in their Name, April 23. coming to England, brought Instructions to this effect, that their manifold Troubles suffer'd them not hitherto to signify the said Pacification, which yet was not likely to take effect, no Conditions being so much as propos'd. Neither would they accept any contrary to the Augustane Confession; so that there needed be no doubt of their Constancy: But they are inform'd, that his Majesty had set forth a Proclamation, injoyning rigidly and under heavy Censures, those Points which the last year their Ambassadors desir'd as Abuses might be reform'd; which unless his Majesty pleas'd to mitigate, they could determine nothing of the Legation of Learned Men, which he expected. For we have, say they, disputed enough already, and the King is not ignorant of our Opinions touching Private Mass, Communion in one kind, and Celibate of Priests. And unless we understood that our Doctrine herein were prescrib'd by God, we would not undergo the dangers we do for maintenance thereof: Neither let the King imagine, that we will now either deny the said Doctrines, or send any of our Divines into England, to give approbation to the contrary. Together with which, Philip Melancthon sent a Letter to the King (superscrib'd Serm. &c. Capiti Anglicæ Ec- clesiæ, post Christum Supremo.) exhorting him to perfect the Reformation begun, and not hearken to those who would hinder it, by exacting too severely Ceremonies and things indifferent; wherefore, he desires his Majesty to mitigate the late Proclamation. What Answer our King gave to this, doth not appear to me: But the King was so far from condescending thereunto, that he obtain'd a Confirmation of the said Articles in the next Parliament, under greater Penalties, as shall appear in its place. In the mean time he consulted to strengthen himself at home, by enriching his Treasury. Therefore, having formerly gotten the consent of his Parliament, for dissolving all Religious Houses under 200 l. yearly, he did now attempt the rest; so that though divers of the Visitors had heretofore petition'd, that some might be spar'd, both for the virtue of the Persons in them, and the benefit of the Country (the Poor receiving thence relief, and the richer sort good education for their Children;) and though Latimer mention'd, that some two or three might be left in every Shire for pious uses, Cromwel yet (by the Kings Permission) invaded all; while betwixt Threats, Gifts, Persuasions, Promises, and whatsoever might make Man obnoxious, he obtain'd of the Abbats, Priors, Abbesses, &c. that their Houses might be given up. Among which, those that offer'd their Monasteries freely, got best Conditions of the King; for if they stood upon their Right, the Oath of Supremacy, and some other Statutes and Injunctions brought them in danger, or their Crimes at least made them guilty of the Law; which also was quickly executed. And particularly on the Abbats of Gloucestrebury, Colchester, and Reading, who more than any else resisted.

In conclusion, the Title made to these, seems not to be grounded upon a grant by Statute, or claim of Right, but was some voluntary Surrender, Purchase, or Forfeiture. Howbeit, the King thought fit to have this proceeding presently confirm'd by Act of Parliament: Therefore by his Writs he summon'd it to begin April 28. 1539. In the mean while, rumours were every where dispers'd, that Cardinal Pool labour'd with divers Princes, to procure Forces against the Kingdom, and that an Invasion was threatned. And this again seem'd more credible, in that the Truce concluded between the Emperor and the French King was generally known, and that neither of them wanted pretext to bring an Army hither. This also was seconded by a sudden journey of the King unto the Sea-coast; into divers parts whereof he had formerly sent sundry Nobles and expert Persons to visit the Ports, and places of Danger, who fail'd not for their discharge upon all event, to affirm the peril in each place so great, as one would have thought every place had needed Fortification; besides he caus'd his Navy forthwith to be in a readiness, and Musters to be taken over all the Kingdom. All which preparatives being made against a danger which was believ'd imminent, seem'd so to excuse the King suppressing of Abbies, as the People (willing to spare their own Purfes) began to suffer it easily; especially when they saw order taken for building divers Forts and Bulwarks upon the Sea-coast; many, if not most of these we have at this day, being thought not so exact as the modern, yet of his raising. And that they suspected the discontented Religious Orders (sooner than any else) would assist an Enemy. But if the reasons of these proceedings were held by some as current, by others they were taken to be no more than Palliation, and by the Clergy but Rapine, who divulg'd beyond Seas the miserable ruines of themselves, 645 Monasteries suppressed. Camb. Brit.

The number of Monasteries first and last suppress'd in England and Wales were (as Cambden accounts them) six hundred forty five; whereof these had voices among the Peers: The Abbat of St. Albans (being as I take it) declar'd the first Abbey of England (whether in favour of Pope Adrian IV. his Father, call'd Breakpear, who upon his Wives death rendred himself a Monk there, or S. Alban himself Protomartyr of England) St. Peters in Westminster, S. Edmondsbury, S. Bennets of Holm, Bredsey, Shrewsbury, Crowland, Abingdon, Evesham, Gloucester, Ramsey, S. Maries in York, Tewsbury, Reading, Battail, Winchcombe, Hyde by Winchester, Cirencester, Waltham, Malmesbury, Thorney, S. Augustine in Canterbury, Selby, Peterborough, S. Johns in Colchester, Coventry, Tawestock.

9. Colledges demolished. Spect. Chantries 3174. Hospitals 110. in value 161100 l.

Of Colledges were demolish'd in divers Shires, ninety. Of Chantries, and fire-Chappels, 2374. And Hospitals 110. The yearly value of all which were, as I find it cast up, 161100 l. being above a third part of all our Spiritual Revenues; besides the Money made of the present stock of Cattel and Corn, of the Timber, Lead, Bells, &c. and lastly, but chiefly, of the Plate and Church-Ornaments; which I find not valued, but may be conjectured by that one Monastery of S. Edmondsbury, whence was taken (as our Records shew) five thousand Marks of Gold and Silver, besides divers Stones of great value. All which being by some openly call'd Rapine, and Sacrilege, I will no way excuse: Though I may say truly, that notwithstanding so many Religious Houses were destroy'd, there are yet in every kind (the suppress'd Abbies and Chantries only excepted) left standing so many, as give no little increase to Learning, splendor to Religion, and testimony of Charity to the Poor. So that although I cannot but pity the ruine of so many pious Foundations, as affording a singular conveniency to those who desir'd to retire to a holy, private, and contemplative Life, when abuses were taken away; yet I have thought fit to mention these Particulars, that it may appear to foreign Nations, we are not destitute of many Monuments of Devotion: Of which also our King had such regard, that he did not employ all the profits arising from the aforesaid Dissolutions, on Fortifications or the like; for he not only augmented the number of the Colledges and Professors in his Universities, but erected (as he had promis'd) out of the Revenues gotten hereby, divers new Bishopricks; whereof one at Westminster, one at Oxford, one at Peterborough, one at Bristol, one at Chester, and one at Gloucester; all remaining at this day, save that of Westminster, which being revok'd to its first Institution by Queen Mary, and Benedictines plac'd in it, was by Queen Elizabeth afterward converted to a Collegiate Church, and a School for the teaching and maintenance of young Scholars: Besides, many of the ancient Cathedral Churches formerly possess'd by Monks only, were now supplied with Canons, and some new ones erected and endow'd; the Revenues allotted by the King to those new Bishopricks and Cathedrals amounting to about 8000 l. per Annum. So that Religion seem'd not so much to suffer hereby, as some of the Clergy of those times and ours would have it believ'd: Our Kingdom in the mean while having (as Cromwell projected it) instead of divers supernumerary and idle Persons, Men fit for Employment, either in War or Peace, maintain'd at the cost of the aforesaid Abbies and Chantries: So that the Desolations (appearing in their stately Foundations at this day) are by our Politicks thought amply recompenc'd. Besides, the King in the demolishing of them, had so tender a care of Learning, that he not only preferr'd divers able Persons which he found there, but took special care to preserve the choicest Books of their well-furnish'd Libraries: Wherein I find John Leland (a curious searcher of Antiquities) was employ'd. But hereof enough, since I do not intend to exceed the terms of an Historian, and therefore shall come now to the Parliament, which being compos'd of Persons well-affected to the Kings Service, (as his manner was always with great industry to procure such,) these Statutes among others were enacted:

Six new Bishopricks erected.

That Religious Persons being put at liberty, might purchase, sue, and be su'd; but not claim any Inheritance, as descending on them: And that if they had made a vow of Chastity after one and twenty, they should not marry. But this enabling them not to buy, they thought no sufficient amends for the loss of their present Maintenance.

That the King by the advice of his Council, or the more part of them, might set forth Proclamations under such penalties and pains as to him or them shall seem necessary, which should be observ'd as though they were made by Act of Parliament: But that this should not be prejudicial to any Persons Inheritances, Offices, Liberties, Goods, Chattels or Life, &c. But this was repeal'd 1 Edw. 6. 12.

That the King might nominate such number of Bishops, Sees for Bishops, Cathedral Churches, and endow them with such Possessions, as he will. [Which, though repeal'd 1 & 2 Phil. & Mar. yet order was taken therein again 8 Eliz. 1.]

It was declar'd also how Lords in the Parliament should be plac'd.

That Leases made of Manors belonging to Monasteries dissolv'd, or to be dissolv'd, and assur'd to the King, should take effect: Wherein is express'd, that the King should hold, possess, and enjoy to him, his Heirs and Successors for ever, all Monasteries, Abbacies, Priories, Nunneries, Colledges, Hospitals, Houses of Friars, or other Religious and Ecclesiastical Houses and Places, which since the fourth of February 27 Hen. 8. have been dissolv'd, suppress'd, renounc'd, relinquish'd, forfeited, given up, or by any other means come to his Highness; or which shall be dissolv'd, &c. As also all Mannors, Lordships, Lands, Tenements, Rights, Liberties, &c. belonging to them. All which (except such as came by attainder of Treason) should be under survey and governance of the Kings Court of Augmentation of the Revenues of the Crown. Other Mens Titles yet sav'd.

It was also particularly enacted, that whereas Thomas Duke of Norfolk by the Kings assent had purchased of one William Flatbury, late Abbat of the Monastery of Sipton in Suffolk, the said Monastery, with all, &c. And whereas George Lord Cobham had likewise purchas'd the Colledge or Chantry of Cobham in Kent, it was enacted, that the Act above-written should not be prejudicial to the said Duke, or Lord Cobham. Whereby it appears, the Kings intention was to unite all the Abby Lands, &c. to the Crown, save these so specified.

The Six Articles, call'd by some the Bloody Statute, were also enacted this Parliament: Being, 1539. by Act of Parliament.

I. If

I. If any Person by Word, Writing, Printing, Cyphering, or any otherwise, do Preach, Teach, Dispute, or hold Opinion, that in the blessed Sacrament of the Altar, under form of Bread and Wine (after the Consecration thereof) there is not present really the natural Body and Blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, conceived of the Virgin Mary; Or that after the said Consecration there remaineth any substance of Bread and Wine, or any other substance but the substance of Christ, God and Man; or that in the Flesh under form of Bread, is not the very Blood of Christ; or that with the Blood, under the form of Wine, is not the very Flesh of Christ, as well apart, as though they were both together; or affirm the said Sacrament to be of other substance than is aforesaid, or deprave the said blessed Sacrament: Then he shall be adjudg'd an Heretick, and suffer death by burning, and shall forfeit to the King all Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, Goods, and Chattels, as in case of High-Treason.

II. And if any Person preach in any Sermon, or Collation openly made, or teach in any common School or Congregation, or obstinately affirm or defend, that the Communion of the blessed Sacrament in both kinds is necessary for the health of Mans Soul, or ought or should be ministr'd in both kinds, or that it is necessary to be receiv'd by any Person, other than Priest, being at Mass, and Consecrating the same.

III. Or that any Man, after the order of Priesthood receiv'd, may marry, or contract Matrimony.

IV. Or that any Man or Woman which advisedly hath Vow'd or Profess'd, or should Vow or Profess Chastity or Widowhood, may marry or contract Marriage.

V. Or that private Masses be not lawful, or not laudable, or should not be us'd, or be not agreeable to the Laws of God.

VI. Or that Auricular Confession is not expedient and necessary to be us'd in the Church of God: He shall be adjudg'd to suffer death, or forfeit Lands and Goods as a Felon.

If any Priest, or other Man or Woman which advisedly hath vow'd Chastity or Widow-hood, do actually marry or contract Matrimony with another or any Man which is, or hath been a Priest, do carnally use any Woman to whom he is or hath been married, or with whom he hath contracted Matrimony; or openly be conversant or familiar with any such Woman, both the Man and the Woman shall be adjudg'd Felons. Commissions also shall be awarded to the Bishop of the Diocese, his Chancellor, Commissary, and others, to enquire of the Heresies, Felonies, and Offences aforesaid. And also Justices of Peace in their Sessions, and every Steward, Under-Steward, and Deputy of Steward in their Leet or Law-day, by the Oaths of twelve Men, have Authority to enquire of all the Heresies, Felonies, and Offences aforesaid.

Margaret Countess of Salisbury, Cardinal Pool and others
attainted.

In this Parliament also, Margaret Countess of Salisbury (being Grand-child of George Duke of Clarence, Brother of Edward IV. and Mother of Cardinal Pool, as also the Cardinal himself, and Gertrude Wife to the late Marquis of Exceter, Sir Adrian Fortescue, and Thomas Dingley Knight of S. Johns, were attainted of Treason. Against Margaret and Gertrude it was alledg'd, that they were complices with the Marquis of Exceter, and other Traitors: Our Records also tell us, that certain Bulls granted by the Bishop of Rome were found at Cowdrey, being then (as I take it) the Countess of Salisbury's House; and that the Parson of Warblington convey'd Letters for her to her Son the Cardinal; and that she forbad all her Tenants to have the New Testament in English, or any other new Book the King had priviledg'd. But whatsoever the cause was (for our Parliament Records are short in the Particulars) I find by a Letter from the Earl of Southampton, and Bishop of Ely to Cromwell, That (though she were seventy years old) her behaviour yet was Masculine and Vehement, and that she would confess nothing. Howsoever, the testimonies brought convincing her, she was condemn'd.

Against Cardinal Pool it was alledg'd, that he had conspir'd against the King with the Bishop of Rome, and taken preferment of him.

Against the rest, I find no more, but in general, that they were Complices. Howsoever, Fortescue and Dingley suffer'd first; for Margarets Execution was deferr'd for two years, as shall be told hereafter; and Gertrude died a natural Death: And for the Cardinal, he could not be taken, though I find our King requir'd him earnestly of all those Princes that receiv'd him in their Dominions.

The six Articles being now publish'd, gave no little occasion of Murmur, since to revoke the Conscience not only from its own Court, but from the ordinary ways of resolving Controversies, to such an abrupt decision of the common Law (as is there set down) was thought to be a diverting of Religion from its right and usual course; since the Conscience must be taught, not forc'd; without that it should at any time be handled roughly, as being of so delicate a temper, as though it suffer an edge to be put on, who doth more, diminisheth or breaks it. Besides, to make the contravening of Doctrines to be Capital, before they be fully prov'd, is prejudicial to that liberty, without which no Man can justify himself before God or Man. For if it be death to believe otherwise than we are commanded, how unsafe will it be to make exact enquiry? And without it who can say his Religion is best? Besides, the example is dangerous; for if Infidels and Heathens (to retain their People in Obedience) should do the like, who would ever turn Christian? Therefore Crammer for three days together in the open Assembly oppos'd these Articles boldly; though yet it appears not what Arguments he us'd. Only I find the King sent to him for a Copy of them, and mislik'd not his freedom, as knowing all he spake was out of a sincere Intention; though some thought he had a private Interest, as being himself a married Man, though fearing of this Law, he sent away his Wife for the present into Germany, she being Kinswoman to Hosiander the Divine of Noremberg, whom he married during his Ambassade with the Emperor about Anno 1532.

But that it may seem less strange why the King, who before was much dispos'd to favour the Reformers, did on a sudden so much vary from them, I have thought fit to set down some of the Motives, as I conceive them. In which number certainly, the Objections of Stephen Gardiner formerly mention'd may have place, while speaking against the Treaty with the Protestants in Germany, he alledg'd that they would not allow the Kings Supremacy, lest they should infer an investing of the same Authority in the Emperor, whose absolute Power they seem'd to fear more than that of the Pope himself: And as this suspicion alienated secretly the mind of our King, who saw that if he embrac'd their Reformation, they would abridge his Power; so they not only deny'd to approve his Divorce, but lately (as is shew'd) in a peremptory manner refus'd all Accommodation, unless our King yielded wholly to the Augustan Confession. Again, the Duke of Saxony about this time particularly shew'd some disaffection to him in the overture of his Match with Anne of Cleve.

Lastly, as affairs then stood, the King was both in that danger of Rebellion at home, and 1539. Invasion from abroad, as he thought it not safe to reform any further in Religion; for which reason also he was severe against all new Sectaries, especially Anabaptists; so when occasion was given, he still testified his desire as far as was possible to keep an unity with the Roman Church, affirming that the Pope had slanderously call'd him Heretick. Inſomuch that the ſame time he publickly diſputed with Lambert in Westminster-Hall, he declar'd his Reſolution to continue in the Religion he had openly profeſs'd. For theſe Reaſons therefore (for I ſhall not here intermeddle with thoſe of Conſcience) it ſeems our King was the more diſpos'd to keep him to the ancient forms of the Church. And now the Proteſtants in Germany, deſpairing of accord with the Emperor, aſſembled at Amſtet in Thuringia, Nov. 9. to conſult about mutual defence. To which purpoſe, they ſent Ambaſſadors to our King; who told them, (as I find in our Records that he would make a League with them in honeſt Cauſes, as he had done with the Duke of Juli, and after that he would treat of an accord and league in Religion. Though Stellan (a little differing herein) writes that King Henry told them plainly, he thought their Doctrine touching Communion in both kinds, private Maſs, and Priests Marriage erroneous, and that his Learned Men ſhould diſpute herein. And that Cromwell thereupon told them the beſt way was to ſend an honourable Ambaſſade, and Me- lanchton aſſuring them if they came to any reaſonable agreement of Doctrine with our King, he would not only furniſh them with a vaſt ſum of Money for their occaſions, but enter into a ſtrict League with them for defence in general. But they ſtanding firm to the Auguſtin Confeſſion, and intending no League but in caſe of Religion, the buſineſs ended for the preſent, in a reſolution to answer the Kings Arguments concerning the ſix Articles in writing, and ſend it in a Book to him, and to deſire an abolition of them.

1540. April 13. And now the ſix Articles caus'd no little apprehenſion in all the Reformers; yet I do not find the Law was us'd with much rigour till Cromwell's Death. Nevertheless, the terror of it made Latimer Biſhop of Worceſter, and Sbaxton Biſhop of Salisbury (being committed to Priſon) to reſign their Biſhopricks to the King, they being unwilling it ſeems to have a hand in the approbation or execution of them. So that if Sir Thomas More and the Biſhop of Rocheſter had their ſcruples about the Supremacy; theſe Men were as conſcientious about the ſix Articles.

July 1. Two Biſhops reſign their Biſhopricks rather than conſent to the ſix Articles.

August 7. This year the Emperor glad to repoſe himſelf a while from War, attended his pleaſure in Spain, while Barbaroſſa with a ſtrong Fleet keeping the Seas, and landing his Men, did miſchief in many places. Recovering ſo after a brave reſiſtance by Sermiento a Spaniard, the place of Caſtel-novo in the Gulf of Catara; which though it excited the Emperor to proceed in War againſt the Turk, yet a Mutiny ariſing in Gaunt (his native Town) made him reſolve in Perſon to go and appeaſe it. And the rather, that having now loſt his Empreſs, and check'd a little the greatness of ſome principal Perſons in Spain, he thought himſelf more free and diſengag'd. All the difficulty was what way to take; for if the Sea were full of hazard, there was no ready Land-way, but by France; which though beſt, when it could be handſomly procur'd, yet (the buſineſs being brought to his Council) was judg'd impoſſible; nevertheleſs, an overture thereof being ſecretly given to Francis, and a promiſe of Milan to one of his Sons (as the French write) he both gladly embrac'd the occa-ſion, and offer'd his two Sons for Hoſtages of his ſafe paſſage. This was thankfully receiv'd by the Emperor, but as the Age was full of ancient honour, (which I never found intermitted but in barbarous times) the Emperor would have no ſecurity, but only a ſafe conduct under the Hand and Seal of Francis; taking that pledge only for his life and the Empire, while Francis that he might exempt his magnanimous Gueſt from jealouſie, ſent his two Sons and Anne de Montmorency the Conſtable to receive him at Bayonne, whither in his mourning Weeds, he came with twenty ſix Perſons only, (as our Records have it) in the end of November, 1539. And ſo like Knight Errant following his journey, he every where (as Francis had permitted) deliver'd all Priſoners. Coming thus to Caſtel le Herand, the King (though troubled with an Ulcer in his ſecret parts) and the Queen and Dutcheſs of Eſtampes his Favorite, and a great train of Noble Perſons welcom'd the Emperor with all demonſtrations of Love. This confident paſſage having (it ſeem'd) abolish'd all memory of their former Rancour; holding their way thus to Amboiſe; the Emperor was there almoſt ſtifled by a thick and ſudden ſmoak, which (though the French report it to have been the caſual burning of ſome Hangings near his Chamber, and alſo might be true, yet one Style, imploy'd there by our King to write him the ſucceſs of this Journey, ſaid) came thus. They who had charge from Francis to make the Emperors Reception, had hung a long iron Chain from the top of the Caſtle to the bottom, cover'd all over with Pitch, Tar, and Roſin in very great quantity, which being lighted at the Emperors coming (ſomewhat in Night) did afterwards upon ſome accident, go out in that ſnuff and ill ſavour, as the Emperor ſuſpected it was done on purpoſe to choak him; but theſe jealouſies were ſoon clear'd, Succours not only coming in quickly, but Francis commanding the Authors of this diſturbance to be hang'd, had not the Emperor interceded for them. And here, during ſome ſtay, both Princes (who formerly would have us'd their Arms againſt each other) ending their emulation in ſhooting a Stag, which they both hit at the ſame time with their Hand-guns, (as Style his Recept relates) departing hence to Paris, the Court of Parliament in their Robes, the Chancellor and Officers of the City met him, with a brave Equipage, which yet the Emperor ſeem'd not much to affect; his black Cloth Suit, and private Train being not proper, as he thought, for ſuch ſhews; ſo that he wiſh'd they had been ſpar'd. Nevertheless Francis would not omit any thing which might ſerve either for Oſtentation or Magnificence, ſo that in the ſplendor thereof, all note of their former diſſenſion ſeem'd hidden or effac'd. Howbeit, there wanted not ſome who perſuaded Francis to cancel the Treaty of Madrid, and make a new one at Paris, and that Milan ſhould be reſtor'd into the bargain. But as the Conſtable Montmorency (a Perſon of great worth) oppos'd this Advice, ſo Francis abhor'd it. Beſides, the Dutcheſs of Eſtampes (who at firſt ſeem'd averſe) being gain'd by a Diamond, which the Emperor having purpoſely let fall, had after given, (upon her taking it up) chang'd her Language, and now began to ſerve the Emperor. Seven days thus being paſt, either in Masks, Tilts, Turneys, and other Royal Diſports and Triumphs, or in friendly and private Communication, the Emperor thought fit to depart, giving by way of ſatisfaction for his good entertainment, many aſſurances of his love to Francis, who alſo for making it more entire to him, as well as withdrawing it from our King, 1539. King, had discover'd some secrets (formerly past betwixt them) which diverted the Emperor much from making any new Alliance in our Parts. But as this, at last, was disclos'd again to our King, the unkind usage he receiv'd herein, made him attend an occasion to resent it. And now the Emperor and Francis leaving Paris, the Countess of Chantilly: The admirable situation whereof, and variety of Country pleasures about it, was such, as it made the Emperor wish that he had such another place, when it had cost him one of his Provinces. Both Princes going hence to St. Quintin, bid adieu to each other, leaving nothing to be admir'd, in all the Passages betwixt them, than that they never spake of any particular difference, but by way of gentle discourse, or urg'd it further, than either of them pleas'd to give ear; so much did civility prevail with them over all other Considerations: And thus at length, in February the Emperor came to Valenciennes; whither Francis his Children having accompanied him, and receiv'd both from him, and his Sister Mary, Lady Regent there, all kind and regal usage (excepting an absolute promise to restore Milan) they departed and left the Emperor to attend his great occasions in those Countreys. Where being happy in nothing more than that his adventure of passing through France, (which nothing could justifie but the Event) had succeeded so well, he compos'd the stirs there shortly after.

The passages of this Interview being advertis'd to our King, made him attempt betimes to break off their new Alliance: Or when that could not be done, to prevent the Consequences. Therefore, immediately upon the departure of the Emperor from Paris, he sent the Duke of Norfolk to treat with Francis to this effect: To offer him assistance for recovery of Milan. And for this purpose, that the arrearages of the Pensions due to our King, and Salt-money should be remitted: Furthermore, that with all industry he should make him jealous of the Emperors Ambition. And lastly, to propose a strict League with him, even to the exclusion of the Pope from their Dominions, as he said: He said he had already contracted with the Duke of Cleves, and in a manner with the Duke of Saxe, the Count Palatine of the Rhine, the Dukes of Bavaria, John Marquis of Brandenburg, the Lantgrave of Hesse, and the Marquis Joachim Elector, and other Princes of Germany. The Duke coming thus to Paris, had audience of Francis; but finding him resolute not to break with the Emperor, if he perform'd his part, he return'd before the end of February.

Having thus deliver'd together the whole business of the Interview, and Success thereof, lest the Reader should be interrupted with broken and imperfect Narrations, I shall look back on some other Affairs which pass'd this while.

1539. Our King having found that neither the Marriage propos'd betwixt himself and the Dutches of Milan, was like to take effect, nor any other in France, consider'd now where he might bestow himself with most advantage: Whereupon Cromwel advis'd him to a Treaty with Cleves; and the rather, that he might oppose the Emperor, who did still retain such a grudge against him for disinheriting the Princess Mary, as it was thought he would endeavour to execute the Popes Sentence: So that hereunto certain considerations of State, rather than Beauty or Riches, did conduce. For as John Duke of Cleves was next Neighbour to the Emperors Dominions in the Low-Countreys, and Father-in-Law to the Duke of Saxony, he seem'd most proper to joyn with in League to this purpose. But the old Duke John dying shortly after, the Treaty was renew'd with Duke William his Son, to whom also the Princess Mary was propos'd, when he demanded her upon fitting terms. But difficulties appear'd in either of these Affairs; for the Lady Anne having been demanded by the Duke of Lorain's Son, the old Duke of Cleves had in great part accorded it: And for the other Match, it was much cross'd by the Emperor, who offer'd Duke William the Dutches of Milan, not without some hope that he would release Guelders, which the said Duke claim'd by the gift of Charles of Egmond, late Duke thereof. Howbeit, the treaties with our King went on; but so as they were by the Cleves cunningly delay'd, till a meeting with the Emperors Deputies at Brussels had past, and advice was taken with the Duke of Saxony: Yet were not these the only impediments; for the Lady Anne understood no Language but Dutch; so that all communion of Speech betwixt our King and her was interclud'd. Yet, as our Ambassador, Nicholas Wotton Doctor of Law, employ'd in this business, hath it, she could both write and read in her own Language, and few very well; only for Musick, he said, it was not the manner of the Country to learn it. But for her better description, Hans Holbin the Kings Servant took her Picture, and her younger Sister Amelies, and sent them hither; upon whose excellent representation of the Lady Anne, the match being resolv'd on, was fully concluded at the coming over of Frederic Duke of Bavaria Count Palatine of the Rhine, and the several Ambassadors of the Dukes of Saxony and Cleves; and shortly after the Lady with a brave Equipage was sent into England. The other Treaty yet succeeded not; for the young Duke of Cleves finding no disposition in the Emperor to release Guelders, concluded a Marriage with the only Daughter of Henry King of Navarre, and Margurita the French Kings Sister, the year following; which yet took no effect. This Lady being on her way now as far as Rochester, the King came disguis'd to her on New-years day: But the sight so dislik'd him, that he was glad (as his own words were afterwards) that he had kept himself from making any part of her Bond with her, and that he was woe that ever she came into England; and that he thereupon deliberated with himself how to break it off; though, as he consider'd it would make a ruffle in the World, and drive the Duke her Brother into the Emperor or French Kings hands, he said, it was too far gone. The truth of all which is so declar'd by our Records, that I make no question but if her coming had hapned at any other time than when the Emperor and French King were together in France, as is before related, he would have sent her back. Howsoever, he thought fit to discover himself at last to her; who thereupon fell on her Knees, but he taking her up lovingly, kiss'd her, without making shew of any inward discontent, which also he had so at length digested; that he resolv'd to marry her, when the ensurance made by her to the Duke of Lorain's Son were clear'd; which business being committed to Cromwells care, who was a special Counsellor of the Match, he said (as the King afterwards charg'd him under his hand) that a sufficient Instrument for this purpose was brought: But whether Cromwel did forget himself herein, or his Master, it is hard out of our Records to determine; for I find in an Original written by Cromwel, 25 of June, to the King, out of the Tower, that Olesleger and Hobsteden (the Duke of Cleves Commissioners for bringing over the Lady) had with them indeed 1539. no such Instrument, nor any Discharge or Declaration touching the Covenants of Marriage betwixt the Duke of Lorain's Son; nevertheless, that Olesleger offer'd to remain here as Prisoner, till a revocation of all the aforesaid Covenants and Contracts of Marriage were brought; and that this being told the King, made him say, he was not well handled in this business. Howsoever, all was remitted to the Council-Table, where the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Bishop of Duresme said, if nothing but Sponsals had pass betwixt them, such a Renunciation as was offer'd would serve; and that then the making a Protestation in an Honourable Presence before certain Notaries, should be a sufficient discharge in Law: And now the procuring of the said Instrument in writing being undertook by the aforesaid Commissioners, the King requir'd the Lady to make a Protestation before the Lords to this effect: Which being done, he said to Cromwel, that there was no remedy now, and therefore he must put his neck in the yoke (as the words under his hands are:) Whereupon, the next day after he solemnly married her at Greenwich, resolving to confederate himself with the Princes of Germany, if they would come to some moderate accord in Doctrine. But in the Morning Cromwel coming to him, and demanding whether he lik'd her better than before, he answer'd, Nay, much worse; for that he having found by some signs that she was no Maid, he had no disposition to meddle with her: Nevertheless, he outwardly cherish'd her; without making any publick demonstration of dis-favour towards her, or neglect of any Solemnity for her Reception at London and else-where. All which made the greater shew, that the King remembring what Enemies he had abroad, and discontented Persons at home, had renew'd his Guard of Fifty Pensioners, intermitted since the first year of his Reign.

Scotts Affairs. It is formerly related, how not only James King of Scotland desir'd in Marriage Mary the Daughter of the Duke of Guise, and Relict of the Duke of Longueville; but a touch given that our King had some inclination to her: Howbeit, Francis chose rather to give her to James, as knowing that less States united to greater, depend on them; whereas the equal for the most part live in jealousy with their Neighbours: Therefore the Match being concluded, she was brought to Scotland, and soon after with Child, which being a Son, the Grandmother Margaret, Queen of Scots, and Sister to our King, having Christned, shortly after died, aged about fifty years, and was buried in the Carthusians Church in Perth. But neither that Child, nor another born the year following, liv'd long; they (tho' in several places) ending their lives within six hours one after the other, the same day (as the Scottish History hath it.) I find little else by our Records, of Scotland, for this year; save that some Libels and Prophecies being divulg'd in Scotland against our King, the Authors were punished by James. The year following Sir Ralph Sadler Secretary was dispatcht thither, about the time that the Emperor and French King were together; for our King knew well how much it concern'd him now on every part to prevent danger. The Instructions given to Sadler were (after presenting the Kings love, and some Horres) First, To bring David Beton, Cardinal and Archbishop of St. Andrews, into suspicion with that King, as having written to Rome in other terms than he should; which Letters being intercepted in England, were now to be shewn. But King James did not much weigh this.

Secondly, To persuade him, for augmenting his Estate, to take into his hands the Abbeyes; which James likewise refus'd, saying, what need I take them into my hands, when I may have any thing I can require of them? And if there be abuses in them, I will reform them; for there be a great many good.

Thirdly, To discover his affection, by telling him how rumours were dispers'd (which the aforesaid Interview made probable) that the Emperor, French King, and Bishop of Rome would invade England; and that it was said, King James would do the same. But he protested with many Oaths against it. Whereupon Sadler told him how near he was to the English Crown; and that he should esteem his Uncles friendship above any others, desiring again there might be an Interview; which James approv'd, when the French King might be present; but afterward by a particular Message excus'd it: So that some jealousies pass'd betwixt them; which also appear'd by certain Fortifications rais'd about this time upon the Borders by our King, and a Navy of fifteen Ships, and 2000 Men made in readines by James: Who wanted not Money, his Clergy giving great Sums only that their Houses might not be dissolv'd. What the occasion of these Preparations yet was, I cannot tell; but I gather out of our Records, that about this time certain Irish Gentlemen came to invite him to their Country, promising to acknowledge him their King, and that divers Nobles and Gentlemen of Ireland should come over to do him Homage. How this offer was accepted, appears not; but the Preparatives came to nothing, by the good order which our King gave; who both by frequent and kind Messages, and securing his Borders, kept his Nephew in good intelligence. One doubt yet remain'd undecided, as I gather out of our Records, which was, that our King took it ill, that James assum'd to himself his Title of Defender of the Faith, only adding the word Christian unto it, as if (said he) there were any other Faith.

That Beauty and attractive which should take the Kings eye in Anne of Cleve, not appearing, nor that Conversation which should please his Ear; and her Brother besides excusing himself in the performance of some Articles of the Treaty, he did more willingly think of a Divorce; for which purpose, the Pre-contract with the Duke of Lorain's Son was chiefly pretended. For though Olesleger, Chancellor of Cleves, had according to his promise, 26 Feb. 1540. procur'd an Instrument in writing out of the Records of Dusseldorp, dated Feb. 15. 1535. testifying the Sponsalia heretofore made by the Parents betwixt the Duke of Lorain's Son, and the Lady Anne, should not take effect. Yet this it seems either was not shew'd, or did not satisfy our King. Howsoever it was not deposited in Archivis Regiis, but found among Cromwel's Papers after his apprehension. And now although all scruples seem'd the more considerable, in that so many doubts had been already cast concerning the Kings former Marriages, yet the King determin'd at what price soever to separate himself from Anne of Cleve, and together to ruine Cromwel. For though he had not long before made him Knight of the Garter, Earl of Essex, and High Chamberlain of England, yet as he was odious by reason of his low birth to all the Nobility, and hated particularly by Stephen Gardiner, and the Roman Catholics, for having operated so much in the dissolution of Abbies; and that the Reformers themselves found he could not protect them from burning; and lastly, that besides a Subsidy that the Clergy gave of four shillings in the pound, he had gotten in the present Parliament, not without much Reluctation, one Tenth, and one Fifteen parts of all Lay-mens Goods; he was universally hated: Which our King considering, and having besides divers Articles brought

1540. brought against him, he now judg'd him no longer necessary: Therefore he gave way to all his Enemies Accusations; which could not but be material; it being impossible that any Man, who meddled so much in great and publick Affairs, should not in divers kinds so mistake, forget, and err, as to incur the note of a Criminal, when severe inquisition were made against him. And now the King having gotten sufficient proof against Cromwel, caus'd him to be arrested at the Council-Table by the Duke of Norfolk, when he least suspected it: To which Cromwel obey'd, though judging his Perdition more certain, that the Duke was Uncle to the Lady Katharine Howard, whom the King began now to affect. The News whereof, and his commitment to the Tower being divulg'd, the People with many Acclamations witnessed their Joy; so impatient are they usually of the good fortune of Favorites arising from mean place, and insolent over the ill: Whereof the King being inform'd, proceeded more overtly, both in his Parliament business, and the Divorce; and the rather, that all former faults being now imputed to Cromwel, every body began to hope of a better Age. But Cromwel (if we may believe some of our Authors) foresaw his fall two years before, and therefore provided for his Family; neither did the late Honours give him much comfort or security, when he thought they were conferr'd only to make him the greater Sacrifice. It cannot be deny'd yet, but the Crimes whereof he was attainted in Parliament, are in the general terms great and enormous, and such as deserv'd the most Capital Punishment; though as some of the Accusations were conceal'd two years after they were alledg'd, and the particulars of some others not specified; and lastly, as he was not permitted to answer for himself, the proceedings against him were thought rigorous; but so few pittied him, that all was easily pass'd over: Nevertheless, I find by an Original, that Cranmer writ to the King in his behalf boldly, considering the times; for though (as is in his Letter) he heard yesterday in his Graces Council, that he is a Traitor; yet, he saith, who cannot be sorrowful, and amaz'd that he should be a Traitor against your Majesty? He that was so advanc'd by your Majesty, he whose surety was only by your Majesty, he who lov'd your Majesty (as I ever thought) no less than God; he who studied always to set forward whatsoever was your Majesties Will and Pleasure; he that car'd for no Mans Displeasure to serve your Majesty; he that was such a Servant, in my Judgment, in Wisdom, Diligence, Faithfulness, and Experience, as no Prince in this Realm ever had; he that was so vigilant to preserve your Majesty from all Treasons, that few could be so secretly conceiv'd, but he detected the same in the beginning? If the Noble Princes of memory, King John, Henry II. and Richard II. had had such a Counsellor about them, I suppose they should never have been so traiterously abandoned, and overthrown as those good Princes were: After which, he says again, I lov'd him as my Friend, for so I took him to be, but I chiefly lov'd him for the love which I thought I saw him bear ever towards your Grace singularly above all others: But now, if he be a Traitor, I am sorry that ever I lov'd him, or trusted him, and I am very glad that his Treason is discover'd in time; but yet again I am very sorrowful; for who shall your Grace trust hereafter, if you might not trust him? Alas! I bewail and lament your Graces chance herein, I wot not whom your Grace may trust. But I pray God continually night and day to send such a Counsellor in his place, whom your Grace may trust, and who for all his qualities can and will serve your Grace like to him, and that will have so much sollicitude and care to preserve your Grace from all dangers, as I ever thought he had. All which, as being a Character of Cromwel in Cranmer's Opinion, I have faithfully copied out of the Original. Not yet that I will pretend excuses for him, whom the Laws have condemn'd; (though Fox doubts not to say, That as General Councils have sometimes been observ'd to err, so Princes and Parliaments may be sometimes inform'd by sinister Heads;) but that his punishment may serve as a caution for those that serve severe Princes, to procure sufficient warrant for all that they do. The Crimes objected to Cromwel seeming to be chiefly an usurpation of power, to set at liberty certain Persons not capable of it, and granting certain Licences, and making certain Commissions in high Affairs, without the Kings knowledge: For which, though Cromwel in his discretion might have found due Motives; yet as he proceeded not warily therein, he fell into the danger of the Law. Furthermore, he was accus'd for being an Heretick, and favouring them: (But then, that the Head of the Churches Vicegerent in Spiritual Affairs, should be an Heretick and favourer of them, to some seem'd strange, to others gave occasion of Merriment.) As for his speaking certain high presumptuous words concerning the King, and sundry of the Nobility, many thought it proceeded rather out of mistaking and rashness, than any ill intention. Cromwel thus unheard, and almost unpried, being condemn'd while he was in the Tower, omitted not yet to write unto the King, whereof hereafter. The context of my History requiring, that I come to the proceedings of the Kings Divorce.

I find by an Original, that John Clark Bishop of Bath, was sent to the Duke of Cleves at the end of June, to tell him, That the King never consented heartily to the Matrimony with his Sister; and that he never did, nor intended to consummate the same; especially since he could not but take notice of the precontract with Lorain: Besides which, that there were secret Causes, which the King without great necessity would not have disclos'd, because they touch'd the honour of the Lady; yet that all her Jewels should be restor'd with an honourable Augmentation in Revenue, &c. And so that she should be transported into her Country. Besides, that assurance should be given the Duke of the Kings Love, in all his occasions with the Emperor. After which, if the Duke should remain perverse, to tell him, that the matter is already so debated by his Majesty, and the whole Realm, (as the Reader will see hereafter) the Parliament now sitting, that they be utterly resolv'd to proceed to Justice. But these Instructions again were check'd by others of July 3. and he commanded to persist only in the point of precontract with Lorain, which was upon Remonstrance of the Lords in the Upper House, to be debated in Parliament, since they found the Instrument for Revocation thereof was of no value: And that certain Persons were appointed of both Houses, who should repair to the King, to beseech him by way of humble Petition, that it would please him, both to grant, that the Bishops and the Clergy of the Realm, might examine the matter, and thereupon declare their Judgment, and Sentence; and also to abstain from her Company, till the case were decided: Whereunto his Majesty condescending and agreeing, upon Thursday next it should be opened to the Parliament, and brought to the King, and from thence, remitted to the Bishops and Clergy; and also notified to her. All which tending only to an Examination, his Majesty could not deny, not doubting but the said Duke considering that it is the general motion of the whole

1540. whole Realm, and remembering the effusion of Blood which hath been in the same, by uncertainty of Titles, will think it reasonable, that this last Matrimony, for their more certainty, and the Kings discharge, should be examin'd. These second Instructions (sign'd by the King as the former were,) yet did not please: He being finally commanded to urge for his best Argument Authoritatem rei judicate: All which Instructions were sent the Bishop in his way, and before he came to Bruges, where the Emperor was; whom he was commanded to salute on his Majesties part, and to deliver him certain Letters. The particulars whereof, though not extant in our Records, yet (as I gather by some Circumstances) tended to a Reconciliation with the Emperor, whom the King in this Match had disobligh'd. Of the delivery whereof also, the Bishop (being not yet come to the Duke of Cleves) advertis'd our King, who this while commanded the Duke of Suffolk, the Earl of Southampton, and Sir Thomas Wriotbesly to acquaint the said Lady therewith; (who, upon pretence of better Air, was lately remov'd to Richmond.) But the news struck her into a sudden weakness and fainting, till at last recovering her self, she was by little and little persuaded, First, to refer the matter to the Clergy: Secondly, to relinquish her Title of Queen; instead whereof, the King had devis'd another which he thought might content her: And this was (as I find by our Records) that she should have the Name and Dignity thenceforth of his Adopted Sister; which stile yet, afterwards gave some subject of Discourse: Howsoever she accepted it, and subscrib'd (in these terms) a Letter to the King. Besides, she sent another to her Brother the Duke of Cleves, acknowledging the Justice of the proceedings; and that she was untouch'd by the King, and that she was well intreated in England, and therefore desir'd to stay: Lastly, she promis'd to shew the King all Letters receiv'd from her Brother, Mother, or any else. Whereupon, the Officers which before attended her as Queen, were discharg'd, and others appointed to wait on her in the quality of the Kings Adopted Sister.

July 6. And now the Duke understanding by the Bishop of Bath, and Nicolas Wotton Resident there, that our Clergy assist'd by the Court of Arches, had declar'd (upon her Testimony, that she was untouch'd by our King) that the Marriage was void, and that either part might marry freely; and that the whole Parliament had confirm'd the Sentence, and she accepted it, remain'd much perplex'd, as with tears he witnessed; yet finding it a business publickly resolv'd, he said little; especially, after he heard that Richmond House, and other fair Lands, were allotted her for Maintenance; and that she should have precedence before all, save the Queen, and the Kings Children. Howbeit, he would never consent to the disannulling of the Match; so that the Bishop return'd, leaving the Duke no otherwise satisfied, than that his Sister had sped no worse. Thus at length the Law pass'd, declaring the Marriage void, both by the judgment of the Clergy of England, and also by her own consent, and that it was High Treason to judge or believe otherwise.

July 12. Their Marriage declar'd void.

Several other Acts pass'd.

Another Act also was made, shewing, what Marriages were lawful, and what not. Wherein is ordain'd, that all Marriages (without the degrees prohibited by Gods Law) made and consummate by carnal knowledge, shall be firm and good. Notwithstanding any precontract, which hath not been so consummate. But this Law was repeal'd, 1. and 2. Phil. and Mar. and 1. Eliz. 1.

Other Acts also pass'd this Session of Parliament, which began April 12. Among which I thought fit to remember these:

An Act declaring in what cases a Man may dispose all his Lands by his last Will in Writing; and in what, but part thereof. And in what cases the King, and other Lords shall have their Wardships.

That no Person should sell or buy any Right or Title, or maintain it, or procure Maintenance in any Suit.

The punishment also by Death of Priests married, or unmarried; and of Women offending with them by Incontinency, was Repeal'd. For as the Clergy of these times thought it (though one of the Six Articles) too severe; the punishment (upon their Remonstrance) was laid on their Goods, Chattels, and Spiritual Promotions; and this also better pleas'd the King.

Sanctuaries also, and priviledg'd places were reduc'd to a few, and certain Rules prescrib'd to them.

That Horses feeding on Commons, not being of a lawful height, (that is to say, not being fifteen hands high, at two years old) should be seiz'd on by any Man for his own use.

That Forests, Heaths, Commons, &c. should be driven once in the year, and unlikely Tits in them to be kill'd. Nevertheless, that Horses of small height might be put where Mares were not kept.

The Statutes also of 5 Rich. 2. 3. 6 Rich. 2. 8. 4. 4 Hen. 7. 10. and 23 Hen. 8. 7. touching freighting in English Ships, were only rehears'd and confirm'd, and a rate set down what should be paid for the freight, or portage of the several sorts of Merchandizes from the Port of London to other places, and from thence to London.

That no Alien nor Denizon shall set up any Trade in the Kings Dominions, and they who are Denizons should be bound by and unto all the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, particularly those of 14 Hen. 8. and 21 Hen. 8. above-mentioned.

That Trinity Term, in regard of impediment of Harvest, and danger of Infection, should be abbreviated. Certain Priviledges also were granted to Physicians in London; as that they should not keep Watch and Ward, nor be Constables; and that they might practise Chirurgery: Barbers and Chirurgeons were also made one Company, and certain Priviledges given them; as not to bear Armour, or to be put in any Watches or Inquests.

A Court also of the First-fruits, and Tenths, granted to the King, was erected.

The Court of the Kings Ward also, and the Names and several Duties and Offices thereof was erected.

It was enacted also, That the Lands and Goods of St. Johns in Jerusalem, should be in the Kings disposition; for which these Reasons chiefly were pretended: Because the Knights of Rhodes or Saint John, otherwise call'd Fryers of the Religion of Saint John, drew yearly great sums of Money out of the Kingdom; that they maintain'd the usurp'd power of the Bishop of Rome; that they defam'd and slander'd the King and his Subjects; that the Isle of Rhodes, whence the said Religion took its name, was surpris'd by the Turks; that the Revenues might be better employ'd for defence of the Realm; nevertheless, certain Pensions were allow'd unto the Prior, and others of the said Order, that were dutiful Subjects. But all their Lands, as well in England as in Ireland, were granted to the Kings Majesty, to be in the Survey, Rule, and Governance of the Chancellor, and others, Officers of the Court of 1540. of Augmentations. And thus fell that ancient and pious Order, not without much Scandal abroad, both to the King and Government. Tho' yet, the envious Disrespect shew'd unto the English being such, as they never attained higher Dignity than the Turcoplier or Captain's Place of the Light-Horse in the Isle of Rhodes, did (in the opinion of some) extenuate this Proceeding: The King yet grew not much the richer hereby, as giving great Portions of the said Lands to divers of our Noblemen and Cavaliers, who lately had held a solemn Jufts, Tournay and Barriers in Westminster, and feasted sumptuously both the King and Court.

May 1. Hall. Act of Indemnity. June 25. Cromwell writes to the King after Condemnation. July 28. Is beheaded. His Defect and Fortune. Lastly, a general and free Pardon was granted of all Heresies, Treasons, Felonies, and Offences, (some particular Persons and Matters only excepted) in which number Cromwell was not yet included. For, though divers Letters and Messages passed from him to the King; and one particularly written after his Condemnation, and extant in our Records, wherein he much excus'd himself, saying, That if his Medlings under his Majesty were great, so his Majesty's Authority was great; and that he protested, besides, under many Execrations, that he was innocent in his Intentions; and, lastly, utterly deny'd all Treason and Heresy, as that he was no Sacramentary, &c. yet he could not prevail. And thus the twenty eighth of July (being four Days after the Dissolution of the Parliament) he was brought to the Tower-Hill, where, after Profession that he would die in the Catholick Faith, his Head was cut off.

And to this End came Cromwell, who from being but a Blacksmiths Son, found means to travel into divers foreign Countries, to learn their Languages, and to see the Wars, (being a Soldier of Bourbon at the sacking of Rome;) whence returning, he was receiv'd into the Cardinal Woolsey's Service: To whom he so approv'd himself by his Fidelity and Diligence, that the King after his Fall voluntarily took him for his Servant; in which place he became a special Instrument for dissolving the Abbies, and other Religious Houses, and keeping down the Clergy; whom in regard of their Oath to the Pope, he usually term'd the King's half Subjects: And for expelling the Monks, he said it was no more than a restoring them to the first Institution of being lay and labouring Persons: Neither did it move him, that so much Strictness and Austerity of Life was injoin'd them in their several Orders, since he said they might keep it in any Condition. But as these Reasons again were not admitted by divers learned and able Persons, so he got him many Enemies, who at last procur'd his Fall; but not before he had obtain'd successively the Dignities of Master of the Rolls, (a) Baron, (b) Lord Privy-Seal, (c) Vicegerent to the King in Spiritualities, (d) Knight of the Garter, (e) Earl of Essex, Great Chamberlain of England, &c. He was noted in the exercise of his Places of Judicature to have used much Moderation; and in his greatest Pomp, to have taken notice, and been thankful to mean Persons of his old acquaintance, and therein had a Virtue which his Master the Cardinal wanted: As for his other Descriptions, I leave them to be taken out of Cranmer's Letter formerly mention'd, with some deduction; for it seems written to the King in more than ordinary favour of his ancient Service.

(a) July 9. 1536. (b) (c) Jul. 18. 1536. (d) Aug. 26. 1537. (e) Ap. 14. 1540. At the same time with Cromwell, Walter Lord Hungerford suffer'd. The Crimes objected to him were, For taking into his House as Chaplain one William Bird, who had called the King Heretick, &c. That he had procur'd certain Persons to conjure, to know how long the King should live; also, That he had used the Sin of Buggery.

Shortly after which, divers great Persons from Italy, and other places, came to see the King, whom he very courteously receiv'd, and being richly rewarded, dismiss'd them.

The King continued yet his Rigor to those that disputed either his Authority, or Articles; insomuch, that both the Reformers and Maintainers of the Pope's Authority suffer'd so frequently, that his Enemies said, While he admitted neither side, he seem'd to be of no Religion. Howbeit, this was but Calumny, for he stood firmly to his own Reformation.

And now the Lady Anne of Cleves contenting her self with the stile of the King's adopted Sister, the Lady Katharine Howard, Daughter to Edmond the third Son of Thomas, first Duke of Norfolk, and Brother to the present Duke, was married to the King, and presently after shew'd publicly as Queen.

Our Historians say, That in August, this Year, there was so great a Drought, that the Springs failing, the Salt-water flow'd above London-Bridge. I find also, that Frederic Count Palatine of Bavaria was in England, to obtain Aid of the King, for the restitution of his Father-in-law the King of Denmark. But as our Records do not set down the time exactly, so I know not whether to place him in this Year, or the Year preceding. Howsoever, he found some Difficulty in his Business, and the rather, that he asked so great a Sum as six hundred thousand Ducats, when the King had so much use of Money, for the fortifying of his Kingdom.

Let us look a while upon foreign business: The memory of those Courtesies which were done the Emperor, being yet fresh, Francis thought fit to send the Cardinal of Lorain, and Conestable Montmorency, to treat concerning the Restitution of Milan: But the Emperor, resolute at what price soever not to quit it, made them at length this Answer:

There is nothing I desire so much, as the Peace and Quiet of the World, which that it may be firm and true, I am content to give unto the King, more than ever he meant to ask, or I to grant. Of two Daughters which I have, I am willing to bestow the elder in marriage to the Duke of Orleans, and with her for Dowry the State of Flanders, with the Stile and Title of a King; so shall Francis have two Sons, both Kings and Neighbours: Besides, if his eldest Son and mine die, he and my Daughter shall be the greatest Princes in the World; for they shall have Spain and all my other Dominions. As for Milan, let them not think I will ever part with it, since it were nothing else than to disjoint (the Spanish is more elegant Descabear) all my Estates. And let it not grieve the King; for I had it by good and lawful Succession, and possess it as belonging to the Empire. Take Milan from me, and you take away my Passage between Flanders and Spain, Italy, Sicily, and Germany. This is that I had to say to you. And if it please you not, there is no occasion to speak more of the business.

The Cardinal and Montmorency hereupon advertis'd this good Offer; but Francis, as a Man passionate, and affronted, returned this Answer.

That since he might not have his Inheritance, he would have nothing else; neither would he care to speak any more of Peace.

And thus the Treaty brake off; yet so, as it was thought that Francis herein shew'd some Willfulness; he being not further off from Milan for having Flanders, nor to be bound so by any Confederation, as he might not easily find occasion to dissolve it, the Causes both of War and Peace betwixt great Princes being perpetual. And now the Emperor, glad of this refusal, prosecutes his Business in Germany, without care of giving Francis any further satisfaction.

The Emperor's final Answer to Francis about Milan.

Sandow.

The Emperor's Reply.

1540. In France, where all was now quiet, little past this Year, save that Francis being desirous to enlarge his Borders, built a Fortress at Ardres, and made a Bridge over to the English Pale; which our Garrison hearing, beat down. The French yet re-edify'd it; but our Garrisons overthrew it again. Whereupon the French raising some Forces under Monsieur de Biez, our King commanded Henry Arundel Lord Matrevers (lately made Deputy of Calais in the place of Arthur Plantagenet) to put the Town into defence by Fortifying and Victualling it; and shortly after sent over the Earl of Hertford, and Sir Edward Kerne, who disputed the Right of the Borders with Monsieur de Biez, and other Commissioners from Francis. But as no effect follow'd hereon, and Francis besides took occasion to complain, that our King in the late Parliament had made the French liable to Subsidies, and other new Impositions, contrary to the ancient Treaties: Our King on the other side, remonstrating that those Acts were neither new, nor derogatory to the said Treaties; both Princes remain'd unsatisfy'd of the others Actions. Therefore on the French Party Monsieur de Vendosme was commanded to raise Forces in Picardy; and from England were sent William Earl of Southampton, lately made Lord Privy-Seal, and John Lord Russel, newly constitute High Admiral, with a few Troops of Northern Horse: Without yet that any thing was attempted on either side for the present.

I will conclude this Year with a Narration of the first beginning which the Jesuitical Order took from Inigo de Loyola of Guipuscoa in Spain. This Inigo or Ignatius being born 1492. (that is to say, in the Year that the Indies were discover'd, and Granada taken in by Ferdinand) seems the third great effect of that unparallel'd Ascendent which Spain had at that time: He lived yet obscurely till he came to twenty nine Years of Age, but then turn'd Soldier in the Wars of Navarre, 1521. where being hurt in the Knee, the Pain thereof seems to have waken'd Devotion in him to a Religious Life; for as soon as he recovered, he went to our Lady of Montserrat, to whom he offer'd his Sword and Dagger, which being done, he gave his Clothes away to a poor Man, and took upon him a Shirt and miserable Habit, which he girt about him with a Rope of Rushes: And in these Arms (for so are Sandoval's Words) he watch'd one whole Night before our Lady, and so went to an Hospital three Leagues off, and there attended the sick Persons, whence he travell'd after to the Holy Land; being return'd thence, and now in his Age of thirty three, he began to learn Grammar at Barcelona, which in two Years he attain'd. And being desirous to make further progress, he went to the University of Alcala, and so to Salamanca, where being oppos'd and persecuted, he left all and came to Paris, and there studied till he had found at last divers others, with whom he agreed to return in Pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and Jerusalem. Thus about 1536, going first to Venice, he staid till his Companions overtook him, and went from thence to Rome, whither he follow'd them; and obtain'd of Paul III. the Foundation of the Jesuitical Order, 27 Sept. 1540. The decay of Religious Houses in England, and the Progress of the Lutherans in Germany, authorizing (it seems) their Institution, who since have so dilated themselves, as their Disciples fear not to say, That for advancement of their Doctrine, they have gone to further Countries than the Apostles ever reach'd; and that God reserv'd the intire Discoveries both of East and West Indies until the latter times, only that those Holy Fathers might have the Honour of their Conversion. Of the Devotion and Miracles which this Ignatius is said to have exhibited in his Journeys, I affirm nothing, as contenting my self to have taken the more historical part out of Sandoval, (who seems to be a great Extoller of him.) Sundry Reformers on the other side, instead of confessing him to be a good Man, or a Miracle-worker, said, he was an Incendiary, and haunted with Evil Spirits. Which latter part not only Sandoval, but Turrianus and Bobadilla (both of them Jesuites) confirm; moreover Turrianus related (as Hospinian hath it) that he dy'd in much Fear and Trembling, and that his Face was strangely black; Hafenmullerus besides (once a Jesuit) adds that no Bones were found in his Body, and that all the Jesuites at his Burial were Witnesses thereof. Concerning which therefore no little Dispute is on both sides, whether good or bad Angels took them away, while divers sober Men think neither: But that we may pretermitt the Contentions of Men passionate on the one or the other side, as unfit to establish that Peace in which God is best serv'd, there is little occasion to say more of the Jesuites in this place, than that they are generally held such Ministers of the King of Spain, that they have more advanc'd (by the secret Operations of their Confessions, and Intelligence, which is admirable) the Designs of the House of Austria, than either the Continent of Spain, made intire by the Union of Granada, (as is formerly touch'd) or the Indies themselves. By which means, as also that their Doctrine and Learning is so exact in all things, save where they overmuch study the Pope and Spaniards Ends, they have made themselves the most considerable among all the Religious Orders.

And now a cruel time did pass in England; for as few durst protect those who refus'd to subscribe to the six Articles, so they suffer'd daily, whereof Fox hath many Examples; neither was it easy for any Man to escape, (Commissioners being appointed in every Shire to search out and examine those who were refractory;) nevertheless, these Punishments did but advance their Religion; for as they were notify'd abroad, and together their Constancy presented, who were burnt, it was thought they had some assistance from above, it being impossible otherwise that they should so rejoice in the midst of their Torments, and triumph over the most cruel Death. Therefore not only the learned and better affected sort, but even all Christian Princes endeavour'd some consent of Opinion: The Pope himself not omitting to concur therein, as thinking it better to allow some degrees of Latitude in Religion, only when their several Authorities might be conserv'd, than to hazard a general Schism and Distraction. Hereunto also it conduced not a little, that the Turk taking notice of these Divisions, prepared to invade Germany. Therefore the Emperor appointed a Meeting at Worms, where divers learned and able Men on both sides should dispute, hoping so an end would follow. Howbeit, as the Divines could not agree among themselves, the business was referr'd to a Diet, shortly to be held at Ratisbonne, whither the Pope sent Cardinal Gasper Contarini. And here the Emperor being present, requires both sides to permit the choice of the Delegates to him, which they granted; whereupon he appointed on the one side, Julius Pflug, John Eccius, John Groper; on the other, Philip Melancthon, Martin Bucer, and John Pistorius; gravely advising them to handle the business sincerely; these Men, after a modest Excuse, accept the Charge, desiring only certain Assessors who might testify their Proceedings; whereupon the Emperor gave them Frederick Count Palatine, and

A Dispute in Germany between the Protestants and Popish Divines.

April 17. Ni-

1540. Nicholas Perenot Seigneur de Granville, and some others; offering them further a Book to consider, some Passages whereof they all admitted, others they corrected, and of some others the Protestants writ their Opinion apart; so the Book was re-exhibited to the Emperor, and he (it seem'd) well contented therewith; nevertheless, because the Pope interven'd not herein, this way was oppos'd, Contareni alledging, that all agreement in this kind would be vain, unless the Holy See confirm'd it; whereupon the Emperor referring the Protestants Confession to him, he again refers it to the Pope: But as this requir'd time, so the Emperor desirous his Endeavours should take some effect, demands whether those Articles whereof the Delegates were agreed might be receiv'd, until a Council were had. The Protestants desir'd it; but the Legat and Catholic Princes oppos'd it, saying, They were not the most material, and therefore to be pretermitted till the rest were determin'd, &c. Concluding with a Desire, that all might be deferr'd to the General Council now intended.

July 7. The Emperor finding all Reconciliation at this time to be hopeless, and that the Turk still approach'd, took this way, promising himself to go to Rome, and sollicite the Pope herein; advising the Protestants in the mean time, First, to insist in the reconciled Points. Secondly, The Roman Catholic Bishops to reform their own particular Churches, and so make way for a general Reformation; taking order withal, that Religious Houses should not be thrown down, nor People drawn from one Country to another upon pretence of converting them: Yet that they who came willingly might be receiv'd; promising further, if a General Council could not be obtain'd, to procure a Provincial; or if neither, that within eighteen Months another Diet should be called, whither he would intreat a Legat from the Pope to come; suspending, in the mean time, that rigid Decree at Augsburg against the Protestants; whereupon, they also promis'd him their Assistance against the Turk. And thus ended the Diet; to which our King sent Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, and Sir Henry Knevet, by whom (if we may believe Sanders) he held a doubtful part; sometimes excusing himself to the Protestants, sometimes offering a Reconciliation with the Pope by the Emperor's means, when Penance and Restitution should not be requir'd. But as neither our Histories nor Records, nor the diligent Sleidan make mention hereof, that I can find, so I leave the credit thereof to the Readers discretion.

July 28. Sanders. Scilicet Aug. Francis not satisfy'd with the Answer formerly mention'd, nor the Negotiation of Montmorency, did resent both. Against the Emperor he took offence for not restoring Milan according to his Promise (as he alledg'd) to Montmorency: Against him again, he shew'd no little displeasure (as some affirm) for dissuading him to seize on the Emperor at that time: Though I rather believe it was on occasion of some private quarrel betwixt the Admiral Brion and him; in which, ill offices were done him by the Dutches of Estampes, lately ally'd to Brion's Kindred: Howsoever, Montmorency was confin'd to a private life; neither would the King ever after see him. And now Francis, resolv'd when occasion was offer'd to break with the Emperor, sends Anthony Rincon, a revolted Spaniard, in Ambassage to the Turk, and one Caesar Fregoso, a Genouese, to the Venetians: Both these meeting in Piedmont with Seignieur du Bellay, the King's Lieutenant there, were advertis'd that the Marquis of Guasto, the Emperor's Lieutenant in Milan, laid wait for them: Howbeit, whether trusting to their Quality, or Address, they agreed to pass by water along the Po; sending yet their Commission and Dispatches by another way into Venice; for the rest, hoping betwixt changing their Habit, and Diligence, to escape: But (as it falls out very often, that they who hide not themselves cunningly, give but the more occasion to discover themselves, so) they were prevented, and by certain Persons with Vifors assist'd upon the Water. Francis hearing hereof, said it was done by the Emperor or the Marquis of Guasto's procurement, and that the Law of Nations was violated therein: But they, on the other side, disclaim'd the Fact, offering to put the suspected Persons into the Pope's hands, to be there examin'd; protesting nevertheless, that the killing of Rincon was only a chastisement due to a treacherous Subject. Francis hearing this, surpriseth George of Austria (natural Son to Maximilian late Emperor) in his Journey from Spain to Flanders through France, and commits him to Prison. Some other Passages also happen'd about this time, which increas'd the Jealousy betwixt them: For as Francis had given in Marriage Jane Daughter of Navarre to the Duke of Cleves, and therein strengthen'd himself against the Emperor; so he again by giving the Dutches of Milan to the Son of the Duke of Lorraine, got the same advantage of Alliance against Francis.

April. A little Rebellion now appearing in Yorkshire, in which Sir John Nevil was a Complice, the King took order to suppress it betimes; commanding the said Sir John Nevil to be put to death at York. Shortly after which follow'd the Countess of Salisbury's Execution; which, whether occasion'd by the late Rebellion, (as being thought of Cardinal Pool's Instigation) or that she gave some new offence, is uncertain: The old Lady being brought to the Scaffold (set up in the Tower) was commanded to lay her Head on the Block; but she (as a Person of great Quality assur'd me) refus'd, saying, So should Traytors do, and I am none: Neither did it serve that the Executioner told her it was the fashion; so turning her gray Head every way, she bid him, if he would have her Head, to get it as he could: So that he was constrain'd to fetch it off slovenly. And thus ended (as our Authors say) the last of the right Line of the Plantagenets.

And now the King resolv'd to go in Progress to Yorkshire; not yet so much to extinguish the relics of the last Commotion, as those of Superstition, Miracles and Pilgrimages: Besides, he was in hope to meet his Nephew of Scotland, who being solicited again for Interview, had (it seems) promis'd it. Yet before he went, he caus'd two Lords and divers others to be put to death: One was the Lord Leonard Gray, who having been (the Year precedent) recall'd from his Deputy's place in Ireland, was then committed upon Suggestions ministred by the Council there, with whom (I find by our Records) he often wrangled; who furnish'd therefore divers Articles of High-Treason against him: So that though he had (the Year 1539) repulsed O Donel and O Neal (who invaded the English Pale) and render'd the King divers good Services heretofore in France, Ireland, and other places, he could not escape. The chief Points objected against him (extant in our Records) were, his readines to join with Cardinal Pool, and other the King's Enemies, he having for that purpose (as was alledg'd) left the King's Ordnance in Gallo-way; and that he consented to the escape of his Nephew Gerald, formerly mention'd; which, with divers others, to the number of twenty (if Hall say true) being brought to a Jury of Knights, (for being no Parliament Lord, he could not be judged

The other was a young Lord, Thomas Fines Lord Dacres of the South, who suffer'd for committing a Murder in company of some light Persons (who were with him a Deer-stealing.) All things being now ready for the intended Journey, the King, accompany'd with his Queen, pass'd thro' Lincolnshire, where the People (thankfully acknowledging their late Pardon) presented him with divers Sums of Money; which the Yorkshire Men also imitated. And now being come to York, he caus'd Proclamation to be made (as I find in our Records) that if any Man in those Parts found himself wronged for lack of Justice, or otherwise, by any whom his Majesty hath put in trust, or other, he shall have free access to the King and his Council for Redress. After this, News was brought him that his Nephew King James would not meet: So that although our King had made great Preparations to receive him, all was frustrated. This fill'd the King with Indignation; yet he conceal'd it for the present, though resolving in himself to resent it in the highest degree. Therefore departing from York, September 26. towards London, he was on the way encounter'd by the Ambassador of Portugal, desiring a License for the Transportation of Wheat into that Country, being in great need thereof. To which was answer'd, That if that King would admit in his next Navigation to Calicut, some Englishmen of our King's appointment to adventure there for providing this Realm with Spices, he should have his Request. But of this, although the said Ambassador undertook to write to his Master, I find no further mention. Our King being now return'd, prepar'd for War. Which James hearing, sent Ambassadors hither to excuse himself, and renew their former Correspondence, which King Henry refusing, James also levies Men, (as shall be told the Year following.)

But our King encounter'd after this Journey a greater Vexation; for the Queen was suppos'd to offend in Incontinency; some Particulars whereof being extant in our Records, I have thought fit to transcribe, rather than to make other Narration; the Family of which she came being so Noble and Illustrious, and the Honour of her Sex (which is tender) being concern'd therein.

Nov. 12. The Letter sent from divers of the Council to William Paget, our Ambassador then in France, was this:

A Letter from the Lords of the Council to the English Ambassador at Paris concerning K. Howard's leud Courses.

After our hearty Commendations, by these our Letters, we be commanded to signify unto you, a most miserable case, which came lately to Revelation, to the intent that if you shall hear the same spoken of, you may declare the Truth as followeth:

Where the King's Majesty upon the Sentence given of the Invalidity of the pretended Matrimony between his Highness and the Lady Anne of Cleve, was earnestly and humbly solicited by his Council, and the Nobles of this Realm, to frame his most noble Heart to the Love and Favour of some noble Personage to be join'd with him in lawful Matrimony, by whom his Majesty might have some more store of Fruit, and Succession, to the comfort of this Realm; it pleas'd his Highness upon a notable apparence of Honour, Cleanness and maidenly Behaviour, to bend his Affection towards Mi-stres Katharine Howard, Daughter to the late Lord Edmond Howard, Brother to me the Duke of Norfolk, insomuch as his Highness was finally contented to honour her with his Marriage, thinking now in his old days, after sundry Troubles of Mind, which have happen'd unto him by Marriages, to have obtain'd such a Jewel for Womanhood, and very perfect Love towards him, as should not only have been to his Quietness, but also brought forth the desir'd Fruit of Marriage, like as the whole Realm thought the semblable, and in respect of the Virtue and good Behaviour which she shew'd outwardly, did her all Honour accordingly. But this Joy is turn'd into extream Sorrow; for when the King's Majesty receiving his Maker on Allhallows day last past, then gave him most humble and hearty Thanks for the good life he led and trusted to lead with her, and also desir'd the Bishop of Lincoln, his Ghostly Father, to make like Prayer, and give like Thanks with him; on All-Souls Day being at Mass, the Archbishop of Canterbury having a little before heard, that the same Mistress Katharine Howard was not indeed a Woman of that Pureness and Cleanness that she was esteem'd; but a Woman, who before she was joined with the King's Majesty, had liv'd most corruptly and sensually; for the discharge of his Duty open'd the same most sorrowfully to his Majesty, and how it was brought to his knowledge, which was in this form following.

While the King's Majesty was in his Progress, one John Lossels came to the said Archbishop of Canterbury, and declar'd unto him, that he had been with a Sister of his married in Sussex, which sometimes had been Servant with the old Dutches of Norfolk, who did also bring up the said Mistress Katharine, and being with his said Sister, chanced to fall in communication with her of the Queen, wherein he advis'd her (because she was of the Queen's old Acquaintance) to sue to be her Woman; whereunto his Sister answer'd, that she would not so do; but she was very sorry for the Queen; Why, quoth Lossels? Marry, quoth she, for she is light both in living and Condition: How so, quoth Lossels? Marry, quoth she, there is one Francis Derrham, who was Servant also in my Lady of Norfolk's House, which hath lien in bed with her in his Doublet and Hose between the Sheets an hundred Nights. And there hath been such puffing and blowing between them, that once in the House a Maid which lay in the House with her, said to me, She would lie no longer with her, because she knew not what Matrimony meant. And further she said unto him, that one Man-nock, sometimes also Servant to the said Dutches, knew a privy Mark of her Body. When the said Lossels had declared this to the said Archbishop of Canterbury, he considering the weight and importance of the matter, being marvellously perplex'd therewith, consulted in the same with the Lord Chancellor of England, and the Earl of Hertford, whom the King's Majesty going in his Progress left to reside at London, to order his Affairs in those parts; who having weigh'd the matter, and deeply ponder'd the Gravity thereof, wherewith they were greatly troubled, and unquieted, resolv'd finally, that the said Archbishop should reveal the same to the King's Majesty; which because the matter was such, as he hath sorrowfully lamented, and also could not find in his heart to express the same to the King's Majesty by word of mouth, he declar'd the Information thereof to his Highness in Writing. When the King's Majesty had read this Information thus deliver'd unto him, his Grace being much perplex'd therewith, yet nevertheless so tenderly loved the Woman, and had conceiv'd such a constant Opinion of her Honesty, that he suppos'd it rather to be a forged matter, than of Truth. Whereupon it pleas'd him secretly to call unto him the Lord Privy Seal, the Lord Admiral, Sir Anthony Brown, and Sir Thomas Wriothesly, to whom he open'd the case, saying, He could not believe it to be true: And yet seeing the Information was made, he could not be satisfy'd till the Certainty thereof was known;

1541. known; but he would not in any wise, that in the Inquisition any spark of Scandal should rise towards her. Whereupon it was by his Majesty resolv'd, that the Lord Privy Seal should go strait to London, where the said Loffels that gave the Information was secretly kept, and with all dexterity to examine and try whether he would stand to his Saying: Who being so examin'd, answer'd, That his Sister so told him, and that he had declar'd it for the discharge of his Duty, and for none other respect; adding that he knew what danger was in it; nevertheless, he had rather die in declaration of the Truth, as it came to him, seeing it touch'd the King's Majesty so nearly, than live with the Concealment of the same: Which Asseveration being thus made by the said Loffels, the King's Majesty being inform'd thereof, sent the Lord Privy-Seal into Suffex, to examine the Woman, making a Pretence to the Woman's Husband of Hunting, and to her for receiving of Hunters; and sent the said Sir Thomas Wriothesly to London at the same instant, both to examine Mannock, and also to take the said Derrham upon a Pretence of Piracy, because he had been before in Ireland, and hath been noted before with that Offence; making these Pretences to the intent no spark of suspicion should rise of these Examinations. The said Lord Privy Seal found the Woman in her Examination constant in her former Sayings: And Sir Thomas Wriothesly found by the Confession of Mannock, that he had commonly us'd to feel the Secrets and other Parts of her Body, ere ever Derrham was so familiar with her; and Derrham confess'd that he had known her carnally many times, both in his Doublet and his Hose between the Sheets, and in naked Bed, alledging such Witnesses of three sundry Women one after another, that had lien in the same Bed with them when he did the Acts, that the matter seem'd most apparent. But what inward Sorrow the King's Majesty took when he perceiv'd the Information true, as it was the most woful thing that ever came to our hearts, to see it; so it were too tedious to write it unto you. But his Heart was so pierc'd with Pensiveness, that long it was before his Majesty could speak, and utter the Sorrow of his Heart unto us: And finally with plenty of Tears (which was strange in his Courage) open'd the same. Which done, she was spoken withal in it by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Norfolk, the Lord Great Chamberlain of England, and the Bishop of Winchester; to whom at the first she constantly deny'd it; but the matter being so declar'd unto her, that she perceiv'd it to be wholly disclosed, the same night she disclosed the whole to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who took the Confession of the same in Writing subscribed with her hand: Then were the rest of the number, being eight or nine Men and Women which knew of their doings, examin'd, who all agreed in one tale.

Now may you see what was done before the Marriage; God knoweth what hath been done since: But she had already gotten this Derrham into her Service, and trained him upon occasions, as sending of Errands, and writing of Letters when her Secretary was out of the way, to come often into her Privy Chamber. And she had gotten also into her Privy Chamber to be one of her Chamberers, one of the Women which had before lien in the Bed with her and Derrham: What this pretended is easy to be conjectur'd. Thus much we know for the beginning; whereof we thought meet to advertise you, to the intent afore specify'd: And what shall further succeed and follow of this matter, we shall not fail to advertise you thereof accordingly.

You shall also receive herein inclosed a Packet of Letters, directed unto Sir Henry Knevet, his Graces Ambassador with the Emperor, which his Highness's Pleasure is you shall see convey'd unto him by the next Post that passeth from thence into the Emperor's Court. Thus fare you right heartily well.

Besides the Persons specify'd in this Letter, one Thomas Culpeper (being of the same Name with the Queen's Mother) was indicted for the same Fault (as our Histories have it,) which he and Derrham at their Arraignment confessing, Culpeper had his Head cut off, and Derrham was hang'd and quarter'd. But it rested not here; for the Lord William Howard (the Queen's Uncle, newly return'd from an Ambassage in France) and his Wife, and the old Dutcheffs of Norfolk, and divers of the Queen's and the said Dutcheffs's Kindred and Servants, and a Butter-wife, were indicted of Misprision of Treason (as concealing this Fact,) and condemn'd to perpetual Prison; though yet by the King's Favour some of them at length were released. The King yet not satisfi'd thus, for more authorising his Proceeding, referr'd the Business to the Parliament sitting the sixteenth of January, 1541. Where upon Petition of both Houses, that he would not vex himself, but give his Royal Assent to what they should do, they had leave to proceed, and together Thanks given them that they took his Sorrow to be theirs. Hereupon they attainted the Queen and the Lady Jane Rochfort, as also Culpeper, Derrham, &c. And so the Queen and Lady Jane Rochfort (Wife to the late Lord Rochfort, and noted to be a particular Instrument in the death of Queen Anne) were brought to the Tower, and after confession of their Faults, had their Heads cut off.

An Act also pass'd, declaring that it shall be lawful for any of the King's Subjects, if themselves do perfectly know, or by vehement Presumption do perceive any Will, Act or Condition of Lightness of Body in her which shall be the Queen of this Realm, to disclose the same to the King, or some of his Council; but they shall not openly blow it abroad, or whisper it, until it be divulg'd by the King or his Council. If the King, or any of his Successors shall marry a Woman which was before incontinent, if she conceal the same, it shall be High-Treason, &c. But this Act was repeal'd 1 Edward VI. 12. and 1 Mary I.

Divers other Acts also pass'd, whereof I have thought fit to set down these: That they who under colour of a false Token or counterfeit Letter got other Men's Money into their hands, should be punish'd at the Discretion of those before whom they were convicted, any way but death.

It was declar'd also, how many Ston'd-Horses every Man should keep according to his degree. But this was afterwards repeal'd; though yet of special Use in defence of the Kingdom, when due regard of the Persons were had.

Further it was declared, who might also shoot in Guns and Cross-bows.

Moreover, That shooting with Bow and Arrows should be used, and unlawful Games debar'd.

The Order also for Punishment of Murder and Blood-shed in the King's Court, with all the Ceremonies thereof, was set down; the occasion

That in certain Cases there should be Tryal of Treason in any Country where the King by Commission will appoint; and this saved much Trouble and Charges: For as divers things were made Treason in this King's Time, which yet were repeal'd afterwards; so the Lords of the Council were not only continually vexed with these businesses, but the King at great Charges in remanding the Prisoners.

K. Henry takes to himself the Title of King of Ireland.

The Kings of England for a long time rul'd Ireland by no other Name than Lords thereof, our King now thought fit to change the Title, and honour a populous and warlike Kingdom with the Title of a King. Therefore in a Parliament held at this time in that Country, he gave order to be declar'd King of Ireland; which was proclaim'd here during this Parliament, and finally enacted 35 Henry VIII. 3. This being notify'd to James, much offended him; though whether out of Emulation for his assuming the Title, or that himself had any Design on this Country (as by his laying claim to divers parts thereof, and by former Passages may be suspected) is uncertain. Howbeit, understanding that Mac-Connel and some Scots, who held part thereof (as Leileus hath it) were not disturb'd in their Possession, he more patiently suffer'd it. Our King on the other side, finding none contested with him for the Sovereignty of the Island, did not so much regard their particular Right: Though yet, as there were divers Commotions about this time, he had occasion to hold a hand over the disaffected Persons: But by the Diligence of Sir Anthony Saintleger, whom the King had lately made Deputy there, all was quickly compos'd.

Sheriffs of London committed for arresting a Parliament Man.

During this Session of Parliament some Wrong was offer'd (as our Histories say) to their ancient Privileges; a Burgeiss of theirs being arrested: Whereof the King understanding, not only gave way to their releasing him, but Punishment of the Offenders; insomuch, that the Sheriffs of London were committed to the Tower, and one Delinquent to a place call'd Little-ease, others to Newgate. By which means the King (whose Masterpiece it was to make use of his Parliaments) not only let Foreign Princes see the good Intelligence betwixt him and his Subjects, but kept them all at his devotion: Which also he so industriously procur'd, that rather than he would seem to require more at this time than they had lately given, he borrow'd divers Sums of Money of Men, above fifty Pound yearly in his Books (which he look'd on often) giving them in lieu thereof Privy Seals as Security for their repayment in two Years; by this means suffering his Parliament rather to take notice of his Wants, than to supply them; which yet serv'd to prepare them for his next occasion. The Irish Nobility also being well inform'd of these Proceedings, and collecting thereby the Absoluteness of the King's Power every where, the Chief of them this Year submitted themselves, and acknowledged him now their King; among whom Eustace the great O Neale presented himself, and was made Earl of Tyrone.

Octob. July 28.

The Diet of Ratisbonne being ended, the Emperor from thence sent to the Pope, desiring him to permit an Interview at Lucca, which the Pope accorded; whereupon the Emperor passing thro' Milan, came by land to Genova, and thence taking Water to Lucca, where the Pope now was. And here many things were to be determin'd: For first, the Emperor (as he had engag'd himself to the Protestants of the last Diet) urged a Council, which the Pope thought fit to hold at Vicenza, where it was last indicted: But the Venetians oppos'd it, as fearing lest the Turk, with whom they had lately made a Peace, should think it was call'd to confederate all Christian Princes against him. Thus was the Council again frustrated: Other Affairs being also interrupted by the Ambassador of Francis, who made divers Instances, that at least the Bodies of Rincon and Fergose might be restor'd; hoping that together with the Law of Nations, they would not yet violate that of Nature, and deny them the Rights of Burial. But the Emperor still protesting himself to be no way conscious of this fact, omitted Answer to the rest. This while the Turk having gotten some places of Importance in Hungary, and overthrown the Army of Ferdinand (led by Roc-candolph) the Pope endeavour'd a Reconciliation of all the present Differences; desiring the Emperor to give to Francis the Estate of Milan, and him to restore all he had in Piedmont to the Duke of Savoy. But the Emperor resolute not to leave Milan, broke off the Treaty; for the rest, preparing for an Expedition to Algier: His Fleet consisting of 64 Gallies, 200 Ships, 100 Frigots, 20000 Foot, and 2000 Horse, besides Volunteers and Seamen. Setting sail with these from Majorca, and other places where his Fleet attended him, he came in two days to the Coast of Algier, defended by Azan-Aga, and about 800 Turks (being Cavallery for the most part) and about 5000 Moors, Renegadoes. It was now October 23, 1541. when his Men landed without much resistance. The first thing done was to require Azan-Aga to yield the Place, and turn Christian, as being the Son of Christian Parents, and born in Spain: But he answer'd, that he desir'd no more Honour than to comply with his Loyalty, and die by the hands of so excellent an Emperor. But as the Season of the Year was far advanced, foul Weather began; so that they fought neither often, nor with much Advantage on either side. At last, a huge Tempest arose, which finally destroy'd 150 Ships, little and great, with all that was in them, save some Horses and a few Men: And now the Tempest still increasing, the Emperor, who between Noise and Danger could not sleep, demanded of some Seamen then with him, how long the rest of the Fleet might live, if the Tempest continu'd? they answer'd, At most two Hours: He demanded then, what a clock it was? they told him, Half an hour past eleven: Whereupon he said to them, Comfort yourselves; at Twelve the Friars and Nuns rise, and will pray for us. But the Tempest continu'd till far in the next Day, when the miserable Carcasses of Ships and Men swimming in some places, and drowning in others, made an hideous spectacle; while if any got to Land, the Arabs and Moors without mercy kill'd them. And now, besides the above-mention'd Ships, fourteen or fifteen Gallies were cast away; by which means not only the Artillery and Victual fail'd, but even the Desire to continue the Siege: For one such another Tempest would have destroy'd all. Yet there was much difficulty in embarking of the Soldiers, for the Ships did not suffice to carry them: Therefore they were forc'd to cast overboard their most generous Horses, who swimming from one Ship to another, were drowned at 1541. at last, not without much compassion of all, and especially their Masters. The rest of the Navigation homewards yet was not prosperous, many Ships perishing. At last, the Emperor came to Calari in Sardigna, where through contrary Winds, he was constrain'd to pass his Christmas; at length fair weather appearing, he arriv'd in Spain: And this was the third unfortunate Voyage to Algier, it having been twice before attempted in vain.

He returns unsuccessful.

1542. A Rupture with Scotland being now secretly resolv'd, our King thought fit to assure Francis, sending for this purpose to Sir William Paget his Ambassador there, Instructions, which were chiefly to hold Francis to his Treaties of perpetual Peace. But Francis saying it was made upon certain Conditions, which were broken by our King, it was answer'd the Treaty was sans Condition, and when it were not, that he had broken none. But Francis requiring then Assistance for Milan, as was promis'd; it was reply'd, that both by the Treaty last offer'd by the Duke of Norfolk, and another formerly by Pommeray, this was spoken of indeed, but that there was complicated with it another Condition, that he should forsake the Bishop of Rome, which he refus'd to do; but as this was interrupted with some wrangling, so there was no little debate about Ships detain'd on either side, our Officers having with-held some, under pretence they were Pirates, and they again seizing on ours by way of Reprisal; so that matters were breaking forth to an open War. Which being advertiz'd to our King, gave him little hope of Amity on that part, and consequently made him not only desist from a Treaty of Marriage betwixt the Duke of Orleans, and the Princess Mary, propos'd formerly by Pommeray and now renew'd, but seek friends elsewhere (as will appear hereafter.) Our King refusing in the mean time to enter into League with him against the Emperor.

Though the right Line of the Plantagenets were extinct in the Countess of Salisbury, and consequently no fear of pretence to Succession, on that part, there remain'd yet a natural Son of Edward IV, call'd Sir Arthur Plantagenet (created by King Henry VIII, Viscount Lisle) who came to his end on this occasion: This Lord, during his Lieutenantcy in Calais, being suspected, as consenting to a practice of some of his Servants, (whereby they conspir'd to deliver that Town to the French,) was thereupon sent for, and committed to the Tower; but upon due Examination his Innocency appearing, the King at this time, not only gave order to release him, but for his more comfort sent him a Diamond Ring, and a Gracious Message; which so overjoy'd and dilated his Spirits, that the night following he dy'd.

The Lord Lisle dies of Joy. March 3.

Feb. The Emperor being now in Spain, Ferdinand holds a Diet at Spire, where he requires Aid against the Turk; whereof Francis being advertis'd, sends Francis Oliver thither with charge to represent, First the Assassinate of Rincon and Fre-gose, pretending it to be the more heinous, in that Rincons Employment was to hinder the Turk from invading Hungary. Secondly, to dissuade them from taking Arms against the Turks, till their own differences were compos'd. Lastly, to represent both the levity of the Hungarians, and their disaffection to the German Nation: And therefore, that they should fortifie their strong places betwixt Austria and Hungary, and the other Confines, without taking much regard to the rest. As for Pacification in Religion, that they should conform themselves on all sides to the Confession of our Faith, left us by the Nicene Council. And for other points, if they could not agree in them, they should not yet be occasion of hate or division. But the wiser sort, who believ'd that Rincon's Dispatches (when they were to be seen) would have told another tale, did not much believe the first part of his Speech: As for the second, since it tended only to give Hungary into the Turks hands, they rejected it wholly: And for the last, they regarded it little (though a wife and charitable advice) as being resolv'd already of their Religion. After him, the Bishop of Modena, the Popes Legate, tells them that the Pope desir'd Peace in Christendom, and provision for Wars against the Turk. As for the Council which had been suspended hitherto by the Emperors consent to try if a Concord might, the while, be wrought in Germany, that it was reason to call it. Only that Germany could be no fit place for holding thereof, since his Holiness resolving to be present, could not indure so long a Journey; or such a change of Air, besides, he fear'd it would be turbulent. Nevertheless, for satisfying them, he was content the same should be assembled at Trent, (that is to say) in the Borders of Germany. Ferdinand and the Catholics accept this place with thanks, (when it might not be held at Ratisbonne or Colen.) But the Protestants wholly dislik'd it. And now the French Ambassadors finding themselves but slighted, go thence discontented. And so the Diet brake up (after War had been decreed against the Turk, and Peace establish'd in the Empire.) And May 22. the Council was indicted to begin in November following.

March 11.

A Council design'd to meet at Trent.

April 11. May 22.

Francis being now inform'd by his Ambassadors that the Germans were so far from receiving his Advice, that they thought him to be a perturber of the Peace of Christendom, is not yet discourag'd. Therefore, after a Procession made in Paris for success in his War, and a Present sent to the Turk of six hundred Marks of Silver curiously wrought, and five hundred Vestments for those that attended him, together with a request that he would send his Fleet against the Emperor, and a publick defiance sent to Charles, he invades his Territories in five several places; against them in Brabant he employs the Duke of Longueville, who was to joyn with Martin Rossen, General for the Duke of Cleves, to invade that part: Against Artois the Duke of Vendosme: Against Luxemburg the Duke of Orleans: In Piedmont Monsieur du Bellay his Lieutenant there: And against Perpignan (the chief Town of Roussillon, and the Barrier of Spain to the Southward) the Dauphin, promising to second him in Person.

Francis sends rich Presents to the Turk.

July. His great preparations against the Emperor.

He began first in Piedmont, as being the immediate way to his desir'd Milan: In which he held these places, Turino, Montcalier, Savillan, Montdevis, Pignarola, &c. For the Emperor flood, Asti, Vercelli, Ulpian, Fossan, Quierasco, and Alba; among which Quierasco was first attempted and yielded: Vendosme in Artois taking and razing Tourneham: The Duke of Orleans (assisted with five hundred Horse from Christiern the third King of Denmark) took Luxemburg and other places; which yet René Prince of Orance and Count of Nassau recover'd shortly after. Nevertheless, Rossen deceiv'd him with a plain Trick: For commanding his Infantry to lie flat in a Champian Field behind his Cavalry, the Prince of Orance who did not imagine he was so strong, charg'd him; but the Foot rising, they and their Horse together defeated him. Whereupon Rossen and Longueville being about thirty five thousand Men, besieg'd Antwerp; but it was stoutly defended not only by the Natives, but by foreign Merchants, and particularly the English; whereupon, Rossen raising Siege, and going to Louvain, demands 1541. demands of them Money, Victuals, Artillery and Ammunition; which they of Lovain accorded in part, commanding thereupon some Wine to be carried in Carts to the Gate. But the Scholars, unwilling both to let it go, and suspecting besides that when the Gates were so embarrass'd, the Enemy behind the Hoghead might get into the Town, cut off the Harness from the Horses, and went to the Artillery planted upon the Wall, and discharg'd it upon the Enemy: Whereupon Roffen departing, spoil'd the Country round about. This while, the Daulphin brought an Army of forty thousand Men, whereof fourteen thousand Switz, and four thousand Horse to Perpignan, which he besieg'd, hoping Barbarossa and the Turkish Fleet would second him, according to his request by Polin, whom Francis employ'd in those parts. But the Town being bravely defended, and the Emperor besides preparing to relieve it, he rais'd the Siege, and the rather that Winter was now coming on. This while, the Emperor omitted not to complain to the Pope of Francis, protesting, that he both disturb'd the Peace of Christendom and the Council, and hindred him from opposing the Turk. Whereupon, the Pope desiring to reconcile them, the Emperor answer'd, It was in vain to make Treaties with those who did hold none; desiring him therefore rather to take Arms against him, as a Confederate with the common Enemy of Christendom.

Decemb.
1541. The excuse from James, formerly mentioned, being not held satisfactory, our King prepares for War; nevertheless, he thought not fit to discover himself, but as late as he could. Therefore upon James's request, he appoints Commissioners to examine businesses betwixt them, not omitting yet to levy Men; of which James being advertis'd, rais'd Forces likewise (as is before set down.) During this Treaty, some Inroads being made into Scotland, and Ports attempted, I find by Lesleus twenty-eight Scottish Ships were taken. Whereupon, the Scots entering the English Marches, Sir Robert Bowes (who resisted them) with divers others were taken Prisoners; without being permitted yet to ransom themselves. Hereupon the Duke of Norfolk with the Kings Army march'd forward, but upon a second motion of Peace stays at York: And together with the Earl of Southampton, Bishop of Durham, and Sir Anthony Brown, treats with certain Scottish Commissioners, who having variety of Instructions, (which they shew'd one after another) and finally proposing an Interview, were thought to be sent thither only to gain time, Winter now coming on, and the French King having so much to do at home, as is before related. So that the King commanded the Duke of Norfolk to proceed, and together published a Declaration of the causes of this War. Which being extant in our Records, and set forth at large by Hall, I shall not need to insert here, though yet for satisfaction of the Reader, I shall extract some particularities from thence.

The chief causes I conceive, were, that James entertain'd some of the chief Rebels of the North. That he denied some grounds, (though of very small value) for which good Evidences were produc'd. That he frustrated our King, after a promise of an Interview. That his Subjects made an Inroad while the Treaty was on foot. Besides all which, King Henry claim'd Homage and Fealty, as due to him out of an ancient Title to that Crown; the demand whereof he said he had neglected a great while, because of his Nephews Minority, and other kind Reasons, his Title being by lineal Succession, and recogniz'd for many Ages by the Kings of Scotland, to the Reign of Henry the Sixth: Which he prov'd First, by History: Secondly, by Instruments of Homage, by the several Kings, and divers great Persons, seal'd with their Seals, and remaining in his Treasury. Thirdly, by Registers and Records, judicially and authentically made. The Historical part, he began chiefly (that I may omit the relation of Brutus and his three Sons) at Anno Dom. 900. (being 642 years past) shewing that Edward Son of Allured had it under his Dominion. Atbelstane made one Constantine King thereof. Eldred took Homage of Irfe [or Ericus] King of Scots, and Edgar of Kinald (or Kenneth). That this was interrupted yet in Edward King and Martyr his time. But Malcolm did Homage to Knute, and Edward the Confessor making War against Malcolm, overthrew him, and gave his Kingdom to Malcolm his Son, who made him Homage and Fealty; that Malcolm did Homage to William the Conqueror, and after him to William Rufus, but failing in his Duty, was deposed; and Edgar Brother to the last Malcolm, and Son to the first, ordain'd in that Estate, who did his Homage and Fealty accordingly. This Edgar did Homage to Henry the First, David did Homage to Matild the Empress, but refus'd it to Stephen, as having done it to Matild; but after his Death, David's Son made his Homage to Stephen. William King of Scots, and David his Brother, with all the chief Nobles of Scotland, made Homage to Henry the Second, his Son, with reservation of their Duty to his Father. This William after much Rebellion and Resistance, during the absence of Henry the Second, made his Peace and Composition with his Homage and Fealty; he also came to Canterbury, and there did Homage to Richard the First. William did Homage to John, on a Hill beside Lincoln, and made his Oath upon the Cross of Hubert, then Archbishop of Canterbury. Alexander King of Scots married the Daughter of Henry III. and did his Homage at York. Alexander came to the Coronation of Edward I. and did his Duty: John Baliol made Homage and Fealty to Edward I. Robert Bruce made War against the Baliols, which interrupted the business of forty four years. But afterwards Edward Baliol prevailing, made Homage to Edward III. After this, David Bruce, though on the contrary Faction, made Homage to Edward III. Edward Baliol, who had the clear Title, surrendred the Crown to Edward III, at Roxenburgh, who thereupon caus'd himself to be Crown'd, and for a time entertain'd and enjoyed it as Proprietary and Owner of the Crown, both by confiscation and voluntary Surrender. In Richard II, and Henry IV. their times, some interruption happen'd by reason of inward dissensions in this Kingdom; yet Henry V. commanded the Scots to attend him in his Journey to France. And in this time the Realm of Scotland being descended on the Stuarts, James Stuart King of Scots, made Homage to King Henry VI. at Windsor. All which Homages (though interrupted sometimes for more than sixty years) were yet within the memory of Man. Of which therefore, Instruments made and sealed with the Seals of the Kings of Scotland remain; so that it was not for the Earldom of Huntingdon (as the Scots pretend) but for the Kingdom of Scotland. As for Records and Registers, that he had divers which were Authentical, and among others that of Edward I. in discussion of the Title of Scotland, then challeng'd by twelve Competitors. And that Sentence was given for Baliol, who accordingly enjoy'd the Realm. That in a Parliament following, they did agree to the Superiority of the King of England, and enjoining their Determination, did particularly, and severally make 1541. make Homage and Fealty with Proclamation, that whosoever withdrew himself from doing his Duty therein, should be reputed as a Rebel; and so all made Homage and Fealty to Edward I. That during this discussion, the Realm was rul'd by Guardians deputed by him, and all Castles and Holds surrendered to him as to the Superior Lord. And in the time of Vacation, Benefices, Offices, Fees, Promotions, pass'd as in the right of this Crown of England; Sheriffs also nam'd and appointed, Writs and Precepts made, obey'd and executed. And that at this time, the Bishops of St. Andrews and Glasco were not Archbishops, but recogniz'd the Archbishop of York, whose Authority extended over all their Country. That sithence the time of Henry VI. this Kingdom was lacerated and torn by diversity of Titles till his time. So that though Edward IV. after great Travels, having attain'd quietness in this Realm, finally made preparation of War against Scotland, yet he was prevented by Death. As for Richard III. that he usurp'd the Kingdom till Henry VII. his Father overthrew him, (which Henry VII. by reason of his Estate not fully settled at home, forbore to compel the Scots to do their Duty.) And for his own time, that twenty-one years past of it in his Nephews Minority, when he had more care to bring him out of danger to the place of a King, than to receive of him Homage when he had full possession of the same.

The conclusion of this Declaration yet seem'd to be ambiguous; as not pretending directly to insist upon the Claim, though he saith, that such be the works of God Superiour over all, to suffer occasions to be ministred, whereby due Superiority may be known, demanded, and required.

How the Scots endeavour to evade it. The Scottish Writers tell the business otherwise: Not denying yet but Athelstane was King of the whole Island by the testimony of divers of our Britain Writers. Nevertheless, that their words were so to be understood, as the further parts of Scotland were not comprehended therein. As for the Homage done, that it was for the Earldom of Huntingdon (though as there was no Investiture thereof in the King of Scots, till the time of our Henry I. when David married the Daughter and Heir of the Earl of Huntingdon and Northumberland, it reaches not to Homages formerly made.) Again, among those who did Homage, some were reputed Kings of Northumberland, rather than Scotland. And for Baliol's resigning the Crown, they say, the Nobles did not consent to it: And many other things, which for avoiding prolixity, I omit; desiring the Reader to believe, that I am so far from undertaking to define the Point, as (in an Historical way) I have only produc'd such Notes as my leisure would suffer me to gather at this time: Professing, for the rest, that I should not in any wise have intermeddled therewith, but that Hall by setting forth the Declaration, gave the occasion.

These proceedings from time to time being advertis'd to Francis, caus'd him to send Monsieur de Morvilliers to congratulate the constancy of James in refusing an Interview, which he attributed to his resolution not to forsake the Roman Church: Advising him for the rest, to stand upon his Guard; and for that purpose, sending him Money and Artillery.

And now the Army being ready to march on, William Fitz-Williams, Earl of Southampton, Captain of the Foreward, died at New-Castle; a brave Lord, and so much esteem'd, that for the honour of his Memory, his Standard was born in the Foreward in all this Expedition. The year thus being far spent, the Duke of Norfolk Lieutenant General, accompanied with the Earls of Shrewsbury, Darby, Cumberland, Surrey, Hereford, Rutland, and other Lords of the Northern parts; Sir Anthony Brown, Master of the Kings Horse, and Sir John Gage Comptroller of his House, and above twenty thousand Men (the Earl of Angus also being there present) enter Scotland 21 of October, and finding no resistance, burnt in eight days above twenty Villages and Towns: Whereupon the Bishop of Orkney, and James Leimouth came on their Kings part to require Peace; but the Conditions not pleasing, the Treaty was dissolv'd. Nevertheless, our Army retreated presently to Berwick, as being betwixt the rigour of the season and want of Victuals, constrain'd thereunto. So that though Lesleys faith, the English retir'd upon hearing that the Scottish Army approach'd; this yet by others is thought improbable, because they invaded not England till three weeks after the Duke of Norfolk was at Berwick, and had licens'd many of his Soldiers. About which time therefore the Scottish Army being assembled, they entred England on the West Marches with an Army of fifteen thousand, or (as some say) a greater number. But Thomas the Bastard Dacres and Musgrave, having first sent to Sir Thomas Wharton, Warden of the Marches, to come to their Aid, and then leaving a Stale or Ambush on a Hill side, came forwards with an hundred light Horse, which being charg'd by some of the Scots, retir'd towards their Stale, and to Wharton now appearing, who had not yet above three hundred Men (as our Writers say.) But whatsoever the Stratagem was, the Scots believing (it seems) the Duke of Norfolk was there with all his power, suddenly, as Men amaz'd, fled. The English-men pursu'd, and took the Earls of Casselles and Glencarne, the Lord Maxwell Admiral of Scotland, the Lord Fleming, the Lord Somervel, the Lord Oliphant, Lord Gray, and Sir Oliver Sinclere, the Kings Minion (as our Historians term him,) and divers others of note, to the number of two hundred and above, and eight hundred of the meaner sort (so that some had two or three Prisoners,) and twenty-four pieces of Ordnance, with much Arms and Baggage.

The Scottish Writers tell the business a little otherwise; confessing yet the foresaid Prisoners to be taken, and that their Men ran away, and were defeated. But some say, the reason of it, was, that Sir Oliver Sinclere being suddenly declar'd their General, when the English appear'd, the Nobles took it so ill, that they car'd not to fight. They say also, that the King was at Solway (where this encounter hap'ned) a little before, and no further off than Carlawrock, when the blow was given; which, perhaps, made some think that he was present at the Fight, and receiv'd a wound, of which presently after he died, and not of Sorrow.

James being now return'd, had in recompence of his Misfortunes, a Daughter born, afterward call'd Mary; which yet, together with the many Divertisements his Servants gave, could not keep him from a deep Melancholy, which was augmented also (as the Scottish and our Writers say) by the sudden Murder of an English Herald, whom our King sent thither to ransom Prisoners (though yet none of his Subjects, but Leech a Lincolnshire Rebel, kill'd him:) All which made that impression in him, that he died within few days after, and was buried near his first Wife Magdalene, in the Abby of Holy-Rood. He was of a middle Stature, yet well compact and strong, given much in his youth to the love of Women, to which his Governors gave way, thinking thereby to rule him the longer. This hindered him him not yet to be active in all State Affairs, and frugal in his own; qualities rarely found in Princes so much addicted to their Pleasure. No Man endur'd Labour, Cold, Hunger better (as his many Expeditions in Person against Rebels, shew'd.) Under pretence of favouring the poorer sort, he was noted to be severe to his Nobility, which made them less ready when he had occasion to use them. Infomuch, that (as Buchanan hath it) he could not persuade them to come to Battel with the Duke of Norfolk.

The Murder of our English Herald being related to our King, mightily incens'd him: And therefore he not only requir'd Leech, (who yet was not demanded till after the death of King James, nor executed till May following;) but sent to his Ambassador Paget in France, both to acquaint Francis therewith, (whom he lately knew had suffer'd in the like kind,) and to desire him not to assist James. But the answer hereunto was cold, as will appear hereafter.

Dec. 22. The news of the Kings Death, and the Princess Birth being brought to our King, awakened in him new Counsels: So that instead of pursuing War against Scotland, he began to think how he might recover the young Daughter thence, and match his Son Edward to her. To which also he was so intentive, that he sent a Dispatch to his Ambassador Paget, commanding him carefully to observe what past betwixt France and Scotland, as being jealous lest Francis should get or detain her from him. And there was reason to fear it, Francis having by the intervention of the Queen and Cardinal Beton, a great Party there. Nevertheless, as our King knew how much it concern'd either Nation, that all causes of Hostility should be taken away, and both Kingdoms united: So he doubted not but many, especially the wiser sort, would concur with him.

Cardinal Beton forges a Will of the Scots King. And now in Scotland two Factions were eminent: One that of the Queen, seconded by Cardinal Beton, who (as the Scottish Writers say) forg'd a Will, by which himself, assisted with three of the most powerful Nobility, should govern the State, and with him all the French Faction joyn'd. James Hamilton, Earl of Arran, chief of the other side (though observ'd to be a lover of quiet) was yet encourag'd by his followers to assume that Dignity; as being so near of Blood, and the Princess so young, that many occasions might happen, whereof he might prevail himself: Which reasons also inclin'd him to depend on our King.

Dec. 19. Stow. Records. While these things past in Scotland, the Prisoners taken in the last Battle, were by Sir Henry Savill and Sir Thomas Wentworth, conducted from York to London, whither they came Decemb. 19. wearing every one (as our King had appointed) for a cognizance, a red St. Andrews Cross, and were presently sent to the Tower, whence shortly after King Henry for more ostentation commanded Sir John Gage, Comptroller of his Household, to bring them by two and two together in new Gowns of black Damask, and other Apparel suitable (all at his cost) from the Tower to the Star-Chamber, where Thomas Lord Audley, the Lord Chancellor, was to tell them, what cause King Henry had of War against them, both for denying their Homage, and invading his Realm without Defiance, and keeping his Subjects without suffering them to make Ransom, contrary to the Laws of the Marches. Nevertheless, that such was his Benignity, that he would shew them kindness for unkindness, and right for wrong: And thereupon (after their promise to remain true Prisoners) commanded that they should be no more return'd to Prison, 1541. The Scots Lords taken lately committed to custody. but brought to divers Noble Houses, there to be regal'd and made much of. Thus the Archbishop of Canterbury had the Earl of Castelles commended to him; the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Glencarne; Sir Anthony Brown, the Lord Maxwell; the Lord Chancellor; the Lord Somerswell; Sir Thomas Lee, the Lord Oliphant; the Duke of Suffolk, Sir Oliver Sinclere; Thomas Thurlaby (lately made first Bishop of Westminster) Robert Erskin; and many others, were with divers of our chief Nobility, where having past some time with as much contentment as the news of their Kings Death (now brought) permitted, they forgot not to express how glad they would be that a Match might succeed betwixt our Prince and their Princess, promising also their furtherance therein, which being related to our King, was taken so well, as they were not only dismiss'd upon Hostages to be given for their return (when they were not able to effect this Match,) but richly rewarded. After which, again, being feasted, they kept their Journey towards Scotland, till they came to the Duke of Suffolk (the Kings Lieutenant in the Northern parts) being then at Newcastle, where their Hostages being receiv'd, they had Licence to go home; and with them also went the Earl of Angus, and his Brother Sir George Dowglas, (now fifteen years absent from their Country) who, during their long stay in these parts had a liberal Pension bestow'd on them by our King; for which also they promis'd their best assistance on all Occasions. Cardinal Beton, who this while (by pretext of his counterfeit Will) had made himself Viceroy, was now (upon detection of the Forgery) depos'd, and James Hamilton, Earl of Arran, chosen in his place: A Nobleman follow'd by many, both for his nearness of blood to the Crown, and that the Cardinals cruelty and ambition had made him so hated. Besides, there was found after the Kings death certain Papers, in which the names of above three hundred of the principal Nobility and Gentry (and among them James Hamilton) were accus'd as Criminals: And this again made them more confident of his Protection. Moreover, he was noted willing to inform himself in the Controversies of Religion, and gave hope of a mild and temperate Disposition. His first publick Action was the convoking of a Parliament in March following; whereof our King being advertis'd, sent Sir Ralph Sadler (his Secretary) thither, to procure the Marriage formerly mentioned, and a perpetual Peace: Scottish Ambassadors being also deputed to treat thereof with our King. What Sir Ralph Sadler's first Instructions were, appears not by our Records, more than is formerly related out of the Scottish Writers: But by a subsequent dispatch, dated May 6. I find that our King, in reward of some business that the Viceroy should effect, had promis'd his Daughter the Lady Elizabeth in Marriage to his Son: And because our King passionately desir'd to have the young Princess into his hands, both that he intended to marry her to his Son Prince Edward, and that he feared the French would prevent him, I nothing doubt but this was the affair intimated betwixt them. Our Records also tell us, that George Dowglas, and the other Lords who were sent home, excus'd themselves at first, as neither knowing what they did, nor able to perform their Promises; so that though they had undertaken to procure the Marriage, and to get some Holds into their hands, where they might with more advantage set forth our Kings purposes, they declin'd it; alledging, among other difficulties, a certain fickleness in the Viceroy's Disposition, and that the French Party was so great.

great. Howbeit, upon further debate of the business, certain Scottish Ambassadors were sent hither, being Sir William Hamilton and Sir James Lermouth; but their Negotiation not pleasing, as being unwilling to admit other Governour than the Earl of Arrain, during the Queens Minority, or to deliver the Holds of Scotland, till she had Issue by Prince Edward, or to put her into our Kings custody, with some other Demands which were distastful by them, it was thought fit to send the Earl of Glencarne and Sir George Dowglass; who, I find, seconded the overture of the Contract of Marriage and perpetual Peace (which the first made) in more plausible terms: Yet not so, but that Sir George Dowglass was dispatched Post to Scotland to bring a more satisfactory Answer; which was obtain'd: Infomuch, that a Treaty for Marriage sign'd and seal'd, was brought back by those Scottish Ambassadors in August, 1543. (as Lesleus hath it.) And because I find among our Records this following Treaty of June 29. I shall enquire for no other.

First, That the Lords of Scotland shall have the Education of the Princess for a time: Yet so as it might be lawful for our King to send thither a Nobleman and his Wife with a Family, under twenty Persons to wait on her.

That at ten years of Age she should be brought into England, the Contract being first finished by a Proxy in Scotland.

That within two Months after the date hereof, six Noble Scots should be given as Hostages for the performance of the foresaid Conditions on their part: And that if any of them died, the number of them should be supplied.

Furthermore, it was agreed that the Realm of Scotland (by that name) should preserve its Laws and Rights: And that Peace should be made for as long time as was desir'd, the French being excluded.

Nevertheless, the Queen, Cardinal, and all the Clergy oppos'd this Treaty, and the Cardinal so particularly, that he was remov'd to a Chamber apart, or (as others have it) into a Prison, till the main question of the Marriage was voted and agreed, and Hostages promis'd for performance thereof. But as the Cardinal found means to corrupt his Keeper, so he escap'd; and then began again to trouble all, using for this purpose the help of the Queen-Mother, and the pretext, it was unfit that the Dowglasses, being wholly devoted to the English, should from a long Banishment be admitted to the Supream Council concerning publick Affairs. Besides, he got huge sums of Money from the Clergy, upon colour that there was no other way to redeem themselves from imminent ruine. Furthermore, he perswaded that the Hostages should not be sent into England; he procur'd also that our Ambassador should be contumeliously us'd; whereof he complaining to the Viceroy, had no other Answer, but that the Cardinal had so discompos'd all things, that he could give no remedy for the present. The Question was then, what course they should take about the Hostages left in England, upon Condition that the late Nobles who were Prisoners should return, in case the Marriage and Peace took no effect. But the Cardinal answer'd, That Kindred, Friends, Children, and all should be sacrific'd for the good of their Country. Howbeit, Gilbert Kenneth Earl of Casselles could not be perswaded to stay; for having left two Brothers his Pledges, he said he would redeem their Lives with his own: And thereupon, though many dehorted him, he went into England. Which generous Counsel succeeded so well, that after a large commendation given him by our King, he was dismiss'd with his Brothers freely, and richly rewarded. On the other side, he was so offended with the rest, that he detain'd all the Scottish Shipping in his Ports, and resolv'd to denounce War against them. Whereupon the Cardinal and Queen-Mother inform'd the French King thereof, and that the Factions were such, as there was danger both Kingdoms should be united; desiring him further, to send over Matthew Stuart Earl of Lennox, as being of great power in that Country, and noted then to be adverse to the Hamiltons: Besides, it added to his Reputation, that it was thought the last King, if he had died without Issue Male, would have design'd him his Heir and Successor, and gotten it confirm'd by Parliament. And to invite him the more, there was some secret hope given, he might marry the Queen-Mother, and divers other things set down by Buchanan. These Motives, together with the French Kings approbation and promise of assistance, made this young Lord to resolve to repair to Scotland; whereof the Viceroy being inform'd, indeavours to get the young Princess out of her Mothers Hands; hoping thereby not only to govern all, but to draw the English on his side; but the design being vented to the Cardinal, a Guard was given to the young Queen.

In the mean while the Earl of Lennox arrives out of France, without discovering yet any thing of his Intentions; only he tells his Friends in private the Promises made him, and what help he might expect from the French King. Whereupon they exhorting him to try his strength, he gather'd four thousand Men and advances; whereof Hamilton being advertiz'd, and finding himself inferior in Power, sent to treat of Peace, which follow'd, and an agreement for the present that the Queen should be brought to Sterling, and four principal Persons should have care of her Education: And the rather, that it was suspected that the Earl of Arrain would have deliver'd her to the English. Whereupon she was conducted by Lennox unto the place appointed, and committed unto the tuition of Grames, Erskin, Lindsey, and Levison, and shortly after Crown'd. The Viceroy being thus frustrate, and for the rest, not much favour'd by the People, suffer'd himself to be gain'd by the Cardinal; to whom he shew'd himself so obsequious, as he seem'd to hold the Name rather than the Power of a Viceroy. Infomuch, that the Cardinal, who a little before was in danger of suffering for a notable Forgery, now absolutely govern'd all. Whereof our King being advertis'd, did no longer hope to recover the Queen by the help of the Viceroy, but resolv'd openly to demand her, upon pretext that there was fear of her being convey'd into France; and in case of refusal, to denounce War. The Message hereupon being brought, the Scots utterly denied him, so that provision for War was made by our King. All things yet pass'd not so quietly in Scotland as was desir'd by that State; for as the Cardinal being of immoderate Ambition, could not indure the Earl of Lennox's Power, so he endeavour'd to suppress him; which he did also with much cunning. For whereas hope had been given him of a Marriage with the Queen, he advertis'd her to entertain him fairly till he had receiv'd an answer of the French King of a Letter, wherein, though he made Honourable mention of him, he thought it convenient yet the said Earl should be recall'd. It being not likely otherwise that the Kingdom would long continue in Peace. In the mean while, as Lennox was young, handsom, and gentile, and brought up in all exercises of a Cavalier, he pass'd his time in Tiltings, Masks, and other noble Disports; in which, though he had the Earl of Bothwell for Rival, this Lord yet appear'd so inferior to him, as he retir'd home : Nevertheless, Lenox finding himself at last deluded, and that all this was done only by the Queen and Cardinal, to have the more leisure to ruine him, he protested he would be reveng'd ; neither wanted there an opportunity : For thirty thousand Crowns being sent by the French King to him, in the disposing whereof, yet he was wilh'd to use the advice of the Queen and Cardinal, he distributed the Money amongst his Friends ; but the Cardinal alledging that the Money was sent to himself, and to be employ'd in Wars against the English, and that Lenox had intercepted it against all right, rais'd an Army to seize on him and the Money together. But as Lenox was not ignorant of these Preparatives, he gather'd in a short space an Army of ten thousand Men, saying, he would prevent the Cardinal ; who being now desirous to gain time, as knowing Lenox was not long able to maintain this Expence, entertain'd him with frequent Pollicitations and Messages ; Lenox also doubting lest some of his followers might forsake him, agrees with the Viceroy and him, and comes to Edenburgh, where (after a while) being advertiz'd, that some Treachery was intended, he conveys himself by night to Glasco, and from thence to Dunbritton ; after which, hearing both, that the Douglasses and the Hamiltons were agreed, and that through the calumnies of his Adversaries, the French King was alienated from him, he seem'd much troubled, and the rather, that some noble Persons who desir'd to end these Controversies, were suddenly committed. But as our King prepar'd now to invade Scotland, this business had another end than he could easily imagine.

And now if just causes of competition to the young Queen of Scotland hapned, no less just causes for War against Francis were given, of which I find the chief, or at least the most recent, were these :

Causes of a War with France.

That he with-held divers of our Ships, and seiz'd upon our Merchants Goods.

That he detain'd the Pension due yearly to King Henry.

That he had fortified Ardres to the prejudice of our English Pale, on which also he had incroach'd. Moreover divers ancient unkindnesses not sufficiently concocted remain'd in our Kings Breast : As that he had given his Daughter Magdalen to James, and afterward the Daughter of Guise, contrary to his Promise and Treaty.

That he had not deserted the Bishop of Rome, and consented to a Reformation, as he once promis'd.

That whereas with much freedom and confidence he had reveal'd divers Secrets to him, they had been disclosed again unto the Emperor, while he was at Aignes Mortes, and after at Paris. Besides which, there was a common quarrel taken betwixt the Emperor and our King, for having confederated himself with the Turk, &c. as is in the following Treaty. But to these Francis answer'd, That our King had fail'd also in not assisting him against the Emperor. Our King replied, that Francis had violated the Treaty first. Besides, he could not be ignorant of the Wars against his Rebels at that time ; howsoever these businesses were so roughly contested, that the Ambassadors were stay'd on both sides, though at length dismiss'd, and an open Rupture resolv'd. The consequence whereof having a good while since been prefigured by our King, made him determine to enter into League with the Emperor, and to call a Parliament.

March.

K. Henry's League with the Emperor.

The League with the Emperor was to this effect (as appears by our Records.)

I. That there should be Abolition of former Injuries.

II. A free Intercourse.

III. A perpetual Peace.

IV. That they should aid or countenance no Enemies of each other.

V. That Rebels or Fugitives should not be harbour'd, but upon warning given to be gone, if they obey'd not, to be banish'd and proscrib'd.

VI. He shall be taken for a Common Enemy who shall invade England, Guines, Calais, Berwick, Wight, Fersey, Garnsey, Man, Spain, Brabant, Flanders, Holland, Zeland, Hainault, Artois, Limburgh, Luxemburgh, Namours, Frise, Overyssell, Utrecht, Mechlin.

VII. And if he invade with ten thousand Men, the Prince invaded shall require Aid of the other, who shall send him within forty days, at his own charges, in this proportion, viz.

That if the Enemy fall on Calais, or the Castle and County of Guines, the Emperor shall send at least as many Soldiers, Horse and Foot, as may be paid for seven hundred Crowns the day, each Crown valued at forty five Sol' Tournois.

If on Wight, Fersey, Garnsey, Man, or England, the Emperor shall send for Aid, such a number of Foot as can be paid for seven hundred Crowns a day.

But if the Emperor be invaded in any of his Countries above-mentioned, the King of England shall send him for Aid, such a number of Foot at least, whose pay, considering their Cloaths, Diet, and Weapons, comes to seven hundred Crowns a day, each Crown worth forty Sol' Tournois.

And it is in the choice of him who demandeth Aid, whether he will have Men or Money, which Money shall be paid by the Month, consisting of twenty-eight days.

And whether Men or Money be requir'd, the Prince of whom it is demanded, is not bound to be at this charge above four Months in one Year. But if the Prince in whose Aid they are sent, will retain them longer, he may, at his own charge.

Neither Prince is bound to Aid the other in divers places at once : And if both shall be invaded at the same time by the King of France, the one shall not be bound to Aid the other.

If this Aid be demanded upon a false rumour, and the Enemy shall neither besiege any City or Fort, nor make Spoil, nor encamp in the Country of the Demandant, then the said Demandant is to repay the Money.

Concerning the Kingdom of Spain and Ireland, it is agreed, they shall Aid one another by sending Horse and Foot, or Ships at the cost of the Demandant : And concerning these two Kingdoms, the Number and Costs of the Aid shall be as the time, and occasion, and strength of the Prince, of whom it was demanded, will suffer : Which thing shall be referr'd to the conscience of the Prince so call'd upon.

And for the pay of the Soldiers, it shall be rated according to the Market of the Country wherein they are.

VIII. If any Article of this Treaty be violated by any of the Subjects, they shall be punish'd, and it remain.

IX. That no Letters of Merque shall be given without due warning, to the end the losses and wrongs may be otherwise repair'd by the Prince.

X. That because many scandalous and heretical Books are spread abroad by Translations, it is agreed that no Book written in English shall be Printed or Sold in Germany, or the Emperors Dominions ; Nor any Book written in Dutch, in in England, under Pain of Imprisonment to the Sellers and Printers, and burning of the said Books.

XI. That there shall be Intercourse of Traffick according to the Treaty made 1520. and confirm'd and order'd in the Treaty of Cambray, 5 August, 1529.

XII. That if there be any Damnification of the Subjects on either side, the wronged Party upon requisition may have the Cause heard, and due reparation made.

XIII. That when upon Invasion (as aforesaid) War is denounced, no Truce shall be made by either Prince without the consent of the other, except there be danger of Siege from the Enemy: In which case there may be Truce made (apart) for two Months, within which time he is to give notice to the other.

XIV. That no Peace shall be made, nor any Treaty severally with the French King, or any other to the prejudice of this, but this to continue firm.

XV. That none are to be comprehended in this Treaty, but by common consent; as also no Enemy to either, nor in whose Dominions the other hath any pretence.

XVI. This Treaty to be ratified by the two Princes, under their Princely Word and Oath, and under Pain to be infamous, and hated both by God and Man, and under Pledge of their Goods, so that it shall be lawful to invade the Realm and Dominions of the Infractor, to take Persons and Goods and carry them away, till Satisfaction be made: Provided, that they come not to this extremity, till a Diet or Meeting hath been requir'd, and Justice deny'd or delay'd.

XVII. This Treaty to be understood according to the simple and plain Tenor of the Words, and no Interpretation admitted otherwise.

XVIII. It is also covenanted and agreed, that, as soon as may be, the two Princes shall by their Ambassadors declare to the King of France (requiring his Answer thereto) viz.

1. They shall complain, that the Turk (Enemy to Christian Faith) had taken Boldness by his Friendship to invade Christendom.

2. That he renounce his Correspondence with the said Turk, recalling his Orators that are now resident with him.

3. That he satisfy for the Loss and Prejudice done by the Turk, through his occasion and procurement, to Christendom, viz. First, That he restore the Town of Maram to the King of the Romans. And, Secondly, That he content the Emperor for the Costs and Damages sustain'd in the loss of Castle-Nuovo, which the Turk, with the Aid of twelve Gallies of the King of France, took.

Maronic.
Orig.

Au. 1539.

4. That he cease from War with the Emperor, that he may more commodiously and safely take upon him the Defence of the Christian Commonwealth.

5. That he repay to the Germans the loss by them sustain'd, in defending themselves against the Turk.

6. That he pay the King of England all Arrearages, and that he give him some Lands and Possessions to secure the satisfaction of the perpetual Pension. And if there be any thing else which each of these two Princes will require from the French King, it shall be lawful for him to do it, so that he declare his Intent therein in open and plain terms, before the Ratification of the present Treaty.

XIX. If the French King either for Terror of Conscience, or Fear of Revenge, shall desire to come to Agreement for Peace; neither of these two Princes may treat with him apart, until the King of France hath given them satisfaction, viz. Till he hath paid the King of England all that is in Arrear due to him by Bargain. Also, for security for the payment of the Annual Pension due for ever, he shall surrender into the Possession of the King of England the whole County of Ponthieu, with the Town of Bolegne, and Territories of Monstreuil, Therouenne, and Aude, with the Lands, Villages, and Towns adjoining, as far as the Borders of the said County of Ponthieu, &c. On Condition, that the King of England and his Successors shall hold them all for them and theirs, free from all Feod. On this condition yet, that they hold themselves fully satisfy'd with the Profits arising out of these Lands for the annual and perpetual Pension. To the Emperor he shall restore the Duchy of Burgundy.

XX. If the King of France will not accept Peace on these Conditions, or delay it forty days after proposition, the two Princes shall denounce War against him. Wherein

The King of England shall challenge to himself the Kingdom of France, Duchy of Normandy, Aquitain, and Guienne. The Emperor the Duchy of Burgundy, the Cities and Towns of Abbeville, Amiens, Corby, Bray, Peronne, Hamme, and St. Quintin, with their Territories. Before recovering of all which, neither of the Princes shall desist from Hostility, but by consent of the other, and for the good of Christendom.

XXI. They shall have each a Fleet at Sea to secure Traffick: Which Ships bearing two thousand, or (if need be) three thousand Soldiers, shall be set to Sea within a Month after War denounced to the French King, and shall remain there on the Coasts of France, infesting his Country, and defending their Friends. Nor shall they license their Soldiers, or diminish the number of Ships or Men, but by consent. And if there be any Loss by Tempest or Fight, they shall supply it. For the Designs, they shall be ruled by the Admirals and the Councils of the two Princes.

XXII. After War, as aforesaid, denounced by common consent, in time and place agreed on, (so it exceed not the space of two Years) the two Princes shall either in Person, or by Lieutenant, invade the Realm of France with a compleat Army; that is to say, Twenty thousand Foot, and Five thousand Horse, or less; nor shall desist within four Months, unless he be beaten, or receive some Disaster, except by mutual consent.)

XXIII. When King Henry shall with Twenty thousand Foot, and Five thousand Horse invade the Dominions of the French King, the Emperor shall at his own Costs lend him Two thousand Landsquenets, and Two thousand of able Horsemen, to serve under him, till he license his Troops.

XXIV. When the King of England shall pass the Sea to invade France, and pass through any of the Dominions of Charles, the said Emperor shall give him free Passage, and let him have Ships, Carriage, Victuals, and Ammunition, so he pay for them at a fair and reasonable Price.

XXV. This Treaty to be ratify'd and sworn by both Princes within fifteen Days after Requisition.

Commissioners for our King were Stephen Bishop of Winchester, Thomas Bishop of Westminster, Sir Thomas Wriothesley Principal Secretary: For the Emperor, Eustachius Chappuis, Doctor of both Laws, Counsellor and Master of Requests to the Emperor, and his Lieger Ambassador here in England.

This League minuted and agreed in February 1541. was sworn to by Charles, April 8. at Molin del

Feb. 11. del Rey near Barcelona, in the presence of Edmond Bonner Bishop of London, our King's Ambassador, and publish'd in June following: Our King in the mean while providing for War, and his Parliament largely contributing to the Expenses thereof.

A Book publish'd by the King's Command.
In this Parliament, a Book intituled, A necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian Man, receiving its approbation, was in May following printed and publish'd in English by the King's Command; wherein he departs not from his Articles set forth Anno 1536. except in admitting Seven Sacraments, and handling the Points in a more copious manner: For here at large out of the Scriptures and Fathers, he explains the Creed, the Sacraments, and the Decalogue, the Lord's Prayer, with the Ave; then the Doctrine of Free-will, and Good-works: Lastly, adds Prayer for the Dead; all with much Moderation; as chusing rather to resolve high and obscure Questions in general terms, than by any peremptory and particular determination to make his People obnoxious; a Fault noted by some Authors in Charles and Francis; both which about these times commanding their Divines to collect their Doctrine into certain brief Heads, propos'd it barely without Explication or Proof, under the greatest Penalties. But King Henry having labour'd first to make Tenets understood, took order in the next place to have them observ'd on these Conditions. Therefore among other Laws enacted in this Session, beginning the twenty second of January 1544. and lasting till the twelfth of May following, this is the first:

Jan. 22.
Regn. 34. Recourse must be had to the Catholick and Apostolick Church for the decision of Controversies: And therefore all Books of the Old and New Testament in English, being of Tindal's false Translation, or comprising any matter of Christian Religion, Articles of the Faith, or holy Scripture, contrary to the Doctrine set forth Anno Domini 1540. or to be set forth by the King, shall be abolish'd. No Printer or Bookseller shall utter any of the aforesaid Books: No Persons shall play in Interludes, sing or rhyme contrary to the said Doctrine: No Person shall retain any English Books, or Writings concerning matter against the Holy and Blessed Sacrament of the Altar, or for the maintenance of the Anabaptists, or other Books abolished by the King's Proclamation. There shall be no Annotations or Preambles in Bibles or New Testaments in English. The Bible shall not be read in English in any Church. No Women or Artificers, Prentices, Journey-men, Serving-men, of the degrees of Yeomen, or under Husband-men, nor Labourers, shall read the New Testament in English. Nothing shall be taught or maintained contrary to the King's Instructions. And if any spiritual Person preach, teach, or maintain any thing contrary to the King's Instructions or Determinations made or to be made, and shall be thereof convict, he shall for his first Offence recant; for his second, abjure, and bear a Faggot; and for his third, shall be adjudged an Heretick, and be burned, and lose all his Goods and Chattels. And this Statute, though rigorous, was yet a qualification of the six Articles, which impos'd Death upon the first Offence in this kind: And as the King was now in good Terms with the Emperor, he might the better moderate them.

Several Laws enacted.
That the Lords authorized by the Statute of 28 Hen. VIII. 14. to set the Prices of Wine in gross, may mitigate or enhance the Prices of Wine by retail, as time and occasion shall require. Which Act, though expired before our times, had yet this use, that Vintners then were very much restrain'd from couzening; and the extraordinary number of them diminished.

That any Person being no common Chirurgeon, may administer outward Medicines.

That Bishops new erected, shall pay their Tenths into the Courts of the First-Fruits.

That Pensions, &c. granted out of Abbeyes, &c. should be paid still as they were before.

That Laws especially should be made in Wales by the Officers there. Whereupon the Council in the Principality of Wales and Marches was confirmed; and divers other Orders establish'd, too long to be recited here. Only I must not omit how Gavelkind (which being heretofore us'd in Wales, did so divide and subdivide the Lands of the antient Nobles and Gentry there, that at last every Man's Part came to very little; and so disabled them to keep the Dignity of their Houses) was here taken away and extinguished.

In this Parliament, also, a Subsidy was granted to the King, to be paid in three Years, after this rate; They who were in Goods worth twenty Shillings and upwards to five Pound, paid Fourpence of every Pound; from five Pound to ten Pound, Eightpence; from ten Pound to twenty Pound, Sixteenpence; from Twenty and upwards, two Shillings. All Strangers, as well Denizens as others, inhabiting here, doubled the Sum: Strangers, not Inhabitants, that were sixteen Years old and upwards, paid Fourpence for every Head or Poll. As for Lands, Fees and Annuities, every Native paid Eightpence in the Pound from twenty Shillings to five Pounds; from five Pounds to ten Pounds, Sixteenpence; from ten Pounds to twenty Pounds, two Shillings; from twenty Pounds and upwards, three Shillings. Strangers still after all these rates doubling the Sum. As for the Clergy, they granted a Subsidy of six Shillings in the Pound, to be paid of their Benefices in perpetuity, in three Years following: And every Priest having no Perpetuity, but an annual Stipend, paid yearly during the said three Years six Shillings Eightpence. Besides which, I find, upon occasion of a Dearth of Victuals, a Sumptuary Law was made, whereby the Mayor and Sheriffs of London, as also the Serjeants and Yeomen of their Houses, were limited to a certain number of Dishes: They were forbidden also to buy certain kinds of Fowl. Nevertheless, in regard of the great Confluence of People in this Parliament time, and the Scarcity of Fish, the King by Proclamation dispensed eating of White-meats in Lent, forbidding yet the eating of Flesh so strictly, as Henry Earl of Surrey, with divers Lords, Knights, and Gentlemen, were imprisoned for offending herein.

And now the Irish finding by O-Neal, that the use our King made of this Stile of King of Ireland, was to confer Nobility more amply on them, according to their several Merits and Services; O Brian, Mac-William-a-burgh, and Mac-Gil-Patrick, came hither, and upon notice taken of their Desert, O Brian was created Earl of Thomond, and Mac-William Earl of Clanriccard; some others had also Honours given them, and received therein an Obligation to continue firm to the English Crown: Of which likewise the Successors of the aforesaid Lords have given ample testimony.

The Separation or Divorce betwixt our King and the Lady Anne of Cleves now standing uncontroverted, and Queen Katharine beheaded, our King bethought himself of another Match. In the concluding whereof yet he found some Difficulty: For as by a Statute formerly mention'd, it was declared Death for any whom the King should marry, to conceal her Incontinency in former time, so few durst hazard to venture into those Bonds with a King, who had (as they thought) 1543. thought) so much Facility in dissolving them : Therefore they stood off, as knowing in what a slippery estate they were, if the King, after his receiving them to bed, should, through any mistake, declare them no Maids : So that now he fix'd upon the Lady Katharine Parr, Widow to the Lord Latimer ; who, as she was esteem'd ever a Lady of much Integrity and Worth, and some Maturity of Years, so the King after Marriage liv'd apparently well with her for the most part. The publishing of this Marriage was accompanied with a Declaration of his League with the Emperor, and denouncing War to Francis : For which purpose, two Kings of Arms on the Emperor and our King's part, were dispatched to him ; while for more authorising their Message, they were to require performance of certain Conditions before mention'd. But Francis not suffering them to come at all within his Dominions, they return'd ; and both Princes, without more ceremony, prepar'd for War : The beginning and progress whereof, that it may be the better understood, I shall look a while upon Foreign History.

Jan. 9. Guillaume de Bellay Seigneur de Langey, one of the compleatest Gentlemen of his time, to whom the charge of all Affairs in Piedmont was chiefly committed, finding himself declining in health, desires leave to return home, but too late ; for being intercepted by Death in his way, he desir'd the King his Master to accept thereof as a Testimony that he had served his Majesty to the uttermost of his force : Whose loss, I find, happen'd the more unseasonably, in that Francis had now need of his best strength against two so puissant Princes as resolv'd to invade his Dominions in person. The Emperor set out first, as having divers Business to determine by the way ; leaving for Governour of Spain his Son Philip, assisted by Fernando de Toledo Duc de Alva as Captain General, and Francesco de les Covos for other Dispatches during his absence. His chief Design was to draw the Pope from the French King : To which, though the Pope was sufficiently dispos'd, yet he durst not (saith Sandoval) lest Francis should renounce his Authority, as our King had done, and give ear to the Lutherans. Which being certified to the Emperor by his Ambassadors at Rome, made him withdraw some Revenues which he had given with Margaret his natural Daughter to Ottavio Farnese the Popes Grand-child. And now the Emperor having all things ready for his Voyage, arrives from Barcelona at

May 25. Genoua about the end of May 1543, as our Records say, or June, according to Sandoval. His Necessities yet were great ; insomuch, that as he was forced before his leaving Spain to pawn the Molucas to Juan King of Portugal, (and the rather, because some Revolt happening in the West-Indies about this time, he was dispossess'd of the Revenues usually receiv'd from thence :) so in Italy he was constrain'd to sell the Fortresses of Florence and Ligorno to Cosmo de Medices Duke of Florence for an Hundred and fifty thousand Ducats ; though yet he wanted not so many Reasons to retain these Places, as (unless a most urgent Necessity did excuse him) it cannot but seem most strange, both as he lost so principal an access to Italy by Sea, and such a puissant means of conserving the Florentines at his devotion : Nevertheless, I find he would not part with Siena, though as being an Inland-Town, and without means to be easily relieved, it could not so aptly serve to make good his Authority in those parts. To which yet I find Diego de Mendoza Governour thereof so encouraged him, as he seem'd rather to invite an Attempt against Rome. The Emperor reposing a while at Genoua, was desir'd by the Pope to permit an Interview ; which at last was accorded at Busetto, between Parma and Cremona, where the Pope and Emperor did meet, June 21. Their different Ends yet did not permit them to speak principally of a Council, nor at all, till their other Business were determined. For the Emperor, desirous to incite him against the French King, and (howsoever) to get Money of him, bent his chief Discourses that way. The Pope, on the other side, ambitious to get Milan for his Grand-child Ottavio Farnese, who had married Margaret, natural Daughter to the Emperor, (as is before recited) intended little else ; offering for this purpose, to make what Cardinals the Emperor desir'd, to give an hundred and fifty thousand Crowns for some Years towards his War against France, and yet to leave the Castle of Milan and Cremona in his hands. Others say, the Pope would neatly have bought Milan for his Grand-child, when the Emperor could give him good assurance for his Purchase, and that the Emperor would not part with the Fortress of Milan and Cremona. But to leave these things to the several Authors, I find, that the Emperor requiring more Money, the business was suspended, and the Conclusion refer'd to Commissioners, who should treat thereof as the Emperor proceeded in his Journey through Germany : Who, for all advantage and satisfaction in this Interview, had no account to give at his coming thither, but that he could protest, he had made some Overture of a Council. The Pope finding thus no certain Resolution given to his Request, inclined to Francis ; and the rather, that the League betwixt our King and the Emperor being publish'd, he was highly incens'd against him, as having join'd himself in League with one who was so lately excommunicated, anathematiz'd, curs'd, depriv'd, and made incapable of all Confederation : Which yet so little moved the Emperor, as when it was represented that the Pope's Proceeding here was passionate, and for his proper Interest only, and that Religion stood upon firmer Principles, than that it could be personated in any one Man, he did not relinquish his former Intention : For more confirmation whereof also, he fail'd not to reproach unto the Pope his assisting of Francis ; saying, He might with much more reason prevail himself of our King's assistance, than Francis could do of the Turks.

The Emperor being now come into the Low-Countries, resolves to chastise the Duke of Cleve ; the chief places of whose Country he took in fifteen Days. Nevertheless, upon his submission, he restor'd all but Gueldre and Zutphen ; of which yet he gave him some hope, when he would hold it in Fee from the Empire.

This being advertis'd to Francis, made him detain Jone of Navarre ; but for her the Emperor afterwards gave the Duke in Marriage (the Pope dispensing with the former Contract) Mary Daughter of Ferdinand. This prosperous Exploit yet was check'd by the Success of Francis, who this while had taken Landrecy, Bapaumes, and Maubege, (where there is a fair and magnificent Convent of Gentlewomen of Noble Houses, which yet are not so bound to any Vow of Religion, but that they may marry, and was in effect an Academy for their Sex.) Afterwards he took almost all Luxemburg : Therefore the Emperor prepar'd Forces to withstand him, and recover the said Places. To which purpose Sir John Wallop, with six thousand Men, being sent by our King, (who failed not to assist the Emperor) landed at Calais, and from thence keeping along betwixt the Frontiers of France and the Low-Countries, did much spoil upon the French, till he joined with the Emperor's Forces before Landrecy, which 1543. the Emperor besieg'd: Whereof Francis being advertis'd, resolves to relieve it: Hereupon the two great Armies being near each other, it was thought a Blow would follow. The Emperor, who desir'd much to fight, puts his Men in order; which being done, he exhorted them to do bravely, shewing withal the Imperial Standard, which one Quixada carry'd, saying, If this should fall, and my self too, I charge you to take it up before me. Francis also drew out into the Field, not omitting in the mean time to send Men, Victuals and Ammunition into the Town: The two Armies thus confronting one another, Night came on, through the benefit whereof Francis, dislodging secretly, retires with his Army. The Imperialists finding this, follow; but as Francis had laid an Ambuscado, he took divers of the more forward, among whom, it was the fortune of Sir George Carew, Sir Thomas Palmer, and other English, to be taken Prisoners. The Emperor yet continu'd the Siege for some four or five days: But as it was now towards the

Novemb. midst of November, he went with his Army to Cambray; where, persuading the Inhabitants that the French had a Design upon them, he counsell'd them to build a Citadel; which they approving, he found means to possess himself thereof. He also sent Hernando Gonzago and Juan Baptista Gualdo to our King, to treat further of a War against France the next Year; he omitted not also to call a Diet at Spire; whither he went with desire (as much as safely he might) to oblige the Protestants to him; and the rather, that the Turks had at this time not only taken Strigonium and other Places in Hungary, but the Town of Nizza in the Confines of France and Italy, in this manner: Antoine Polin (afterwards Baron de La Garde) had now made two Voyages from Francis to Solyman the Turk, to solicit him to send his Sea-Forces against the Emperor. Whereupon Barbarossa was dispatch'd with Commission to join with him: He taking Fresh-water at Ostia, within five Leagues of Rome, gave that Alarm, that the Inhabitants began to fly; but Polin assur'd them by his Letters: From thence coming to Marseilles, Francois de Bourbon, Duke of Anguien, encounter'd them, having charge to command the Naval Army of the King, which was two and twenty Gallies, and eighteen other Ships: Whereupon they besieged and took the Town of Nizza, but not the Castle, which being stronger than that it could be won easily, they carrying some of the Inhabitants with them, retir'd to their Shipping; and the rather, that they heard the Marquis de Gualto was coming out of Piedmont towards them; who (I find) recover'd it shortly after. And thus ended the two Years Negotiation of Polin with the Turk, with small present effect, and no consequence but the carrying away of a few Slaves by Barbarossa, who winter'd at Thoulon, betwixt Nizza and Marseilles. Howsoever, I find by Sandoval, that it was so heinously taken in Rome, that some Cardinals in a publick Consistory mov'd to deprive Francis from the Title of Christianissimo.

at Rome.

I shall draw this Year to a Conclusion, with a beginning given to the Council of Trent, now appearing in some Rudiments. Many Years had past without any manifest necessity of calling a Council. Those few Separatists which remain'd of the Waldefians, Picards, and Hussites, being disarm'd, illiterate, and obscure; and these later not much differing from the Roman Church, but in the use of the Cup in the Eucharist: But

1517. Luther, Zuinglius, and divers others of late appearing, though not sufficiently united among themselves, gave yet the Roman Catholics so little cause to glory therein, that their greatest

Dissention seem'd to be who should be furthest off from them: Every Reformer in his turn pretended both to discover new Errors, and to shew himself more averse. This made the Pope resolve at last on a Council; and the rather, that all Christian Princes desir'd upon any reasonable terms a Peace of Religion, as knowing how much it concern'd them to settle that Affair: Neither did they think there would be much difficulty, when all sides came prepared thereunto, most of the Points in difference being to be reconcil'd in middle and indifferent terms, or to be rejected as doubtful, (upon the grounds taken on either side) or at least not tending to much Edification. The Meeting was (as is above shew'd) design'd at Mantua first, by Pope Clement the Seventh, 1533. then by Paulus the Third, 1537. but being thence brought to Vicenza, and there suspended during his Pleasure, at last it was removed to Trent, in the Confines of Germany; which also was hasten'd by the Pope, as fearing the consequence of a National Council in Germany, whereof the Emperor had lately given hope; so that he was (at what price soever) determin'd to prevent it; as knowing well what prejudice it might bring to his Authority. Neither did he any longer apprehend the defection of Francis; who knowing he should lose the Pope in his businesses of Milan and elsewhere, if he triff'd any longer with the Protestants, had made severe Edicts against them. Whereupon Bulls also were dispatch'd every where abroad, notifying the said Convention to begin November the first following: Which yet was in such terms as scandalis'd the Emperor, supposing that Francis was us'd therein with more respect than he deserv'd; since, in the late Diet at Spire, having secretly offer'd his assistance both to the Protestant and Roman Catholick Party in Germany, he had declar'd his Intentions were only to foment Division; and besides, had collegu'd himself with the Turk. But for composing these differences, the Pope having appointed the Cardinal Contareni to go to the Emperor, and Sandolet to Francis; Contareni dying in the way, he employ'd Cardinal Viseo in his place; one so openly disaffected by the Emperor, that it was thought no good effect would follow. Howsoever, to make it appear, that this universally desir'd Council was not retarded by him, he sent at the same time unto Trent the Cardinals Pietro Paulo Parisio, a good Canonist, Giovanni Morone an expert Statesman, and Reginald Pool, opposite to our King, and so eminent as might give Authority to Proceedings against him. Their secret Instructions were yet rather to entertain the Ambassadors and Prelates which should be there assembled, than to treat of any thing material without further direction. The Emperor sent hither Diego de Mendoza, his Ambassador resident at Venice, and Nicholas Perrenot Seigneur de Granville, together with Antonio Bishop of Arras (his Son) and some few Bishops of the Kingdom of Naples; who together with some few Prelates (of the most affected to the Pope) being commanded to be present, were all that could give Name and Reputation to this General Council: so far was it from having other Kingdom or Religion concurrent therein. Howsoever, the Imperial Mandate being exhibited by the Agents of Charles, instance was made that the Council should open, and a beginning be given, at least, to a Reformation in Discipline. But the Papal Legates interpos'd a delay, saying, It was not convenient to begin an Universal Council with so little a number: Whereupon the business came to Protests on both sides; and so the Legates referring all to the Pope, nothing was concluded. Whereupon Little else happened this year of foreign Affairs, that I thought worthy my Relation, but that Philip Prince of Spain (though very young) had given him in Marriage Donna Maria, Infanta of Portugal, by John III, and Donna Catalina Sister to the Emperor.

July 28. Information being made to our King, that divers this year were burnt for Religion at Windsor, it appears by our Histories, that he was nothing pleas'd; which yet, whether it proceeded from some better impression he might have taken of the Protestant Reformation; or that he grew weary of the too many severe Executions, which had made his Government thought in foreign Countries to be rigorous, cannot easily be determined. Howsoever, he made it known now that he could forgive. And therefore, though some of his Courtiers, as Sir Thomas Cardine, Sir Philip Hobby, and others of his Subjects were fallen into the danger of the Six Articles, he voluntarily gave them his Pardon; and together, withdrew much of his favour from the Bishop of Winchester, who was reported more than any to persecute them, and suspected to dislike secretly the Kings Proceedings: Which was made more probable, when not long after his Secretary German Gardiner was executed for denying the Kings Supremacy. And perchance, as King Henry intended shortly to go in Person to the Wars in France, the many punishments he had inflicted on others might have begot some apprehensions in him: Yet not such as could deter him from the Journey; for he made great preparations of Soldiers and Habiliments of War, and particularly of Iron Pieces and Grana- des, which I find this year were first cast in England: While for the more contenting the Queen in his absence, he conferr'd certain Honours on William Lord Parr, her Brother, who was made Earl of Essex: And her Uncle Sir William Parr, who was made Lord Parr of Horton, and Chamberlain to the Queen. All which yet seem'd nothing to him, unless he parted in good terms with his Parliament: For he accounted it his most Loyal Spouse: And not without reason, since there was nothing I know desir'd by him, which they perform'd not. This Session (being the third) began the 14th of January, in the thirty-fifth year of his Reign, and continued till the 29th of March, 1544.

March 7. 1544. Gardiner's Secretary hang'd for denying the K's Supremacy.

Dec. 23.

1544. The Succession again settled in Parliament.

Reg. 25. Jan. 14.

The first Act was concerning the Succession: And herein, as I find, he endeavour'd to close with the Emperor, in giving the Princess Mary a possibility of Succession; so he settled that business among his Children in such sort, that all cause of competition was taken away (as far as by our Laws he might.)

The beginning of the Act is a recital of a former, 28 Hen. 8. touching the Succession; to which reference must be had. Whereupon it follows thus, or to this effect, (as I conceive it.)

Forasmuch as his Majesty since the death of Queen Jane, hath taken to Wife the Lady Katharine, late Wife of John Nevil Knight, Lord Latimer, deceas'd, by whom as yet his Majesty hath none Issue, but may have full well, when it shall please God: And forasmuch as our said most dread Sovereign intendeth, by Gods Grace, to make a Voyage Royal in his most Royal Person into the Realm of France, against the French King; his Highness most prudently considering how this Realm standeth at this time in the case of Succession: And albeit, for default of such Heirs as be inheritable by the said Act, he might by the Authority of the said Act, give and dispose the said Imperial Crown, and other the Premises by his Letters Patents under his Great Seal, or by his last Will in Writing, sign'd with his Hand, to any Person or Persons of such Estate therein as should please his Highness to limit and appoint: Yet, to the intent his Majesties disposition and mind should be openly declar'd to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and other his Subjects of this Realm, to the intent that their assent and consent might appear to concur with thus far as followeth of his Majesties Declaration in this behalf; his Majesty therefore thinketh convenient, afore his departure beyond Seas, that it be enacted by his Highness and Parliament: And therefore be it enacted, that in case the Kings Majesty and his only Son Prince Edward should decease without Heirs of either of their Bodies lawfully begotten, so that there be no such Heir Male or Female of any of their two Bodies, to have and inherit the said Imperial Crown, and other his Dominions, according and in such manner and form as in the aforesaid Act, and now in this is declar'd, that then the said Imperial Crown, and all other the Premises shall be to the Lady Mary, the Kings Highness Daughter, and to the Heirs of her Body lawfully begotten, with such Conditions as by his Highness shall be limited by his Letters Patents under his Great Seal, or by his Majesties last Will in Writing, sign'd with his Hand. And for default of such Issue, the said Imperial Crown and other the Premises shall be to the Lady Elizabeth the Kings second Daughter, and her Heirs lawfully begotten, with such conditions as is aforesaid. Any thing in the Act made 28 Hen. 8. to the contrary notwithstanding.

First on Prince Edward.

On the Lady Mary.

On the Lady Elizabeth.

Provided nevertheless, that if the said Lady Mary do not keep and perform such Conditions as the King shall declare and limit in manner aforesaid; that then, and from thenceforth, for lack of Heirs of the several Bodies of the Kings Majesty and Prince Edward, the said Imperial Crown, and other the Premises shall be and come to the Lady Elizabeth, and the Heirs of her Body lawfully begotten, in such like manner and form, as though the said Lady Mary were then dead, without any Heir of her Body begotten,

And be it further enacted, That if the said Lady Mary do keep and perform such Conditions which the Kings Majesty shall hereafter declare and limit, in form aforesaid; and that the said Lady Elizabeth for her part do not keep and perform such Conditions which the Kings Majesty shall declare and limit, in form aforesaid, that then, and from thenceforth, for lack of Heirs of the several Bodies of the Kings Majesty, and the said Lord Prince, and the said Lady Mary lawfully begotten, the said Imperial Crown, and other the Premises shall be and come to such Person and Persons, and of such Estate and Estates as the Kings Highness, in form aforesaid, shall limit and appoint.

Provided, that if the Lady Mary do not keep and perform such Conditions which shall be limited and appointed as aforesaid, and the said Elizabeth being then dead without any Heir of her Body lawfully begotten; that then, and from thenceforth, for lack of Heirs of the several Bodies of the Kings Majesty, and the said Lord Prince lawfully begotten, the said Imperial Crown and other the Premises, shall be, come, and remain to such Person and Persons, and of such Estate and Estates as the Kings Highness by his 1544 Letters Patents Seal'd under his Great Seal, or by his last Will in Writing, sign'd with his Hand, shall limit and appoint.

Provided always, and be it enacted by the Authority aforesaid, that in case the Kings Majesty do not declare and limit by his Letters Patents, or by his last Will, in form as is aforesaid, any Conditions to the Estates and Interests aforesaid limited to the said Lady Mary, and Lady Elizabeth, nor to the Estate or Interest of any of them; that then every such of the said Lady Mary, and Lady Elizabeth, to whose Estate or Interest no Condition shall be limited by the Kings Majesty in form aforesaid, shall have and enjoy such Interest, Estate, and Remainder in the said Imperial Crown and other the Premises, as is before limited by this Act, without any manner of Condition. Any thing in this present Act to the contrary thereof notwithstanding.

And forasmuch as it standeth in the only pleasure and will of Almighty God, whether the Kings Majesty shall have any Heirs begotten and procreated between his Highness and his most entirely beloved Wife Queen Katharine, or by any other his lawful Wife; or whether the said Prince Edward, the Lady Mary, or Lady Elizabeth, or any other, shall have any Issue of their Bodies lawfully begotten; and that if such Heirs should fail, and no provision made, this Realm after the Kings transitory Life should be destitute of a lawful Governor to order and rule the same: Be it therefore enacted by the Authority of this present Parliament, that the Kings Highness shall have full power and authority to give, dispose, appoint, assign, declare, and limit by his gracious Letters Patents under his Great Seal, or else by his Highness last Will made in Writing, and sign'd with his most gracious Hand, at his only pleasure, from time to time hereafter, the Imperial Crown of this Realm, and all other the Premises, to be, remain, succeed and come after his Decease, and for lack of lawful Heirs of either of the Bodies of the Kings Highness and Prince Edward begotten, and also for lack of lawful Heirs of the Bodies of the said Lady Mary and Lady Elizabeth, to be procreated and begotten (as is before limited in this Act) to such Person and Persons in Remainder or Reversion, as shall please his Highness, and according to such Estate, and after such manner and form, fashion or condition as shall be express'd, declar'd, nam'd and limited in his Highness Letters Patents, or by his last Will in writing, sign'd with his most gracious Hand (as is aforesaid.) Any thing contain'd in this present Act, or in the said former Act to the contrary thereof, in any wise notwithstanding.

There followeth also in the said Act a new form of Oath against the Authority of the Bishop of Rome, and the penalty on those who refus'd to take the Oath, or did interrupt this Act, or any Estate limited thereby.

In another Act it was declared where, and before whom, Treasons committed out of the Realm should be tryed. That the Kings Stile also, of King of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, and of the Church of England, and also of Ireland, in Earth the Supreme Head, shall be united and annexed for ever unto the Imperial Crown of this Realm of England.

That no Person should be put to his Trial upon an Accusation concerning any of the offences compris'd in the Statute of the Six Articles 31 Hen. 8. but only upon such as shall be made by the Oath of twelve Men before Commissioners authorized: And the Presentment shall be made within one year after the offence committed. That no Person should be arrested or committed to Ward for any such offence before he be indicted. That if any Preacher or Reader shall speak any thing in his Sermon or Reading contrary to any matter contain'd in the Six Articles, he shall be accus'd or indicted thereof within forty days, or else shall be discharg'd of the said offence. And this also qualified a little the punishment of the Six Articles.

That the Lords and Commons shall remit unto the King all such sums of Money as he had borrow'd of them since the first of January, Anno 33 of his Reign.

That certain Tenures shall be reserv'd (at the Kings pleasure) upon Houses and Lands, being sometimes Abbey Lands, under forty Shillings a year.

That all Persons which have any Houses, Lands, Gardens and other Grounds in the Town of Cambridge, adjoyning upon every Highway, Street, or Lane, in his own Right, or the Right of his Wife, or, &c. shall cause the same to be pav'd with paving Stone unto the middle of the same ways, and in length as their grounds do extend, and so shall from time to time maintain them, upon pain to forfeit six pence for every yard square not sufficiently pav'd, to the King and Informer. And had this Statute extended to the other Cities and great Towns of England, it would have been much to the beauty of them, and the commodity of Passengers.

That the King shall have Authority during his Life to name two and thirty Persons, viz. sixteen Spiritual and sixteen Temporal, to examine all Canons, Constitutions, and Ordinances Provincial and Synodal, and to establish all such Laws Ecclesiastical as shall be thought by the King and them convenient to be us'd in all Spiritual Courts. But this (it seems) expir'd with the Kings life.

An Ordinance also (never sufficiently commended) was made for preservation of Woods, which being too long and particular to rehearse, I shall desire the Reader to peruse in his place: There being no Law either more useful to this Kingdom (in regard of our Navy and otherwise,) or whereof the Infraction can with more difficulty be repair'd; so many years, if not Ages, being requir'd before they can come to that growth, which any rash hand may cut down in a very short space.

Some other Acts also pass'd, which the Reader may see in their place.

And now the Parliament ending March 29. 1544. That War which was denounc'd by our King against Scotland for the Treaty broken in some Particulars, and the Law of Nations in others, appear'd in his Preparatives; and the Lord Edward Seymour Earl of Hertford was shortly after constituted by our King, Lieutenant General of the North, and sent thither with a well-furnish'd Army: For as it was only a Quarrel of unkindness with the Scots for their not admitting readily the loving offer he made of Marrying his Son Prince Edward with their young Queen, none was thought more fit to determine, or if need were, to compose the Business, than the Princes Uncle. Besides, the Duke of Norfolk (whose Service he had heretofore us'd in those parts) was appointed to attend him in his Journey to France. And now Consultation being had which way to invade Scotland, it was resolv'd, by Sea; yet so, as the Kings Land-Army might make a diversion on the Borders, and (if need were) joyn with the other Forces. The Fleet being ready (which was of two hundred Sail,) Sir John Dudley Lord Lisle (newly made Admiral of England) was appointed to conduct it; who setting Sail, shortly afterwards came to Newcastle, 1543. Castle, where the Earl of Hertford, Francis Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, and other principal Persons with the Kings Army attend him. These being speedily shipped, came to Grantham-Crag near Leith, the fourth of May, where spending some three or four days in disembarking their Men, and taking out their Ordnance and Victuals, the Cardinal of Saint Andrews made provision to receive them: Our Army march'd in three Battels, whereof the Lord Admiral had the Van, the Earl of Hertford the middle, the Earl of Shrewsbury the Rear; who from thence going to the Town, encountered six thousand Horse, besides many Foot, led (as our Histories have it) by the Cardinal and divers Noble Persons: But as they judg'd themselves too weak, and consequently offer'd not much Resistance, they were quickly discomfited, and their Ordnance taken. Whereupon our Men entring Leith, found more riches there (they said) than they could have easily imagin'd. Marching thence to Edinburgh, the Towns-men offer'd to yield themselves, when they might depart with Bag and Baggage; but this not being accepted, they prepar'd for Defence. Nevertheless, our Men both forc'd the Town, and burnt it for three days together: At which time William Lord Ever Warden of the East-Marches, and Governor of Berwick, making his way by Land, did (notwithstanding all opposition) joyn his Forces with the rest. The Army thus greatned, burnt and spoil'd all places about Edinburgh in a crueller manner than became such as would obtain the favour either of that Queen or Country for their young Prince. Nevertheless, as they could not take the Castle of Edinburgh, they retir'd to Leith, where the Lord General having made divers Knights, they shipped their great Artillery, and among them some fair Pieces gotten in the Voyage; divers Ships also were taken by them. And now being ready to depart, they burnt the Town of Leith, and the Peer of the Haven; and so on the fifteenth of May the Fleet set Sail, while the Land-Army, desirous to commit further Spoil, march'd to Seton, and so to Haddington, and Dunbar, which Towns they burnt. After which, coming to a Strait (which our Historians call the Pease) and a great Mist happening, they made a Halt, being advertis'd that the Scottish Army would fall on them: But the Mist breaking up, they march'd on without resistance, and so came to Ranton, within eight miles of the English Borders, which having ruin'd and burnt, they upon the 18th of May enter'd Berwick, without having lost in all this Journey above 40 Persons. Our Navy in the mean while, taking out of every Creek and Haven on the Scottish Coasts all the Ships and Boats they found there.

The Expedition thus gloriously ended, the King found his business nothing advanc'd; he had done more than became a Suitor for Alliance, too little for one pretending to Conquest. Neither had this Invasion other event than a general detestation of a Marriage sought for in such rough and unusual terms: But our King, who understood the business otherwise, said, That since he could not obtain, he would strive to chastise. Howbeit, he omitted not to advise how he might raise a Faction in that Kingdom, whereof he might prevail himself. And because the Earl of Lenox, now deserted by the French, seem'd most proper for this purpose, he resolv'd to admit a Treaty with him: Which Affair also upon his Misfortune, and the Retreat formerly mentioned, had been negotiated by the Earl of Glencarne and his Brother at Carlisle, May 17. 1544. (as I find in our Records:) Which again was seconded in that manner, that our Army now returning, he came by Sea to Westchester, and so to the Court, where he was well receiv'd by our King: And at last this Treaty concluded betwixt them, by the name of Matthew Earl of Lenox, and Thomas Wriothesly (lately made * Baron and † Chancellor upon Audley's Death,) the Duke of Suffolk, and Sir William Pager, by June 16. way of Indenture, June 26. 1544. It is to this effect.

That for the security of the said Earl of Lenox a Treaty against the power of the Cardinal, and the Earl of Ar- rain, and the safety of the Realm of Scotland, it is agreed, that the said Earl will observe the Articles agreed on his behalf by the Earl of Glencarne and others at Carlisle, May 17. 1544.

That he will be the Kings Servant and Subject, and serve him against all that shall impugn his Graces Title and Authority in Scotland, or elsewhere.

That he will surrender into his Majesties hand the Castle of Dumbrilton, as also the Isle of Bute, and help him to win the Castle of Rofs therein.

That when the King, having the Direction of the Realm, shall have made him Governor, the said Earl shall never call a Parliament, nor do any matter of great moment without the Kings Advice.

That he shall foresee that the Kings Pronept be not convey'd out of Scotland, but strive to get her Person into his custody, and to deliver her into the Kings hands.

That because the King hath upon his earnest suit given him leave to marry his Graces Niece the Lady Margaret Dowglas, the said Earl bindeth himself to endow her with the yearly value of 500 Marks Sterling.

That the King, in consideration of the loss which the said Earl shall sustain in France by this Agreement, will give unto him and his Heirs, Possessions in England of 1700 Marks Sterling.

That the King will aid the said Earl in Scotland for two or three Months with 500 Men; besides such Men as his Grace will send to take and keep Dumbrilton.

That the King having obtain'd direction of that Kingdom, will constitute the said Earl Governor.

In which Treaty, though our King bestowed the Lady Margaret Dowglas upon him, and that there wanted not some, who thought it best she should be reserv'd upon all events, when the young Queen through any accident should die, he chose rather yet to gratifie this gentle Lord. And therein both put a perpetual obligation upon him, and enabled him to be an Ancestor of that happy Off-spring which hath followed since.

The Earl now possess'd of his Lady, was sent shortly after into Scotland with twelve or fourteen Ships, and about six hundred Men, under the command of certain English Knights: These coming to the Castle of Dumbrilton, were receiv'd with great joy, and feasted by Striveling, Concierge or Captain thereof: But when Lenox had privately told him that the Castle was promis'd our King, he seem'd suspended betwixt Affection and Duty. Though at last, considering that it neither stood with his Honour, nor the safety of the Country, to surrender into any foreign hands, he took Arms, and forc'd Lenox, and a few of the English who were with him, to their Ships, whence they set sail for the Isle of Arrain, and burnt all the Houses there; and after to the Isle of Bute. Some say yet that Striveling would have seiz'd on the Person of Lenox, had he not foreseen the danger, and escap'd; and that he landed in the Earl of Argiles Country, near the Castle of Dunvin, and afterwards burnt it; and took Caintyr and spoil'd it; and all this with the help only of one hundred and forty Men more he had out of his own Country: Concerning 1544. which Exploits, he advertis'd our King then at Boulogne, himself returning in the mean time to Bristol (whence he had his Ships) and staying there till the Kings arrival in England, who soon after commanded him, with some Ships, to scour the Scottish Coast.

Among the Kings Preparatives for War, that of Money was the most difficult: For though he had much enrich'd himself with the Revenues of the suppress'd Abbies; and besides, receiv'd great Subsidies and Loans from his Subjects; yet Fortifications, Shipping and other Provisions had exhausted his Treasure. Besides, he found the Money of his Kingdom much drain'd away by his crafty Neighbours, while they cry'd it up in their Country. For remedy of which Inconveniences, he both enhaunced our Gold from forty-five shillings to forty-eight shillings the Ounce; and Silver from three shillings and nine pence to four shillings: And together caus'd certain base Moneys newly coyn'd to be made currant; though not without much murmuring: Which afterwards yet was cry'd down in Edward the IV. his time, and call'd in by Queen Elizabeth. Howsoever, it serv'd for the present to exchange both for Commodities at home and abroad. Though about two years after our Records mention, that the Low-Country-men finding the Allays (it seems) rejected it.

30000 Men transported to Calais.

Men and Money being now provided, there remain'd yet not a few difficulties concerning the Government of the Kingdom in the Kings absence. Among which, because the greatest was difference in Religion, he endeavour'd to quiet all parts, as finding it impossible to unite them. That of the Roman Catholicks he had already so curb'd, as they could hardly make head again: And for the Reformers, he thought a little would give them contentment, as being at this time scarce more than pretenders. Therefore he caus'd a Litany or Procession to be set forth in English, which much satisfied them, as hoping the rest of Divine Service might follow in the same Tongue. And indeed, our Records tell us, that another English Procession for Festival days was afterwards added. As for the Civil Administration of his Kingdom, it was ordered thus: The Queen was constituted General Regent of the Realm: Not yet so much, that her soft Sex was thought less capable of Ambition, as that the Roman-Catholicks (whom he thought only could stir) would take no dependence from her; she being observ'd to incline a little to the Reform'd. To direct her Counsels yet, the King appointed the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Earl of Hertford, the Lord Chancellor, Thomas Thurlby Bishop of Westminster, and Sir William Peter Doctor of Law, one of the principal Secretaries, to be joyn'd in Commission for those Affairs, and on some occasions William Lord Parre of Horton to be call'd to them. It being provided further, if occasion were given, that the Earl of Hertford should be the Kings Lieutenant or principal Captain. Besides which general order for Affairs in his absence, he particularly appointed certain Noblemen and Gentlemen in every Shire, who should stay there and observe all Motions: And for this purpose, the Bishop of the Diocese in every County (for the most part) and six or seven other Noble-men, or Justices of the Peace were nominated; Francis Talbot also Earl of Shrewsbury, was made Lieutenant of the North. And now assurance being given that the Imperial Forces were in readiness, he commanded his Army (which consisting of thirty thousand Men, was divided into three Battails) to pass the Seas. The Vanguard apparell'd in blue Coats garded with red, with Caps and Hose party-colour'd and suitable (their Caps fitted to their Head-piece or Skull) were led by the Duke of Norfolk. The Rear in the like Habit, by the Lord Russel, lately made Lord Privy-Seal, with whom went Henry Earl of Surrey Marshal of the Field, John Vere Earl of Oxford, the Lord Gray of Wilton, Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Lord Mountjoy, Sir Francis Bryan, and divers brave Lords, Knights, Gentlemen, and others, not a few Welsh and Irish filling up the numbers. These landing at Calais about Whitsontide, march'd directly to Monstreuil, where the Count de Bures Admiral of Flanders with ten thousand Foot, and about three or four thousand Horse joyning with them, they laid Siege to the Town which Monsieur de Biez Marechal of France defended; while, at the same time, the Battel, apparell'd in the like Bizarre fashion, (the Colours yet being red and yellow) passing over under the Conduct of Charles Duke of Suffolk the Kings Lieutenant, accompanied by Henry Fitz-Alan Earl of Arundel, Marshal of the Field, William Pawlet Lord St. John, Stephen Bishop of Winchester, Sir Anthony Brown Master of the Kings Horse, and others, expected the Kings coming; a speedy advertisement whereof being given, he tarried not. But we will leave him a while, and see what the Emperor did.

The Emperors Ambassadors formerly mentioned, being return'd from our King with good Satisfaction and great Rewards, the Diet at Spire began, where the Emperor, Ferdinand, and all the Electors in Person did meet: The Emperors chief business was, to require Aid against the Turk and French their Confederate: Which Francis also suspecting, sent an Herald to require a safe Conduct for his Ambassadors to come thither: But he was rejected with ill words. And now the Emperor endeavouring to divide the Protestants, propos'd so fair and advantageous a Treaty to the Duke of Saxe, that he obtain'd of him to acknowledge Ferdinand King of the Romans. Which Accord, though it were not communicated to, nor approv'd by the rest of the Confederates, yet they all at last condescended to a Contribution by Poll throughout all Germany, for a War against the Turk, and half a years pay for four thousand Horse, and four and twenty thousand Foot against the French. In regard whereof the Emperor promis'd to commit the business of Religion to certain good Learned Men, who should write some pious Reformation; wishing the Princes also to do the same: To the end, that upon comparison of them on all sides, some agreement might be made by common consent, which should be observ'd till a General Council were held in Germany, or at least a National: And that peace should be kept in the mean while on all parts, and the rigorous Edict of Augsburg suspended, and the Anabaptists punish'd. There was an agreement also to meet again (which follow'd at Wormbs) and so the Diet ended June 10.

The Pope being advertis'd of these passages at Spire, was mightily offended, as being resolv'd to tolerate no Reformation whereof himself was not Author. Therefore he wrote a sharp Letter to the Emperor, Dat. 25. Aug. wherein he remonstrateth the Inconveniences would follow, if any thing were establish'd in Religion without his Intervention: Excluding further the Protestants wholly from having any voice therein.

This while the French, under the conduct of Francois de Bourbon Duc d'Anguien, obtain'd at Serisoles in Piedmont, a great Victory against the Spaniard, commanded by the Marquis of Gnastio; wherein, as the Spaniards conceiv'd, was some fatality;

1544. tality; their Writers observing, that the Battel of Ravenna and Gelves were lost upon the same day. Howsoever, the French were not a little glorious; yet, as Francis knew the League betwixt our King and the Emperor, was directed chiefly against him, he prepar'd for Defence: And the rather, that he had heard of a second Treaty, (which was at Gonzaga's coming over into England, as I take it) wherein both Princes had agreed to march strait on to Paris without besieging any Town, or staying by the way. Besides, the Emperor had now recover'd Luxemburg. This made Francis resort to the extrem remedy in case of Invasion, call'd the Ban and Arriereban, by which all Men holding under certain Tenures, are bound for a certain time, at their own cost and charges, to serve in Person, or at least to provide (according to their degree) Horse and Foot against the Enemy: Which Francis yet converted to a Foot only, and thus he got together an Army of about forty thousand Foot, and six thousand Horse. As this yet could not secure him against two such puissant Adversaries, he dispatched several Ambassadors to both Princes, with power to offer great and advantageous Conditions of Peace, when either of them might be taken off. This while the Emperor (who promis'd our King to march directly to Paris with a great Army) had taken divers Towns in Champagne, as the way unto it, though losing unfortunately René Prince of Orange at S. Disier, who was the second of that Family that had died in his quarrel, his Mother's Brother Philibert de Chaalon having been slain at the Siege of Florence. And now both Armies marching so, as the Imperialists held the one side, and the French the other side of the River of Marne, news was brought to either Camp, that our Army was landed in France, and had besieg'd Boulogne. The Particularities whereof, out of a Diary extant in our Records, I thought fit to extract, and chiefly follow in this Narration.

July 14. Our King, who pass'd the Seas in a Ship with

K. Henry of July with a Royal Train. The next day the

But he who knew well what Towns the Emperor had taken in his way, would not be dissuaded from the same Liberty: Therefore he sent the Duke of Suffolk with Forces to invest Boulogne, in which Monsieur de Vervan a young Gentleman, but assisted by Philip Corse, a brave and old Soldier, Commanded. His Forces consisted of a Garison of about two thousand five hundred paid, and as many more able Townsmen. The Duke in a short space took (notwithstanding resistance) the lower Town, lying on the River of Pont-de-bricq, and the Watch-Tower before Boulogne, (call'd the Old-Man, or the Tour de ordre, thought to be built by Julius Caesar;) this hastened the Kings coming; so that dispatching the Emperors Admiral, he march'd forward in this Equipage, July 25. First, the Drums, Vifleurs, Trumpeters and Officers at Arms, then the Barons, and after them Garter-Herald next before the King's Banner, after which follow'd Don Bertran de la Cueva Duke of Albuquerque (Commander of the Emperors Auxiliary Forces;) next whom came the Kings Majesty arm'd at all pieces, upon a great Courser; then the Lord Herbert bearing the Kings Head-piece and Spear, follow'd by the Henchmen bravely hors'd and appointed. Marching thus out of Calais with a Princely Train, an 1544. hundred Horse of Albuquerque's Company (whereof six were barded with Cloth of Gold) met him: Also the Earl of Essex (chief Captain of the Men at Arms,) and Sir Thomas Darcy with many other Horsemen (who set themselves in parade) so that the Light-Horse and Demy-Lance went first, then the Guard on Foot, after them the Pike-men, amongst whom the King rode before the Men at Arms; for the Wings, fifty Archers on Horseback, and as many Harquebusiers were appointed, and so they came to Marquise, where the Army then encamp'd that Night. The next day (being the 26.) marching towards Boulogne, the Duke of Suffolk met the King, who took his quarter on the North-side of the Town, near the Sea; divers Skirmishes passing in the mean time.

The 28. John Viscount Lisle Lord Admiral, the Lord Clinton, and about 900 Men, who had scow'd the Seas towards Scotland, landed in the Haven at Boulogne.

The 29. Sir Thomas Poyning came to give the King account of all that pass'd at Montreuil, and in his return took Hardelot Castle.

The third of August our Battery began on the East-side of the Town, two Batteries more being afterwards planted against it.

The sixth of August Monsieur de Bures came from Montreuil; to whom our King gave a brave Courser richly furnish'd.

The 12th of August the Earl of Hertford came to the Camp; and divers Companies of Almains and Flemings joyn'd with our Men: Many Sallies and Skirmishes (in which the French still had the worse) passing in the mean while. Certain French Troops also endeavouring early in the Morning to get into the Town, were defeated and kill'd; some nevertheless escaping into it. Certain Troops of German Horse came now also to the Camp, who were musterd before the King the next day.

The 24th of August, the Duke of Norfolk from before Montreuil came and advis'd the King how the Affairs pass'd there.

The 27th Alarm was given upon discovering of some French Troops.

The 29 and 30, our Men approaching still to the Walls, short Skirmishes pass'd.

Septemb. 1. our Men got the Bray, not yet without loss of brave Men on both sides.

The second of September, some of our Men giving a false Alarm to the Castle, at the breach which our Canon had made, other of our Men break up certain Doors into the Castle; but they being barricado'd within, and well defended, we retir'd with loss.

The 3d. Sir Christopher Morris Master of the Ordnance, and chief Director of the Batteries, was hurt with a shot from the Castle. While things pass'd thus afore the Town, a Convoy of Victuals (being sent from S. Omer to the Camp) was taken by the Enemy, and divers Imperialists kill'd. Nevertheless, our English sav'd and rescu'd some part.

The 4th of Septemb. the Pioneers having brought their Work to the Counter-mure of the Castle, two Mines were sprung, which shiver'd the Wall; but made no great Overture.

The 5th our Men sapping the Walls, the French kill'd certain Pioneers.

The 6th another Salley was made, and some Workmen were kill'd.

The 9th the Town being brought almost to terms of yielding, certain Ambassadors from Francis, being John Cardinal du Bellay, Pierre Raymond premier President of Roüen, and others, demanded Audience, their business being to treat of a General Accord; concerning which the Earl of Hertford, 1544. Hertford, the Bishop of Winchester, Sir William Paget, and Sir Richard Rich, were appointed to Negotiate with them at Hardelet Castle: Our King not doubting in the mean time to carry the Town.

Sept. 11. September 11. fire was given to the Mine under the Castle, the effect whereof the King went to see, not without some danger, the stones flying very far off: Whereupon, our Men presently giving on, many were slain on both parts.

Sept. 13. The 13th Monsieur de S. Blimont, and Monsieur de Aix came out of the Town, and treated of surrendering it.

Sept. 14. The 14th, it was yielded upon Condition to depart with Bag and Baggage; but to leave the Victuals and Artillery behind them. It was thought yet the place might have held out longer, but that Philip Corfe was kill'd, with whom (it seem'd) both their Courage and good Fortune ended. And so, about two thousand Soldiers, and as many others going out of the Town, pass'd towards Monstreul in our Kings fight, besides divers that escap'd another way.

Boulogne taken. And thus Boulogne was taken, without any mention in our Diary of Cannon of Wood colour'd like brass, which should be planted against the Castle, as Tradition hath it. And now an horrible Tempest arising, threw down Tents and Pavilions, and Shipwreck'd some part of our Navy in the Haven. Nevertheless, the French Ambassadors came to the Camp that Night; but as their Tents were blown down likewise over their heads, the King courteously permitted them to lodge in the Town.

Sept. 18. The King enters the Town in Triumph. September 18. the King (attended by Alburquerque) entred Boulogne Triumphantly, the Duke of Suffolk (the Great Master, who was sent before to take possession thereof,) meeting him at the Gate, and presenting the Keys of the Town, where, after he had view'd the places that need'd Fortification, he gave Audience to the French Ambassadors: But they hearing the Emperor had condescended to a Peace (which was publish'd about this time) did less insist upon a Treaty with us, and so return'd by the way of Hesdin.

Sept. 25. Septemb. 25. Some of the Spanish Writers yet use much art to palliate this abrupt Treaty: Therefore they say, that our King fail'd in his not going directly to Paris (as was agreed.) Never considering in the mean while, that the Emperor (though having a much clearer way) had taken divers Towns in his passage: Besides, they alledg'd, that our King would keep Boulogne for himself, not regarding the common Interest. All yet were but pretexts: Whereas the real causes were,

First, That Charles had by this means taken off Francis from his League with the Turk.

Secondly, That he had engag'd our King in a War against France, and thereby made himself the freer to pursue his own designs in Germany, where he knew the Protestants would grow more refractory, as long as he was in War elsewhere.

Thirdly, That in the Wars of Germany, which he now intended, he thought the French King could more hurt him, than our King do him good.

Sept. 19. The Articles of Peace concluded by these two Princes, were;

Articles of Peace between the Emperor I. That betwixt the Emperor Charles V. and Francis the French King, and the rest that will enter into this League, there be a firm and perpetual Peace.

II. That the Subjects of both Princes pay Tributes, Rites, and Customs of Merchandize that they were wont to pay.

III. That all places which have been taken on one part or other since the Truce of Nizza, shall be restor'd: And that neither part may take thence more than their Victuals or Ordnance.

VII. That the Emperor and French King joyn together in a War against the Turk; and that the King shall furnish for this purpose six hundred Lances, and ten thousand Foot.

VIII. That Francis shall renounce all the Right he pretends to hold in the Kingdom of Naples, Sicily, Milan, the Contado of Asti, as also the Right of Sovereignty he had in Flanders, Artois, Lille, Doway, Orchies, Tournay, Mortaigne, and S. Amand. Moreover, that the King leave unto the Emperor and his Successors all the right that he can pretend in the Dutchy of Gueldres, and County of Zutphen.

IX. That the Emperor likewise shall yield and pass over all Action and Right that he may pretend unto in any State or Seignory of the King, except the Dutchy of Burgundy, the Vicounty of Assuone, the Sovereignty of S. Lawrence, the County of Mascon, Auxerre and Bar upon the River Seine. That he should renounce also that Right he held in the Cities upon the Border of Some, Peronne, Mondidier, and Roze; as also the Counties of Boulogne, Guyenne, Ponthieu; excepting Therouenne, Han, and other places mentioned in Sandoval, and whatsoever in the Estate and Limits of Arras.

X. That the Vassals of either Prince shall be fully restor'd unto all that they had, although they had serv'd on the contrary side.

XII. That the ancient and modern Priviledges on both parts shall remain in their force and vigour. To which purpose, the Emperor shall renounce (in favour of the King) the Dutchy of Burgundy, the Vicounty of Assuone, Sovereignty of S. Lawrence, the County of Auxerre, Mascon, and Bar sur Seine; and within four Months after the publication of this Peace, he shall procure that his Son Philip, Prince of Spain, shall confirm the same.

XIII. That the Emperor in favour and confirmation of the Peace, shall give his Daughter the Infanta Donna Maria, or (in case he do give her) the second Daughter of Ferdinand King of the Romans, that she may match with Charles Duke of Orleans second Son to the King: And that he declare his mind therein within the term of four Months after the publishing of this Peace. And that if the Emperor will marry his Daughter with Duke Charles, then he shall give them the Estate of Flanders, which at this present is under his Obedience, and moreover, the Dutchy of Burgundy and Charolois in Dowry; and that they 1544. they shall enter into the possession of these Estates after the Emperors Death, to descend upon Duke Charles and his Heirs Males; and that the Emperor yet living, these States shall swear to the said Charles; and that Philip Prince of Spain shall swear, confirm, and approve it.

XIV. That the Marriage being made, the Emperor shall constitute Duke Charles in the Government of Flanders.

XV. That Francis and his Son the Daulphin shall renounce for ever, and depart from any right that they held, or may pretend to hold to the Duchy of Milan, or the County of Asti; and that they shall procure within eight days after the publication hereof, the Daulphin's Brother Charles, and Madam Marguerite to confirm and approve it.

XVI. That if Mary Daughter to the Emperor shall dye without Issue Male, the Estate of Flanders shall revert to Philip Prince of Spain, and to his Heirs: and that the Duke of Orleans in this case may revive his right to the Duchy of Milan, and Contado of Asti: And that in this case the Emperor likewise may revive his right to the Duchy of Burgundy, and the rest formerly mentioned.

XVII. That if Duke Charles shall marry with the second Daughter of King Ferdinando, he shall give with her the Duchy of Milan, with the Contado of Asti, and all belonging unto them; the Emperor in the mean while retaining in his power the Fortresses of Milan and Cremona: And that the Emperor shall give to them and their Heirs Males the Title and Imperial Collation of the State thereof. And that if the Duke of Orleans shall have no Heirs Males by this Marriage, nevertheless, that the said Title and Estate shall remain to Duke Charles, and to his Heirs Males by a second Marriage. Provided, that the second Marriage be made with the good will and consent of the Emperor and his Brother Ferdinand.

XVIII. That the Marriage with the Duke of Orleans shall not be deferr'd more than one year after the day of publication of these Presents.

XIX. That Francis shall give unto his Son the Duke in Dote the Duchy of Orleans and Bourbon, Chastellerand, and the County of Angoulesme; and if these Estates mount not to the yearly Revenue of 100000 livres Tournois, that they shall be made up out of the Duchy of Alanzon.

XX. That if the Duke of Orleans shall have only Heirs Females, each of them shall have for their Portion in Marriage 100000 livres Tournois: And if there shall be but one only Daughter Heir, they shall give her 100000 livres in ready pay; and that if the Duke shall dye first, the Emperors Daughter shall have for her life 50000 livres Tournois yearly; but if it be Ferdinand the King of the Romans Daughter, 30000 only.

XXII. That the Duke of Vendosme shall hold the County of St. Paul with the same Right that he possess'd it before the War.

XXIII. That the King of France shall hold Hesdin till it be determined whose Right it is.

XXIV. That in the Cause of Henry de la Britt, pretended King of Navarre, Francis shall not interpose himself otherwise than a Pacifier; nor in the War that shall be for this Cause betwixt them; nor that he shall take any part.

XXV. That the King shall give unto the Emperor a Writing in due form, in which shall be declar'd, that Madam Jene, Daughter to Henry de la Britt, doth swear that she will not consent unto the Marriage agreed with William Duke of Cleve; and that she never consented to it.

XXVI. That the King of Romans (that was the principal Person in composing this Peace) shall enter into, and be comprehended in it; as likewise all other Christian Princes and Republicks that will, keeping the Obedience and Submission that of Right they owe unto the Emperor. This being sign'd and seal'd by the Emperor and French King, and the other above-nam'd, these following Articles were added:

XXVII. That Francis should restore to the Heir of René Prince of Orange the Principality thereof in that manner that Philibert Chalon enjoy'd it.

XXVIII. That to Philip Croy Duke of Arschot, entire satisfaction should be made for all his pretensions, according to the last Treaty of Cambray.

XXIX. That the King shall restore to the Duke all the Goods that on his Fathers and Mothers side belong'd to him in France.

XXX. That if Maximilian of Burgundy gain his Suit in Law, the Places belonging to him shall be restor'd.

XXXI. That the Ransom which George of Austria promis'd, shall be annull'd and made void.

And this was the substance of the League concluded at Crespie, 19 of September, 1544. Be- Sept. 19.

sides which Articles, I find by some, that it was agreed, they should defend the ancient Religion, and reform the Court at Rome: Whereof the Pope being advertis'd, was not yet much troubled; as knowing their Interests so diverse, that they could not long concur. Nevertheless, he hastened the intended Council at Trent, both as the Emperor desir'd it, and as he thought it safer to reform himself, than to be reform'd. Therefore, having understood that both the Emperor had commanded the Divines of Lovain to reduce Religion into some Method and Articles; and Francis also had enjoyn'd the like to the Sorbonists; he without more delay appointed the Council to begin March 15. 1545. and his Legates there to be Giovanni Maria di Monte, Bishop-Cardinal di Palestina, Marcello Cervino Priest-Cardinal di Santa Croce, Reginald Poole Deacon-Cardinal di Santa Maria, (all faithful to him, but Marcello most vers'd in Affairs,) with Instructions at first, only to observe the Emperors Motions, and govern themselves accordingly. For as he knew the Diet at Worms would shortly follow, he thought it concern'd him to be attentive; and the rather, that he was jealous lest the Emperor, French King, and Protestants should agree upon some form of setting Religion among themselves, and not a little fearful also lest our King should intervene: Besides it troubled him much how to comport himself with the Assembly at Worms, as doubting, that if he sent a Legate thither, he might be neglected: Wherefore he commanded the Cardinal Alexander Farnese (his Grand-child) to take that place as in his way to the Emperor, and his Nuncio resident with Ferdinand, to go along with him to the Diet. And now to shew he proceeded really in calling a Council, he gives his Legates order to repair to Trent, with Authority (according to a Bull fram'd for that purpose) to propose, determine, and conclude all that was necessary for extirpation of Heresie, to reform the gates go again to Trent.

1544. the Church, to settle Peace among Christian Princes, &c. by the consent of the Council. Besides which, he gave them a particular Breve to prolong, transfer, or dissolve it, being the Arcanum of keeping all in his Arbitrement: Nor made he difficulty to begin with a few Italian Bishops only of his Party, as thinking they would be the better prepar'd when the rest came in.

But to return now to the Emperor: The Treaty betwixt him and Francis being concluded, he sent to Spain to be resolv'd by the Prince and his Council, which of the two Marriages were most convenient. But all came to nothing by the death of the Duke of Orleans, within eight months following: Howbeit, some places taken on either side were restor'd, and the Emperors Auxiliary Forces before Monstruel commanded to retire. Which being done, he went shortly after to Bruxels, whither his Sister the Queen of France, Charles Duke of Orleans, and the two Sons of Ferdinand came to him. And now our King expostulating the matter with the Emperor; he, for excusing himself, as well as satisfying our King, pretended to make some overture concerning the receiving him into the League, as will appear hereafter; yet so, as it is probable he did not much labour to effect it. The Count of Bures and the Germans being now departed (but not the Duke of Albuquerque and some Spaniards, who (against the Emperors will) remain'd in our Camp) the King commanded the Duke of Norfolk (who had made Inroads into the Country with good Success) to raise the Siege from before Monstruel, and retire to him. And now finding the season to be far advanc'd, and little else to be done, our King (after he had Knighted certain Persons of worth) prepar'd to be gone, leaving the Lord Lisle to command Boulogne with sufficient Forces, and directions what to do upon all occasions.

Sept. 30. And thus the 30th of September, he took Shipping at Boulogne, and return'd: The news whereof, being brought to the Daulphin (who a good while since had rais'd a puissant Army) made him to advance. But the Avant-Coureurs were no sooner descried near the Town, but the two Dukes and Lord Privy Seal (who were left behind with the Army) made ready to fight, sending first yet some to offer Skirmish; but the Octob. 1. French-men fled. Our Army hereupon marching in good order to Calais (where Shipping attended them) the Daulphin six days after attempted between force and stratagem to surprise Boulogne. For, being advertis'd by a Spy that our Approaches were not yet slighted or levelled, nor any of the three breaches in the upper Town repair'd, and that the lower Town in many places lay open, he doubted not but to take it, and in it a great part of the Ordnance and Munition which our King left there.

Octob. 9. Thus coming near with all his Forces about Midnight, he commanded Fouquesolles, Tais, Monluc, & Andelot, Noailles, and certain French and Italian Troops under P. de Maria and others, in sufficient number, to give on. These with their shirts over their Armour, coming suddenly near the lower Town, sent some before, who (as if in favour of us they would have given the Alarm) cry'd Bowes, Bowes: Hoping thus, that our Men, suspecting nothing, would open the Gates, and thereby give them means to seize on it till the rest did enter. The Invention was good, and had it been handfomly pursu'd, might have endangered us. But Tais and the Italians entering the lower Town in greater number than that they could be suppos'd People in their Shirts, that rose to give their fellows warning, Alarm was given. Nevertheless, they so surpris'd our Sentinels, as they kill'd all they met, and rifled the Houses without much opposition, because the Pioneers (chiefly) and Victuallers of the Camp (who had no Arms to defend themselves) were quarter'd there; our Soldiers scarce sufficing to defend the Breaches and Gaps of the upper Town. Howbeit, divers of our Men escaping, ran to the gate of the upper Town, and there demanded Arms wherewith to defend themselves; which therefore were cast to them over the Walls in such quantity, as now taking Courage, they fell on the French and Italians with that fury, as they kill'd Monsieur de Fouquesolles, and divers others who resisted, and chas'd the rest, wounding Monsieur de Tais, and taking divers Prisoners: And this was the success of the attempt on the upper parts of low Boulogne. As for that towards the Sea, which Monluc undertook, not without hope (it seems) to fire some of our Ships, the French prosper'd as little, as being kill'd and taken in great number: Only for Monluc himself, it may be doubted where he was in either of these Fights, since he makes no particular mention of them, nor gives any good account of his Person. For though he saith, he came to the Italians, that made a stand near the Church, it must be before our Men fell on them. As for his Allegation, that some of the English ran away, they were no other than some part of the Corps de Gard, which went to advertise the rest; and for his telling the colours of our Pioneers Clothes (for testimony that he saw them in the dark) it makes little for him, since with more honour he might have told the colours of our Soldiers Liveries, which were far different, had he seen them. Howsoever, he might stay safely in the lower Town after the slaughter committed by Tais and the Italians, till our Men (as is before-mentioned) returning with Arms from the upper Town, gave them the chase; who yet could not have defeated them entirely, had not those of the upper Town sallied forth of their Breaches at last, to second them. A little before which time, Monluc, suspecting (it seems) that the English (upon the Alarm given) would fall on him, desir'd (as he confess'd himself) the Italians to make good their Stand, while he kept one of the Breaches from being possess'd by the English. But our English now charging Monluc, went further than it or the Town. Howbeit, to shew his care, he saith that he sent an Horseman back, to know what was become of the Italians. But he returning answer, that they were in the Church, or dead, Monluc and some other French provided for themselves. For now Sir Thomas Poynings with a fresh Troop of English out of the upper Town had charg'd them. D'Andelot, Noailles, and divers others hereupon were advis'd by Monluc to save themselves; as also certain Ensigns, who following his Counsel, got up the Hill towards their Army, while himself and a few with him, pass'd a shallow water, and so escap'd by a longer, but a safer way. And thus the Daulphin, who prepar'd to send Succours, meeting the Run-aways, desisted, and the Town was sav'd. But Monluc, to defend himself, saith, that for all the fear, he kept his wits still about him, or else he had been in danger never to have been Mareschal of France. And to commend (it seems) his direction in running away, he shews how necessary it is for a Man in danger not to be afraid; and says, that all the Ensigns had been lost, had he not advis'd them to be gone; and that his Counsel preserv'd all: And such Rodomontades as these did this Gascon use, who (it seems) was a braver Man by 1544. by Day, than by Night. All which I have more particularly observ'd out of our Histories and Records, because, notwithstanding his shameful flight, he strives so much to vilifie our Nation. But how he behav'd himself in this Action, may appear by the Dauphin's jeering him at his return, as himself confesseth; it being certain, that though he came in later than his Fellows, it was not because he stay'd longer there, but that he went a further way about. But Montluc to excuse himself, said, it was the Dauphin's fault, that he came not in with his whole Army: And therein he spoke rationally; for had the first Attempt been well seconded, he must have carry'd the Town in all likelihood, our Breaches being open, and Men surpris'd. Nor had he better fortune at Guifnes, and other places which the French hop'd to take in; for being beaten thence, he was constrain'd with his Army to retire, without doing more for this year. Nevertheless, Francis had recourse to those wonted Arts, by which as much as by Arms, he always advantaged himself: Therefore he desired that his Ambassadors and the Emperors might meet with our King's at Calais, to treat of a general Accord. Which offer being accepted, the Earl of Hertford, and Sir William Paget were sent thither: But their desire being, that Boulogne might be first restor'd, the Earl of Hertford reply'd, he had no such Commission, and so broke off the Treaty: The Imperialists seeming nothing scandaliz'd, that it had no better effect.

While Affairs pass'd thus in France, Barbarossa did much spoil on the Coasts of Italy; taking Towns, and carrying Captives of both Sexes to the Grand Seigneur at Constantinople, where he shortly after died of a Calenture, being above eighty years old: A great Age for such a Pirate as spent almost all his time in fighting either with Men, or the fiercest Elements. There happen'd also in July, this year, upon the Coasts of Gallicia, a Sea-fight between the Spanish and French, in which the Spaniard, under the command of Don Alvaro Bazan (Father of the famous Marquis de Santa Cruz) was Superiour, three thousand French (as Sandoval hath it) being kill'd.

The Emperor now in his wonted necessity for Money, was advis'd by his Council to seise on the Revenues of the Church: For which also he obtain'd a Breve from the Pope. Yet, as he would hear what the Religious Persons of that Kingdom could object, he admitted their Deputies, who said, the right of the Church Goods was rather Divine than Humane; that the Church was Christ's Spouse, and should be deck'd gloriously; that ancient Rome was Mistress of the World heretofore, by S. Augustine's Confession, because the People were so devout to their Gods, and so much honour'd Religion: Which reasons yet (it was thought) would not have prevail'd, had he not found other ways to have supply'd his wants. Nevertheless, his Son Philip the Second seised on them, though in his Will he commanded them to be restor'd.

The glorious return of our King from Boulogne gave much satisfaction to his Subjects: Yet, as he had drawn a puissant Enemy against him, he took order to fortifie his Kingdom. And because the River of Thames was chiefly to be secur'd, he caus'd some Fortifications to be rais'd at Gravesend, as also at Tilbury, and afterwards at Dover, Portsmouth, and many other places: He took also an exact account of all his Ordnance, which he distributed in the most necessary places, lest upon an Invasion, his Magazine being in the Tower of London only, the remedy should come too late. I find also by our Records, that there were certain small pieces of Artillery, not unlike our Drakes, for defence of his Waggon, of his own Invention, as also certain forms of Bulwarks; for he was a great Soldier, and besides, of a singular capacity in apprehending all the new devices which in these kinds now daily appear'd: The Pistol, among others, coming this year first in request among the French Horse; but not the Spanish, whose manner is, not to leave their ancient forms easily, when yet it were for their advantage.

Let us look a while on Scotland.

About the time that Lenox, on our Kings part, invaded the West of Scotland, as is formerly related, our Men on the other side entred the Country, and took Jedburgh, Kelfo, and other places, and then Coldingham: Which being advertis'd to the Governor and Cardinal, they brought an Army of about eight thousand, and some Artillery, to recover the Town. But the Governor suspecting (as it was thought) some treachery among his Men, posted away suddenly: Which caus'd such a consternation in the Scots, that they likewise were ready to Disband, and leave the Artillery then planted in battery against the Sreepie, had not the Earl of Angus staid some, and with their help conducted it safe to Dunbar. This news was brought to our King at his return from Boulogne; at which time also the Earl of Lenox came to Court, and acquainted him with his late Actions, and the Affairs of Scotland: Whereupon, the said Earl, the Lord Dacres, and Sir Thomas Wharton were dispatch'd thither with competent Forces. For, though at the request of the Scots by Sir George Meldre (sent to him when he was before Boulogne) King Henry had granted Truce for a time; yet being newly provok'd, he resolv'd a War. These entering Scotland on the West Border, took Dunfrise, and brought home great Spoils; constraining also the People of those parts to condescend to a Treaty, and give Hostages for the observing thereof. Our Men puff'd up with this good Success, resolve upon another Expedition. Whereupon, Sir Ralph Evers (now Lord Evers, and Warden of the East-Marches) and Sir Bryan Layton, this Winter spoiling Tiviot-dale, and other places, and afterward returning to London, requir'd a reward for their Service: Which, by the Duke of Norfolk's Advice, being as much ground as they could win from the Scots, they entred the next Spring (1545.) but were defeated, and slain in great number at Ancrum; and among them Evers himself, a brave Lord: Divers also were taken Prisoners, and particularly, one Read, Alderman of London; which, that it may not seem strange, I have thought fit to tell the occasion: Our King, for supply of his wants, having appointed certain Commissioners to receive a Benevolence from his Subjects, they began at London with the Lord Mayor and Aldermen; among whom, Read refusing to pay his share, was sent in this Expedition, with so ill success to it and himself, as at last, he paid more than the Money impos'd on him, in a Ransom. As for others, they excus'd themselves by their penury, in regard the King had taken up so much Corn from them for his use this year, without repaying the price as yet; so that in effect this Benevolence pass'd with much grudging.

The Dauphin and French Army being retir'd, as is formerly related, Monsieur de Biez Marechal of France, having gather'd some fourteen thousand Men together, encamp'd the 26th of January, 1545. near Portet, a little Creek of the Sea, about half a Mile from Boulogne; yet as he had the River of Pont-de-Brique betwixt him and the Town, it was not easie to dislodge him. His design was to build a Fort there, for holding the Haven of Boulogne in Subjection: Which the Earl of Hertford ford understanding, assembled four thousand Foot, and seven hundred Horse out of the Garisons adjoyning, and with these constrained Biez to retire to Hardelet, by the way charging him often with that fury, as he kill'd many, took two Brass Pieces, and five Iron, and much Baggage, and with it some of Monsieur de Biez his Armour. And now Francis finding that these Enterprises succeeded not, makes huge preparations to recover the Town; hoping together to win Calais, and wholly to expulse the English from those parts. Therefore he sent to Scotland Monsieur de la Brosse, and afterwards the Seigneur de Lorges, with an Army to joyn with the Scots for invading our Northern parts. On the other side, that he might shew how strong he was by Sea, he commanded a great Fleet to be equipp'd; for which purpose Paulin (his old Negotiator in Turkey) brought with him five and twenty Gallies from the Levant: The Pope not omitting also to furnish his part: So that he had in all an hundred and fifty great Ships, and sixty of the lesser sort, besides Gallies; his design being to keep Boulogne from being relieved by Sea, while the Land-Forces besieged it. He thought fit to begin yet with erecting the Fort before Boulogne, which being to be finish'd (as was promis'd him) by Monsieur de Biez, before mid-August, he meant with a puissant Army to entrench himself before the Town: Having for this purpose sent to levy twelve thousand Landskenets, and six thousand Italians; with which, and his own Forces, he doubted not to recover all the places we held in France. Lastly, for the more encouraging his Men, he resolv'd in Person to be in, or at least, not far from his Army. Coming thus to Havre de Grace, and commanding his Fleet to set Sail, his fairest Ship (being of eight hundred Tun) taking fire, suddenly was burnt; yet the rest went on, under the command of Monsieur d'Annebault, Admiral of France. Coming thus to S. Hellens Point, on our Coast, Paulin, with four Gallies was sent to discover the Isle of Wight, and the countenance of our Men: Whereupon, sixty of our ships coming out of the Haven of Portsmouth in good order, exchanged some shot with the French, till night parted them. The next day, the Ship which carried their Money, sank, the Money being hardly sav'd. But one of our Ships through accident was lost. Our King this while being come to Portsmouth, as knowing of what consequence the place was, assembles Men from all parts under the command of his Lieutenant the Duke of Suffolk: The French yet landed in three several places in the Isle of Wight; but were as soon repuls'd: Whereupon, d'Annebault having the wind fair, advis'd concerning fighting with us in the Haven at Portsmouth: But the Channel being thought too narrow for them to enter in any great number, they consulted of taking the Isle of Wight: But as it was requisite again to build many Forts for keeping thereof, they found that both Men and time would be wanting. However, they resolv'd to take in fresh Water; which the Chevalier d'Aux with some Men attempting, was kill'd, and they routed; as also some others who landed afterwards in Suffex. These bad successes made the French cross over to Portet near Boulogne, where they landed four thousand Soldiers, and all the Pioneers which they brought with them to fortifie those places they should have taken in England. And now the wind blowing from the Land, they set sail again for our Coast; which our King understanding, commanded his Fleet (being an hundred Sail) to offer fight to them; which the French also had charge to accept; their King not fearing to lose his hired Ships, as long as he had Money to procure others: The only difficulty was, in regard of the

Currents, how to use both Ships and Gallies together; for in Calms, when the Gallies made way, the Ships could not stir; and without them they durst not encounter us. And now the French Fleet having gotten a small wind, and their Gallies coming on, made towards us, but the wind slackning again, their Gallies fell off; wherewith the wind coming about, and our Fleet investing them, an hot fight of two hours pass'd betwixt them: But the night parting them, the French retir'd suddenly to Havre de Grace, and appear'd no more. Our Admiral yet went to Treport in Normandy, where landing, he burnt the Suburbs, took divers Barks out of the Haven, and so return'd. D'Annebault, as soon as he came on shoar, went to the King at Arques the sixteenth of August, expecting the Fort should be finish'd before Boulogne; but it was begun eight days only before, and in another place, call'd Outreau, near low Boulogne, whence they might indeed annoy the Town, but not command the entry into the Haven. But Monsieur de Biez assuring the King yet it would be put in defence within eight days more, the French Army march'd on, being four and thirty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, who shortly after encamp'd upon Mount Lambert, being so near Boulogne, as they could shoot into it with their great Ordnance. The King yet was not in the Army, nor nearer than the Abby of Ferrest Montier, which was eleven Leagues off, whither his Son Charles Duke of Orleans coming, died (as is before touch'd) of a Pestilent Fever. This made him send shortly after Claude de Annebault, and others, to the Emperor, to renew his Alliance some other way. But the Emperor, who had now engag'd our King and Francis to a War, and therein reveng'd himself on both, thought it safer to be Neuter, than to declare himself either way: Howbeit, he told the French Ambassadors, that he would not begin with their Master. In the mean while, the English Garison in Calais and Guifnes, making continual Inrodes, kill'd Monsieur Dampierre, and defeated his Men; which, together with the dry answer receiv'd from the Emperor, made Francis to retire to an Abbey near Amiens; his Army yet continuing before Boulogne, without adventuring to lay close Siege unto it. Only, as all the young Nobles and Gallants of the French Court came thither, divers Skirmishes pass'd; in one of which, Francis Duke d'Aumale, eldest Son to the Duke of Guise, receiv'd a blow with a Lance between the Eye and the Nose, which entered (as the French Writers have it) half a foot into his Head, and there broke: Nevertheless, he coming off, endur'd the taking it out, and was recover'd; divers others of their principal Persons yet being kill'd. And now our King resolving to dislodge them, sent into Germany to levy ten thousand Lanskenets, and four thousand Horse: Who thereupon coming to Fleurines in the County of Leige, requir'd their pay, as was promis'd; but it not coming at the time appointed, they seised on our Commissioners, and return'd, without permitting them to depart till they were satisfied. This while Monsieur de Biez, being commanded to enter Terre d'Oye, took a little piece of fortified ground; which our Men coming to recover, were encountered by his Horse, and defeated: Yet so, as (though far less in number) they kill'd many of their Enemies. The Garison of Boulogne finding the French Army thus departed, enterpris'd the taking of the Fort; but it was well defended, and they with some loss constrain'd to retire. The French Army also, through the much rain that fell, was forc'd to leave Terre d'Oye, being a marshy ground, and full of deep Ditches: Besides, our Men gathered towards them. And now this puissant Army returning 1544. turning toward Boulogne, did not think fit to besiege it: Which may seem the stranger, in that we neither had Forces in a readines to fight with them, nor so strong a place to defend, but that half their Army (according to reason of War) might have carry'd it in a short space: Therefore they encamp'd themselves only before Portet, until the Fortification were finish'd. This slackness made our Men so adventrous, that an Enterprize of theirs succeeded ill, as shall be told the year following.

July 2. Monsieur de Lorges (formerly mentioned) having brought his Auxiliary Forces (being five thousand Men) July 2. 1545. into Scotland, many Incursions were made. Their Army yet incamped no nearer on the English side than Tuede; yet as they pass'd it often, much harm was done. Whereupon the King sent the Earl of Hertford with twelve thousand Men to Scotland; who destroying all the Towns on the middle Marches, pass'd thence to the West, and committed great spoils: In requital whereof, the Scots shortly after attempted to enter England on the East Borders; but were defeated, and many made Prisoners, and among them the Lord Humes his Son, and a French Commander; and not long after the Lord Maxwell's Son: But they had their revenge, for five hundred English attempting the West Borders of Scotland, for the most part were taken or slain.

While our King was thus in War with France and Scotland, he and the Emperor were not in very good terms; Ships being arrested on either side; upon occasion (as I gather) that a Spanish Ship, coming from St. Domingo in the West-Indies, was taken by the English. But we had likewise our complaints. Concerning which therefore a Meeting was appointed at Borborch in Flanders; also about taking certain Imposts rais'd by the Emperor, contrary to the old Treaty of Commerce; which yet was little regarded, the Emperor endeavouring now nothing more than to get Money. Which the Protestants understanding, and fearing he would make use thereof to invade them, did easily accept an intimate request from Francis, for mediating a Peace betwixt our King and him: Whereupon, they sent to France, Veninger, Bruno, and John Sturmius; and to England, Barnbach and John Sleidan the Historian, who at length obtaining that Commissioners on both sides should meet near Ardres, two Months were spent in unuseful Propositions; so that they return'd without effecting any thing. Our King, besides that he would have Ardres for quitting the Arrears of his Pension, being neither willing to restore Boulogne, nor to suffer the Scots to be comprehended in the Treaty.

Novemb. And now the Emperor fearing lest a Peace should be made without him, thought fit to mediate (at least in appearance) an Accord, on this occasion; King Henry having sent the Bishops of Winchester and Westminster, and Sir Edward Carne to clear some Articles of the Treaty of 1543. Feb. 11. 1544. with Charles, Francis about the same time had sent the Admiral d' Annebault thither, as is before related. Whereupon therefore he propos'd a General Treaty, though faintly, and in such terms that it took no effect.

Fix. This while, Archbishop Cranmer making his advantage of Winchesters absence, endeavoured a further Reformation; which also our King once condescended to, and gave order for in great part: But before it was brought into Act, the King receiv'd Letters from him, that the League mediated by the Emperor would not proceed, if he suffer'd any Innovation; and so nothing was done. Little more happen'd this year worth relation (for home events) besides the Parliament business (whereof hereafter) but the Death of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, Great Master of the Kings Household, a right hardy Gentleman (as our Historians term him;) yet withal so discreet and affable, as he was belov'd of all sorts, and his Death much lamented. Our King, for his more Honour, causing him (at his own charge) to be honourably bury'd at Windsor.

I shall return now to declare the Proceedings in matter of Religion among the Germans, and in the Council of Trent.

The Emperor with much industry and cunning having procur'd a War between our King and Francis, did now leave them to decide their own Affairs, while himself attended wholly his occasions in Germany; his designs there being much facilitated by the recession of the Turk, who leaving the pursuit of his Conquests in these Northern Parts, meant to dilate himself in the warmer Climes of Asia: So that the Emperor having no more business, accounted this year the most quiet of many that had preceded: Though yet he were not exempt from sundry Cares, some Wars, and the Gout. And now, as he pretended principally to compose the differences of Religion, many Offices were pass'd with the Pope for advancing the Council; which had its beginning and progress after this manner:

The thirteenth of March 1545. the Cardinal del Monte and Cardinal Santa Croce being receiv'd by the Cardinal of Trent, made their publick Entry into the City: But no Prelate being yet come, they sent to Rome, to desire that their restriction in the Bull (to the consent of the Council) might be taken away, and absolute power given to propose, determine, &c. as is before recited: Which the Pope granted. The place chosen was the Cathedral Church, capable of about 400 Persons. Ten days after, Diego de Mendoza the Emperors Ambassador in Venice came, and shew'd his Instructions; being, First, to promise that the Spanish Bishops should shortly be present: Secondly, to procure, that Reformation in Discipline and Manners should be handled before Points of Doctrine. The Legates hereupon sent to the Pope to have publick Dispatches (when occasion were) to shew Mendoza, and other private Letters to follow. The eighth of April, Ferdinand's Ambassadors came, the number of Bishops yet being very few. The first Controversie was concerning the Spanish Ambassadors pretence to precede the Cardinal of Trent: But the business was order'd so as no advantage appear'd. This preparative for a Council being divulg'd, produced divers and contrary effects; some resolving to believe all they said, others little or nothing, others again intending to distinguish those parts that pleas'd them, from the rest. Howsoever, the Protestants in the Diet of Worms protested against it, as partial and factious: While Francis, for the more endearing it, proceeded with Arms against the few Waldenses that remain'd in his Kingdom, in that violent manner, as without other warning or instruction, he permitted his Soldiers (having first committed all insolence in the mountain parts where they dwelt, towards Provence and Languedoc) to destroy more than four thousand Persons which made no resistance. In the mean time, the Cardinal of Trent, for the more security of his City, desir'd a Garison from the Pope: But was answer'd, that the Council could not then seem free; which more importuned him, than the safety of the City did the Cardinal. Matters being thus advanc'd, Cardinal Pool came, and speech was had of opening the Council. But as the Popes designs tended another way, he sent the Cardinal Alessandro Farnese, his Grandchild, to the Emperor now at Worms, to offer a

He represented also how ill the Pope took the late Speech of a National Council, and that the Emperor in this Diet had promis'd another for the settling of Religion, in case the Council of Trent took no order therein; in the mean while protesting, that he would sooner yield up his Keys to Saint Peter, than suffer such an Affront. Besides which, he had private Instructions to procure that the right of Inheritance of Parma and Piacenza might be invested in his Brother Ottavio, Son to Pietro Aloysio Farnese (natural Son to the Pope) now Duke thereof, in regard the said Ottavio had married Marguerite natural Daughter to the Emperor: Which at last also, upon the exchange of Camerino, was granted. And now towards the end of May, there were twenty Bishops, five Generals of Orders, and one Auditor de la Ruota assembled; yet as the Council began not, the Pope being desirous first to see the success of the Diet at Worms, the Bishops desir'd to be gone, but were not permitted. Nevertheless, Mendoza return'd to his former Ambassage at Venice, desiring nothing might be done in his absence. The Bishops also weary of their stay, or expence, resolv'd at last to depart: Which the Pope taking notice of distributed some Money among them. This while Herman Archbishop of Cologne, having made a private Reformation of Religion in his Dominions, by the means of Martin Bucer and Philip Melancthon, his Clergy oppugning it, complain'd to the Emperor, who cited the Archbishop: With which, though the Pope was offended, yet he did not so much expostulate the matter with the Emperor, as desire to conserve his own Authority: Therefore he cited the Archbishop too.

And now in the Diet at Worms the Emperor requir'd aid against the Turk; which the Protestants refus'd (as fearing it would be employ'd against them) unless first good security were given for Peace in the Empire, and that this Council at Trent should be no prejudice to them. But to this the Emperor answer'd, that he could not exempt them from the authority of the Council (especially, being call'd for their sakes;) yet if they had any just objections against it, that they should come and produce them openly in the Council, and they should have an equal hearing. But the Princes and confederate Cities continuing to except against it, protested those were not to judge of their Cause, who had already condemn'd it: Therefore, if a Council were had, they should make one part, and Pope and Roman Catholics the other: And as for the manner and order, that the Emperor and Princes should be Judges; but for the merit of the Cause, that it should be determined only by the word of God. The Emperor finding thus no likelihood of Peace, dissembled his displeasure till he had made Peace with the Turk, (which he did by the means of Francis, this year, in October.) And so the Diet ended the fourth of August, with a Decree to hold another at Ratisbonne in January following. For which purpose there should be a Conference of four Doctors and two Judges on either part, in December, to prepare matters of Religion against that time. And now the Protestants put forth a Book, in which they again rejected the Council, saying, it was not assembled in Germany (as was promis'd,) but in Trent, and by the Popes power and command, without other pretext that it could be thought to be in Germany, than because the Bishop of Trent was a Prince of the Empire: Besides, that the Pope (being a Party) should not preside in it. Therefore, that the form and manner of holding a Council should be first discuss'd, and whence it had its Authority. But this reference of the Emperor to a future Diet, as it displeas'd the Pope and his Legates, since the Council was imminent, and appointed for deciding Controversies; so it made the Bishops again take leave to be gone: And in effect, by the end of September few remain'd. The Pope finding these difficulties, knew not well what to resolve; yet when motion was made for holding it in Germany, he refus'd, but sent to the Emperor to advise with him concerning the opening the Council, or suspending it, or transferring it to Italy. The Emperor (as Affairs then stood) not much approving any of these Propositions, at last (in October) gave consent the Council should open: Yet so, as they should treat of matter of Reformation, and not of Doctrine, for fear of provoking the Protestants. This, again, gave the Pope no little jealousy, lest the Emperor would make his Ecclesiastical Authority obnoxious to the Diet and Conference. Howbeit, he commanded the Council should begin the thirteenth of December: The French Prelates, being but three, having written to their King most of these Passages, were sent for home; yet, at the intercession of the other Bishops, two remain'd. The thirteenth of December being come, the Legates (after a solemn Feast and Procession) meeting in the Cathedral, open'd the Council, The Council declaring, that it was assembled for three Causes: 1. Destroying Heresie. 2. Reforming Discipline. 3. Settling Peace: Exhorting the Bishops to labour seriously herein. After which, the Emperors Instructions to Mendoza (formerly mentioned) being again exhibited, the Legates said, they would advise thereof: And so appointing the next Session to be held January seventh following, they arose, and presently sent to the Pope, declaring what was done, and desiring to know how they should begin; whether with Heresies, and if so, whether they should touch the Heresies, or Persons, or both? Whether they should send forth a Declaration that the Council was begun, and invite the Princes and Nations that would, to come? Whether they should hasten or delay their Proceedings: In what manner the Suffrages were to be collected? &c. The eighteenth of December they met in Congregation, and began to treat of a Reformation of Manners, Habits, &c. The Pope hearing thus the Council was open'd, writes, that concerning the matters to be handled, he is not yet resolv'd; in the mean time, that they should insist on the usual Preambles: That they should follow in their manner of Suffrages, the last Lateran Council: That they should invite no Prince or Prelate, since the Indiction of the Council was sufficient: As for the charges of the Bishops, some exemption from payment of Tenths was granted, and some other Benefits, and Money given to the poorer sort: All which I have set down with more particularity, that it may appear, both what a slow and uncertain beginning this great Council had, and what a different end it took, from that it now seem'd to promise.

Dec. 18.

I will conclude this year with the business of our Parliament; which began the 23 of November, 1545. Which, as it was the last the King call'd; so, supply of Money being the principal Affair, it seem'd to comprehend all that could be given, at least of other Mens; neither was there other excuse than the Kings Necessities, which every Man must think violent, when they trench'd upon the reverend Foundations of Colledges, Free-Chappels, Chantries, Hospitals, Fraternities, Brotherhoods, Guilds, and stipendiary Priests which had continuance in Perpetuity, together with all their Manors, Lands, and Hereditaments, which now the Parliament committed to the Kings dispose, 1545. dispose, and that they should be in the order and survey of the Court of Augmentation; the Right of others being yet sav'd, and divers Provisions made. For motive whereof, the Kings great charges in his Wars with France and Scotland were alledg'd; as also the abuses of the Rulers and Governors of the said Colledges, &c. Upon which therefore, and his solemn promise to the Parliament, that all should be done to the glory of God, and common profit of the Realm, the Act pass'd.

Several Acts pass'd. In another Act it was declar'd, how offenders in Usury should be punish'd; and a certain proportion of ten in the hundred was limited. Which yet, had it been lower, would have made Lands more valuable, Merchandize and Victuals cheaper, and adventuring by Sea more frequent: That lazy way of thriving being more opposite than any thing else to that Industry by which all Kingdoms subsist and flourish.

That Doctors of the Civil Law, although Laymen, whether Married or Unmarried might exercise all manner of Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, to which they shall be deputed.

That two Churches, being not above a Mile distant, and one of them not above the yearly value of six pound, may be united into one.

That where a full Jury did not appear, a Tales might be granted de Circumstantibus: And this was much for the expedition of Justice.

That whereas the Lord Chancellor of England, Lord Treasurer, Lord President of the Kings Council, Lord Privy Seal, and the two chief Justices, or five, or four, or three of them should have power by their discretions to set the prises of all kind of Wines, as by the Act 28 Hen. 8. 14. appeareth: The time was now specified to be betwixt the twentieth of November and last of December: And that if any Wine-seller should sell his Wine in gross at any other price, that the Mayor, Bailiffs, Aldermen, &c. may enter into his House, and sell it according to the rate set down.

Dec. 24. A Subsidy also was granted by the Spirituality of six shillings the Pound, and by the temporality of two shillings eight pence the pound in Goods, and four shillings the pound in Lands, to be paid all within two years. And so the twenty-fourth of December the Parliament was prorogu'd: At which time, the Speaker of the Lower House making an eloquent Oration, the King in Person made this ensuing Answer; being the more memorable, for that it was both full of good Intention and Advice, and the last he ever spake in that place.

The King's last Speech to his Parliament. Although my Chancellor for the time being hath before this time us'd very eloquently and substantially to make answer to such Orations as have been set forth in this High Court of Parliament; yet is he not so able to open and set forth my mind and meaning, and the secrets of my Heart, in so plain and ample manner, as I my self am, and can do. Wherefore, I taking upon me to answer your eloquent Oration (Mr. Speaker) say, that where you, in the name of our wel-belov'd Commons, have both prais'd and extoll'd me for the notable qualities that you have conceiv'd to be in me, I most heartily thank you all, that you have put me in remembrance of my Duty, which is to endeavour my self to obtain and get such excellent qualities, and necessary virtues, as a Prince or Governor should or ought to have; of which Gifts I recognize my self both bare and barren: But of such small qualities as God hath indued me withal, I render to his Goodness my most humble thanks, intending with all my Wit and Diligence, to get and acquire to me such notable Vertues and Princely Qualities, as you have alledg'd to be incorporated in my Person. These thanks for your loving admonition and good counsel first remembred; I esteems thank you again, because that you considering our great charge, (not for our plea-1545. sure, but for your defence; not for our gain, but to our great cost which we have lately sustain'd, as well in defence against our and your Enemies, as for the conquest of that Fortress which was to this Realm most displeasing and noysome, and shall be (by Gods Grace) hereafter to our Nation most profitable and pleasant,) have freely of your own minds granted to us a certain Subsidy, here in an Act specified, which verily we take in good part, regarding more your kindness, than the profit thereof, as he that setteth more by your loving Hearts, than by your Substance. Besides this hearty kindness, I cannot a little rejoice, when I consider the perfect trust and confidence which you have put in me, as Men having undoubted hope, and unfeigned belief in my good doing and just proceedings for you, without my desire or request, have committed to mine order and disposition all Chantries, Colledges, Hospitals, and other places specified in a certain Act, firmly trusting that I will order them to the glory of God, and to the profit of the Commonwealth. Surely, if I (contrary to your expectation) should suffer the Ministers of the Church to decay, or Learning (which is so great a Jewel) to be diminished, or poor and miserable People to be unreliev'd, you might say, that I being put into so special a trust as I am, in this case, were no trusty friend to you, nor charitable to mine, even as a Christian, neither a lover to the Publick-wealth, nor yet one that feared God, to whom account must be rendered of all our doings. Doubt not, I pray you, but your expectation shall be serv'd more godly and goodly, than you will wish or desire, as hereafter you shall plainly perceive. Now, sith I find such kindness in your part towards me, I cannot chuse but love and favour you; affirming, that no Prince in the World more favoureth his Subjects, than I do you; nor no Subjects or Commons more love and obey their Sovereign Lord, than I perceive you do; for whose defence my Treasure shall not be hidden, nor (if necessity require) my Person shall not be unadventured. Yet although I wish you, and you wish me to be in this perfect love and concord; this friendly amity cannot continue, except both you my Lords Temporal, and my Lords Spiritual, and you my loving Subjects study and take pains to amend one thing, which surely is amiss, and far out of order; to the which I most heartily require you: Which is, that Charity and Concord is not amongst you, but Discord and Dissention beareth rule in every place; Saint Paul saith to the Corinthians, the thirteenth Chapter, Charity is gentle, Charity is not envious, Charity is not proud, and so forth in the said Chapter. Behold then, what love and charity is amongst you, when one calleth another Heretick and Anabaptist; and he calleth him again Papist, Hypocrite and Pharisee? Be these tokens of charity amongst you? Are these signs of fraternal love betwixt you? No, no, I assure you, that this lack of Charity among your selves, will be the hindrance and asswaging of the fervent love betwixt us (as I said before) except this wound be sav'd and clearly made whole. I must needs judge the fault and occasion of this discord to be partly by the negligence of you the Fathers and Preachers of this Spirituality: For if I know a Man which liveth in Adultery, I must judge him a Lecherous and Carnal Person: If I see a Man boast and brag himself, I cannot but deem him a proud Man. I hear daily, that you of the Clergy preach one against another, without charity or discretion; some be too stiff in their old Mumpsimus, others be too busy and curious in their new Sumplimus: Thus all Men, almost, be in variety and discord, and few or none preach truly and sincerely the word of God, according as they ought to do. Shall I judge you charitable Persons doing this? No, no, I cannot so do: Alas, how can the poor souls live in concord, when you Preachers sow amongst them, in your Sermons, debate and discord? Of you they look light, and you bring them to darkness. Amend these Crimes, I exhort you, and set forth Gods Word both by true Preaching, and good Example-giving: Or else I, whom God hath appointed his Vicar and high Minister here, will see these Divisions extinct, and these Enormi-

1545. Enormities corrected according to my very Duty, or else I am an unprofitable Servant, and untrue Officer. Although, I say, the Spiritual Men be in some fault that Charity is not kept amongst them: Yet the Temporality be not clear and unspotted of Malice and Envy. For you rail on Bishops, speak slanderously of Priests, and rebuke and taunt Preachers; both contrary to good order and Christian Fraternity. If you know surely that a Bishop or Preacher erreth, or teacheth perverse Doctrine, come and declare it to some of our Council, or to us, to whom is committed by God the high Authority to reform and order such Causes and Behaviours: And be not Judges of your selves, of your phantastical Opinions and vain Expositions. In such high Causes you may lightly erre; and although you be permitted to read holy Scriptures, and to have the word of God in your Mother-Tongue, you must understand, that it is licensed you so to do, only to inform your own Consciences, and to instruct your Children and Families; and not to dispute, and make Scripture a railing and taunting stock against Priests and Preachers, as many light Persons do. I am very sorry to know and hear, how unreverently that most precious Jewel, the Word of God, is disputed, rim'd, sung, and jangled in every Alehouse and Tavern, contrary to the true meaning and doctrine of the same: And yet I am even as much sorry, that the Readers of the same follow it in doing so faintly, and so coldly. For of this I am sure, that Charity was never so faint amongst you, and vertuous and godly living was never less us'd, nor God himself among Christians was never less reverenc'd, honour'd or serv'd. Therefore, as I said before, be in charity one with another, like Brother and Brother; love, dread, and serve God, to the which, I, as your Supream Head and Sovereign Lord, exhort and require you: And then I doubt not but that Love and League that I spake of in the beginning, shall never be dissolv'd or broken betwixt us.

To the making of Laws, which you have now made and concluded, I exhort you the Makers, to be diligent in the putting them in execution, as you were in the making and furthering of the same; or else your labour shall be in vain, and your Commonwealth nothing reli'd. And now to your Petition concerning our Royal Assent to be given to such Acts as have pass'd both Houses, they shall be read openly, that you may hear them. And so they being read, the King assented, and rose.

The Universities have notice that all their Colleges are at his Majesties disposal.

The Parliament thus ended, and notice given to both Universities that the Colledges were at the Kings dispose, that of Cambridge first implor'd his favour, beseeching him to defend their Possessions from the covetous and greedy minds of those who knew not Learning. That of Oxford also Petitioned to this purpose; and Doctor Richard Cox Dean of Oxford, the Princes Tutor, writ to Secretary Paget, to represent the lack of Schools, Preachers, Houses of Livings for Orphans. And since the disposition of Chantries, &c. was in the Kings hands, to obtain that the Clergy might be provided for honestly, lest Beggary should drive them to Flattery, Superstition and old Idolatry: Which (saith he) I speak not, as if I distrusted the Kings goodness, but because there are such a number of importune Wolves as are able to devour Chantries, Cathedral Churches, Universities, and a thousand times as much: Adding in conclusion, that Posterity will wonder at us. Which particulars being in an Original from Cox, I have the rather inserted, that it may be gather'd what he was, to whom the tuition of the young Prince was committed by the King. But much intreaty needed not for the Universities; for in our Records, a Letter mentions, that the Universities did humbly thank his Highness for the continuance of their Houses with their Lands; which though, I believe, the King never meant to take away, yet I find two of the Professions were in danger of being remov'd, the King having 1545. ving advis'd once of placing all the Civilians in Oxford in one Colledge, and the Physicians and Chyrurgions in another. Howsoever, nothing was stirr'd or alter'd, that I can find; the King being so far from diminishing those famous Nurseries of Learning and Piety, that he rather help'd to increase and augment them. Though yet foreign parts were astonish'd not a little, why our Parliament should put them in this hazard, they being useful on any part, and their Endowments not to be alienated without singular prejudice to their Founders; who having separated them for the service of God, and publick Education, laid heavy Imprecations on any which should divert them from that use; as appears in the ancient Charters.

The Earl of Surrey (who now commanded in Boulogne) hearing that a Convoy of Victuals was coming to the Fort at Oultrean, resolves to intercept it: But as the Rhingrave with four thousand Lanskenets, together with many French under the Mareschal de Biez, stood firm, our Men, not able to break them, were discomfited, and Sir Edward Poynings, with divers brave Gentlemen slain; the Earl himself also being constrain'd to save himself as he could. Nevertheless, by a Letter of his to the King, Jan. 8. 1546. it appears there were many kill'd on the other side; which yet did so little satisfie our King (who lov'd no noise but of Victory) that he ever after disaffected him: For which cause also he was shortly remov'd, and the Earl of Hertford appointed to succeed. Whereupon Sir William Paget omitted not by Letter to admonish him to seek some eminent place in the Army, under the said Earls command, lest (as he said) he should be unprovided in the Town and Field. But the Earl desirous in the mean time to regain his former favour with the King, Skirmishes with the French, and puts them to the worst: But when together he certified that the French had made Canon of a greater Calibre than had been yet seen, wherewith they hop'd to beat the Town to Powder, and that it was worthy Consideration, whether low Boulogne should stand, as being not defensible, the Kings Council wish'd him to repair home, that he might be further heard concerning these Points. Whereupon the Earl of Hertford and Lord Admiral were sent over with an Army of nine thousand and three hundred Men; whereof one thousand five hundred were Spaniards, two hundred were Italians, three hundred Clervois, and three thousand Lanskenets, under Conrad Pfenning; a greater number of foreign Soldiers certainly than stood with exact reason of War, where there is no assured ground of a vertuous emulation. With these the Earl encamp'd at Hambleuse, betwixt Calais and Boulogne: For as the French intended to intercept all intercourse betwixt both places, they would have fortified there; but our Men got it two days only before they came, and built two Forts on that Coast. Some fights pass'd at Sea this while, whereof one is memorable, of seven or eight English in a small Vessel, who being master'd by a far greater number of French, entred their Ship, as pretending to save themselves out of their own Barque, which now began to sink; but finding certain Lime-pots there, they by casting water on them, rais'd such a smoak, as, through their continual throwing of them, blinded the French, and at last made them run under Hatches, where at length being shut up, their Ship was brought away. Much fighting also pass'd betwixt our Ships and the French Gallies, in Calms, while through the benefit of their Oars they took and left as they pleas'd. And now, as the Strangers in our Army began to take head, the Lanskenets mutined, not without shew of falling 1546. falling on the English; but the Spaniards standing firm to our side, all was compos'd.

May 21. The 21 of May the French Army came and encamp'd beyond Boulogne, near the Church on the Hill, their Fleet being in the Road under them: This made the Earl of Hertford come up and Skirmish with them. The 23^d he fought again, and

May 23. took divers Prisoners of note. And now each side attending his advantage to fight, a Surseance of War for five or six days was concluded, and after it a Peace: Which, that it may seem less

May 24. strange, I shall not so much alledge (for reason) that our Kings Treasure was exhausted (which the French pretend,) as that the consideration of the imminent Council gave all Christian Princes occasion to desire good intelligence among themselves, and our King particularly; who was advis'd, that Cardinal Poole and others would labour to procure a Decree against him and his Posterity: Which, though our King regarded not otherwise than became a Prince of his Courage; yet he thought it more considerable than the Popes single Bull; therefore he endeavour'd to get him Friends: And because he was in good terms already with the Emperor, who for the settling of Religion eachwhere mediated a General Peace, he thought fit also to take in Francis; and the rather, that among certain private Conventions in the following Treaty, Francis had promis'd his assistance on all occasions: And thus the Peace took effect. Which I find was so politicly handled by our King, that had his Predecessors observ'd the rule he now held, the French Writers could never have so much gloried in their Treaties. For as he capitulated to hold the Town for eight years next ensuing, he got the present advantage; which as the eternal Maxim in matter of Treaties, to frame Counsels by, I recommend to the Genius of our Country; since by the practice thereof only, I dare say, the French have usurped and won so much upon us; as knowing it impossible, but that betwixt Neighbouring Princes, in a little space, those occasions may be found or urg'd, which will help them to come off whenever they are dispos'd. There will be no danger therefore to retort this Maxime: Not yet that I approve a facility in dissolving Leagues, which should be inviolably kept, especially while the causes remain; but that they being dissolv'd, we may prevail our selves of the present occasion; not omitting yet any Circumstances, to which in point of Oath and Honour we are oblig'd. This present Treaty (concluded the seventh of June, 1546. at Campe, a place betwixt Ardres and Guisnes) was of this Tenor:

I. That all Injuries and Affronts since the beginning of the last War, should be forgotten, and Peace and Friendship re-establish'd.

II. That neither should invade, nor procure, nor permit to be invaded any of the Dominions, or Lands, or Cities which are now in the hands of the other.

III. That the Subjects of one shall have free commerce through the Dominions of the other, and free passage without safe conduct, so they exceed not the number of an hundred arm'd Persons.

IV. That during this Peace all Impositions which either Prince hath laid on the Subjects of the other, within twenty years last past, shall be releas'd, and no new ones impos'd.

V. VI. That Rebels and Traitors shall not be entertain'd or protect'd: But deliver'd to their Sovereign within 20 days after requisition.

VII. That no Letters of Reprisals or Merque, or counter-Merque should be granted but upon and against the principal Delinquents and their Goods, and that, in case of open denial of Justice; which shall be made plain by Letters of Summonition and Requisition. And if any thing during this Peace should be done contrary to it by any Subject of either Prince, the Offenders to be punish'd, and the Peace to remain.

VIII. That the Christian King shall pay the King of England all Pensions due to him during his Life, and also to his Successors for ever, according to the Treaty at More, 30 August 1525. As also that Pension of Salt agreed on the 30th of April, 1527. and afterwards reduc'd to a certain Sum of Mony, (viz.) 10000 Crowns, which isto be paid yearly at two payments, during the natural life of Henry VIII. if the said payment appear not to be perpetual: But if it be found to be perpetual, then the French King and his Heirs and Successors shall continue the said Pension for ever.

IX. The French King shall pay to the King of England on the Feast of Saint Michael (or within ten days after that day) which shall be Anno Domini 1554. for Arrerages, as well of Pensions not paid, as for his charges in Fortifications within the Town and Country of Boulogne, since the beginning of the last War, either already rais'd, or to be built betwixt this time and the said 1554. the sum of two Millions of Crowns de Soleil; upon the payment whereof the said most Christian King shall be free from all former Arrerages whatsoever.

X. Because the King of England, by vertue of certain Letters of the French King, dated 29 Jan. 1529. claims as due unto him, the sum of 500000 Crowns de Soleil, 22 Sols and 6 Deniers: It is agreed that there shall be Commissioners appointed on both sides (within three Months hence) to hear and end that cause; which sum the King of France (if it be so adjudg'd) shall pay when he pays the two Millions aforesaid. But if the Commissioners conclude nothing, the matter shall be devolv'd to four Lawyers that are Subjects to neither Princes, to be chosen by them, and that shall stand which three of them determine.

XI. That the King of France shall suffer the King of England quietly to enjoy the Town of Boulogne, and the Castles and Territories thereof, within the Bounds following: viz. the Haven of Boulogne, with the farther shoar, as far as the highest water comes; and the Land in length as far as Pont de Bricque, which shall be the limit on that part, the River there remaining common to both Princes: All within these bounds the King of England shall quietly possess, until the King of France hath fully paid the aforesaid two Millions (as also the Sums express'd Article X.) in the time, place and manner limited.

XII. That when the said Sums are paid, at the same time the King of England shall surrender Boulogne, with all the Territories taken by him in the late War, and all Fortifications built there by him since the taking thereof, so that no Fortification shall be impair'd. Neither shall the King of England be bound hereby in the restoring of the said places, to leave behind him any Moveables.

XIII. That from the date hereof, to the day of St. Michael, 1554. neither of the two Princes shall raise any new Fortification within the County of Boulogne (but those that have been begun already they may perfect).

XIV. The Emperor is comprehended by both the Princes, by force of the perpetual Confederation.

XV. The Scots are comprehended in this Treaty, against whom the King of England shall not wage War, unless new occasion be given; in which case, this present comprehension of the Scots shall receive that interpretation which is contain'd in the Treaty of the date of April the fifth, 1515. with this alteration, that although by the said Treaty concluded between Henry and Francis.

1546. said Treaty of 1515. fifteen days only were prescribed to the French King to intimate the said Comprehension to the Scots, yet now, by reason of the distance of place, there is allow'd the space of thirty days, next following the conclusion hereof.

XVI. This Treaty shall be ratified within forty days after the date hereof.

Commissioners for our King were,

John Viscount Lisle, Admiral; Sir William Paget, Secretary; and Doctor Nicholas Wotton, Dean of Canterbury.

And on Francis his part,
Claude d'Annebault Mareschal and Admiral of France;

Pierre Raymond, premier President de Rouen; and Guillaume Bouchevel, Secretary.

This Peace being proclaim'd in London upon the thirteenth of June, a general Procession was there made, and all the richest silver Crosses out of the several Parish-Churches carried, and the bravest Copes worn, for the greater Solemnity: But our Historians note it as fatal, it being the last time they were publickly us'd, since our King call'd them in shortly after, together with the Church-Plate, into his Treasury and Wardrobe, without that other cause appear'd thereof, than that he suspected the War would break out again betwixt him and Francis, of which also this overture was given.

May 25. The Earl of Hertford being certified (during the Treaty) that the Clause of not making any new Fortification, would be prejudicial, was commanded by our King immediately to raise a Fort according to a Plot given; but such was the prevention of this diligent Earl, that he had already begun it about the thirteenth of May. Our King in the mean while protesting that he liked not the Article. But the French as little liking our Fort, (as collecting thence we meant not to restore Boulogne) some difficulty was interpos'd. Though as our King answer'd, he could not so much as hope to keep the Town, for the term agreed, unless he had means to secure it, the Treaty held in the manner above-mentioned, and both Armies were dissolv'd; the French yet first, as our King requir'd, retiring. And so he remain'd in quiet possession thereof, after the expence (as I find in our Records) of 586718 li. 12 s. 3 d. 11. in the winning thereof. The charges in keeping thereof being 755833 li. 11 s. 3 d. 14. In all 1342552 li. 3 s. 7 d. 1. An excessive Sum, especially to reap no benefit thence, but a Landing-place in France, which Calais formerly afforded. This Peace was seconded by a kind Invitation of Francis to our King to Christen the Dauphin's Daughter; which being as lovingly accepted, Sir Thomas Cheyney was sent over, and the Child call'd Elizabeth. The two Admirals also were sent by their several Kings, to receive the Oaths requir'd for observance of this Treaty; and, being richly rewarded, return'd. Howbeit this Peace was not intire; for if our King conceiv'd it lawful to finish the Fort he had begun before the Treaty, the French wanted not pretexts for the like; therefore, when upon their erecting a Fort at Portet, near the entry to the Haven (which they call'd Chastillons Garden) our Men took exceptions thereat, the French for their best Title alledg'd that Monsieur de Biez, had formerly begun it by entrenching his Men there; yet as this did not satisfy our King, who knew well the difference betwixt a Trench and Fortification, he commanded Sir William Paget to write thus to William Lord Grey of Wilton, who now commanded in Boulogne.

Sept. 5.

After our most hearty Commendations to your good Lordship, this shall be to signify unto the same, that the Kings Majesty being inform'd that the Frenchmen begin to fortify at Portet, which by their Treaty with his Majesty they ought not to do, requireth your Lordship to speak with the doers of the said Works, and to tell them it shall be best for them to stay working any further, until they shall hear from their Master; which without doubt, is like to be very shortly; for that his Majesties Ambassador hath charge to speak with him in the same immediately. And in case they shall answer again, that either they will not, or dare not leave working without the knowledge of Monsieur de Biez, or (peradventure) of such other whom they shall name to have the charge of the Works; and so go forwards still in their Works: Then his Majesty pleaseth, that if you shall find your selves able enough for the feat, you shall in the night overthrow that which they have wrought. And in case you shall find your selves not able enough for the same Enterprize; then to forbear the doing of it until such time as a stronger force come to you from hence, which shall be sent over with all diligence possible.

This 5th of Septemb. 1546.

This also was sign'd by the King. Nevertheless, upon better advice, the King thought fit to send Sir Thomas Palmer with a Message to the Lord Grey, commanding him immediately to demolish the Fort; who thereupon made that haste, as before the Letters came, he arriv'd at Boulogne, being the very day of his dispatch; and presently, by the assistance of the Lord Grey, Mr. Poyning, and some others, the Frenchmens Work was levelled: and so Palmer return'd to certify what was done. And now the Kings Letters being delivered, the Lord Grey writes, that before the receipt of his Letters, he had (upon such relation of his Majesties pleasure, as was made by Sir Thomas Palmer) overthrown the Work at Portet, and therefore desires his Majesties Pardon. Which passage I have related more particularly out of our Records, that I might correct the error of some of our Historians, who would have our King deliver Palmer a Message and Letter that were contradictory: Whereas it appears by our Records, that the Message was first deliver'd, and the business done before the Letters came. Though I will not deny, but the Lords of the Council, knowing the Letter was sent, but not (perchance) any thing of the Message, might have occasion to think the Lord Grey more forward, than that he could well justify it. Howsoever, Monsieur de Biez complains hereof to the Lord Grey, and desires to know whether it were done by his Majesties command. What he answer'd, I find not: But it appears by the Instructions given to Nicholas Wotton the Kings Ambassador with Francis, that he had charge to palliate the business as handsomely as he could; which also so prevail'd, that no new Fortification was erected by the French, during our Kings time. Besides, our Records tell us, hope was now given, that Francis would renounce the Popes Authority in his Kingdom: Which, though much entertain'd at first by our King, and judg'd the more probable, that the Emperor and Pope did wholly govern the Council, was not yet so thoroughly embrac'd, lest (perchance) by Confiscations, Suppressions, &c. Francis might grow greater than stood with the interest of State or Neighbourhood: And for Paget, he said openly, it was but a trick to get Boulogne again; Francis being not able to give any security for performance of this offer, which might countervail the immediate surrendering of that Place. Howbeit, Arguments wanted not, that he was in earnest, both as he treated of a Confederation

1546. deration with the Protestants at this time; who yet (as I find by our Records) rejected it, unless he relinquished the Papal Authority: And as he lived in such Jealousy of State with the Emperor; which together with the apprehension of the Assembly at Trent, now daily increasing, might for more than one reason dispose him to seek Friends elsewhere, as well for defending himself against his Enemies, as establishing an absolute Power and Jurisdiction at home. And with this concurs that which Fox relates: That during the stay of d'Annebault in this Court, Treaty was had betwixt both Princes of changing the Mass in their Realms unto a Communion: And that both were so thoroughly and firmly resolved therein, that they meant to exhort the Emperor to do the like in Flanders, and other his Dominions, or else to break with him; and that our King particularly had willed the Archbishop Cranmer (as himself confessed) to pen a Form to be sent to the French King to consider of. But through the death of both Princes successively not long after, these and all other their Designs ended: Though yet for the time which remained, their former Love and Correspondence was so reviv'd, as Francis is said (by the French Writers) never to have rejoiced heartily after the News of our King's Death was brought him. But I leave the censure of these Passages free to the Reader's Judgment, without delivering any Opinion, otherwise than as the Collections out of our Records seem to infer.

Let us now see what was done by the Emperor, and the Council of Trent.

THE Emperor in the latter end of 1545 being in Flanders, the Bishops of Winchester and Westminster (formerly mention'd) resided with him on our King's part: And because one of the businesses of the French about this time was to offer a Match betwixt the Prince of Spain and the Daughter of Francis, our King commanded Winchester to hinder it, and propose the Lady Elizabeth. Also Speech was had of a Marriage betwixt our Prince and one of Ferdinand's Daughters: But because neither of these took effect, I shall mention them no otherwise. Yet the Bishop of Westminster return'd not home, as being employ'd by our King into Germany, to give intelligence of that which pass'd. For now in January, 1546, the Protestants met at Frankfort; and as they knew the Emperor intended a Voyage into Germany, they consulted concerning their mutual defence, knowing that both the Spiritual and Temporal Sword should be drawn against them.

This while the Assembly at Trent holding, the Breve for exempting the Bishops from payment of their Tenths came: Yet as this did rather accommodate than secure them, 300 Foot and some Horse, being gather'd out of the County of Trent, were appointed to make a Guard as they pass'd to Church, being now, besides the Legats and the Cardinal of Trent, four Archbishops, twenty eight Bishops, three Abbats, and four Generals, (in all forty three;) among which was Richard Pace, heretofore Ambassador to the Emperor for our King, but now fallen to the Pope, and by him stil'd Bishop of Worcester; and Robert Venant, titular Archbishop of Armagh; together with Olaus Magnus, Archbishop of Upsale; all which had been some Years entertain'd with Pensions from the Pope: Besides, there were about twenty Divines, which though they had no Seat in the Council, were admitted to stand there; as also ten Gentlemen the Neighbourhood, of the Cardinal of Trent's Election:

And moreover a Seat was particularly appointed for the Ambassadors which should assist there. And now question being of the Stile of the Council, the few French which were there, requir'd, that to Sacro-sancta Synodus should be added Universalem Ecclesiam representans; but this was rejected; both to exclude the Protestants admittance under this Title, as also all Laicks; and as it might be thought in some sort prejudicial to the Pope's Supream Authority. And so, Jan. 7. (being the second Session) they decreed an Exhortation to the Priests and People to serve God in Prayer, Alms, Sobriety, &c. The thirteenth Jan. 13. of January it was moved, that they would come to the Points contained in the Bull, being the Extirpation of Heresy, Reformation of Discipline, and Establishing of Peace. And concerning this, there were four Opinions.

The Imperialists said, before they touch'd matter of Doctrine, it was necessary to take away those Transgressions whence Heresies have sprung.

The second Opinion was, To begin with Doctrine, since Faith being the Basis of Religion, it was a greater Sin to err therein, than in Manners: And therefore that the Pope had placed it first in his Bull.

The third was, That the two Points of Reformation and Faith should not be disjoin'd, there being no Doctrine which hath not its Abuse, nor Abuse that draws not after it an ill Interpretation of some Doctrine. And that this was the best way to give a speedy and happy conclusion to the Council, which they should chiefly endeavour; there being no Advantage likely to ensue to the Pope or Court of Rome by the protracting thereof.

The fourth sort (and among them the French particularly) would have had the Point of Peace first treated of, and that other Princes might be requir'd to send their Ambassadors and Prelates thither: And that the Lutherans might be invited to come and unite themselves to the rest of Chri-stendom. The Legates having heard their Opinions, and commended their Wisdom, said, that because the Hour was late, the Deliberation important, and the Opinions various, they would think upon it. Order also was taken to hold their Congregations weekly on Mondays and Fridays. The Legates hereupon advertis'd the Pope of that which pass'd, desiring his Advice, and that he would take order for supporting of the poorer Bishops; it being better they should not be there, than ill satisfy'd. Howbeit, the Pope delay'd his Reply, as having his Mind wholly bent to War, according to the Treaty which Cardinal Farnese had with the Emperor the Year preceding. This much perplex'd the Legates, as on private Conference among themselves, they agreed to treat of matter of Faith and Reformation together; but withal, entertain'd the time, upon pretence that many Prelates were on their way. Cardinal Poole propos'd, that since in all ancient Councils some Symbol of Faith was published, they should do the like in this: But concerning this Symbol of Faith there was some difficulty; since to recite the old, would not convince the Lutherans, who believ'd it as well as the Catholics: Besides, that it were to confess, that they durst not handle the controverted Points, or treat of a Reformation. But upon further dispute hereof, it was resolved by the major part for the Affirmative; and in the third Session (Feb. 4.) the Creed was barely recited: The Cardinal de Monte disliking that any Point should be added afterwards, lest some Inconvenience should follow. The next Session was adjourn'd to April

The Court of Rome, who now understood of that which pass'd (though heretofore much start'd at the Name of a Reformation, as knowing not how far it might extend) yet generally lik'd this late Decree, as being worthy the Proceeding of a General Council: Others yet approving it only as it was dilatory, while there wanted not some, who took occasion to pasquil it.

Jan 27.

This while the Emperor being in Flanders, prepares for Germany, both as the Diet and Conference of Divines was appointed at Ratisbonne, and as the Council of Trent did hold: Yet, lest he should alarm the Protestants, he took with him only his ordinary Guard, being 500 Horse. And now the Conference holding, and divers Propositions being made on the Emperor's part, the Affair insisted on was matter of Religion; where the Point of Justification being brought in question, took up much time, without having other conclusion, yet, than perplex'd and abrupt: Informuch, that the Duke of Saxe recall'd his Divines, and Martin Bucer return'd to the Landgrave of Hesse; which, whether it were that the Protestants foresaw the Emperor's Intention was to amuse them with Conferences, while himself prepar'd for War; or that otherwise they found no hope of coming to an agreement, is uncertain: Howsoever, the Emperor, when he came to the Diet, seem'd much offended at their departure; though, as during these Conferences

Luther's Death.

Martin Luther died in the LXIII Year of his Age, he doubted not more easily to appease Controversies, as believing Luther to be of so violent a Spirit, as would interrupt any moderate Accord. Howbeit, for declining an Affront, in case the Protestants should come to no Agreement at the future Diet, he made preparations for War; which yet he could not keep so secret, but the Protestants understood it, and fortify'd themselves. Whereupon also Philip Count Palatine, Nephew to Frederic the Elector, was dispatch'd into England to intreat for Succours: He had besides, his private business; which (as our Records tell us) was to obtain the Princess

Mary, our King's Daughter. Neither did our King seem averse, when Frederic the Elector would perform certain Conditions requir'd of him: But as this took no effect, I shall come to the particular of his publick business, treated chiefly by John Bruno; which was a Confederation projected betwixt our King and the Protestants. The Conditions propos'd by our King were to this effect:

Records.
Conditions of Confederation propos'd to the Protestant Princes in Germany by King Henry.

That if the said Princes would send some wise and discreet Agents fully instructed, and with them the Names of the Members of the League, and what Aids every one is bound to give, and in what cases, and whether they will stand to the old Rates or to new, now to be made when his Majesty shall enter the League; his Majesty would be pleased to enter a League with them defensive against all Men, and for all Causes, and will be bound to such a rate of Aid as may besit his Honour and Quality: So that he may have the first place in the League, which for more Honour should be called, The League Christen: With such Conditions likewise, that no other should be admitted to this League, but such as are already enter'd into the same, without his Majesty's Consent. And because they would look for a greater Aid at his Majesty's hands than of any other Prince or City in this League, his Majesty would look by Covenant to have in all Meetings concerning the Confederacy, three Voices to two of any other Prince. Concerning the Union of the said Princes together, and of his Majesty with them all in Doctrine of Religion, his Majesty thanks them that they are content to follow the Advice of his Majesty ut-

on such Considerations and Conferences as their learned Men and his shall have together in his Majesty's Presence, following the holy Scripture, or the determination of the Primitive Church, or General Councils had before five or six hundred Years: For which purpose his Majesty promiseth to take pains to be present himself, and trusteth (such Men being sent from them as be learned, and Men of upright judgments, without Affection, and of good Conformity) to be the Cause of such a Conjunction in Religion in all Christendom, as shall tend to the Glory of God. For the which purpose his Majesty requireth them now when they shall send Commissioners to conclude the League Defensive, to send also the Names of ten or twelve Men, to the intent his Majesty may chuse four, five, or six out of the same; which his Majesty requireth to have sent hither according to the Promise already made, as soon as may be. To which the Protestants finally answer'd, That if our King would depose an hundred thousand Crowns in their some part of Germany, where they might take it when they were invaded for Religion, then they would prefer his Friendship before the French, who now treated with them. But this again was rejected by our King, since for a bold Demand they offer'd nothing equivalent; yet he continu'd his Treaty with the Palatine, so far forth as he might detain the Protestants from suffering the French to gather Men in Germany for the recovering of Beaulogne, and from submitting themselves to the Council of Trent, and encourage them to frame their Religion according to the Word of God, which, he said, was the true Rule. But the Germans, who knew at what distance our King liv'd, did not much regard any Advices which were not seconded with Money: Therefore they trusted to themselves, and our King (as aforesaid) made Peace with the French.

On the other side, as the Emperor's Presence operated much in Germany, so the Match which Ferdinand had made of his Daughter Anne to the Son of the Duke of Bavaria, and Mary to the Duke of Cleves, did not a little strengthen his Party. Beside, the Pope offer'd him twelve thousand Foot, eight hundred Horse, and 300000 Ducats in Money (as Sandoval hath it) and to procure him assistance from others, without omitting particularly to promise his best assistance in a spiritual way; while, to make the Protestants more culpable of drawing this War upon them, he sent to his Legates in the Council of Trent to proceed calmly (without beginning any new Difficulties) in matter of Faith; and to make no haste in point of Reformation, though urged by the Emperor. Hereupon the Legates commanded certain Fryars and Divines to extract those Articles out of the Lutherans Books, which seemed contrary to their Faith. Where (among others) the Authority of the holy Scriptures and Traditions was first examined. And here their Divines differ'd; some affirming they were all one, the Scripture it self being deriv'd unto us but by Tradition: Moreover, St. Austin's Words were urged, That he should not believe the Scriptures, but for the Authority of the Church. Which therefore should first be settled, and then used for deciding of Controversies, and convincing the Lutherans. But then the Question was, Which, and what was the Church? And whether the Hierarchy, and more properly the Council whereof the Pope was the Head? But it was not thought safe to call these things into doubt. Then they fell again to treat of the Scripture and Traditions; and whether it hath accidentally come to pass, that it being all taught, some part was not put in writing: Some holding, that the Church had its Perfection before any of the Apostles writ, and would have continu'd so, if nothing had been set down in Writing. But that this Question and the 1546. the like being not formerly propos'd by the Lutherans, might well be omitted for Peace sake; which clause was check'd by Cardinal Pool, who said, It was fitter for a Conference in Germany, than a Council: Adding, that one of two things was to be done, that is, either the Lutherans brought to receive all the Roman Doctrine; or when they would not, that all their Errors should be discover'd, to shew the World how impossible it was to come to an Agreement.

II. Then it was resolv'd, that a Catalogue of the Canonical Books of the Scripture should be made as they are accepted by the Roman Church, without regarding whether the Jews receiv'd them or not. But here some difficulties were urg'd; some of those Scriptures having been always receiv'd, others (though doubtful) having by use yet obtain'd Canonical Authority: That is to say, the Epistle to the Hebrews, that of St. James, the second of St. Peter, the second and third of St. John, that of St. Jude, and the Apocalypse, and some parties of the Evangelists. Besides which, there were in the Old Testament seven Books never averr'd, and some Chapters of Daniel and Hester, and especially the Book of Baruch, as wanting his beginning; though some esteem'd it a part of Jeremiab. At length, all the Books usually put in the Latin Bible were judg'd Canonical, and Traditions to be of equal Authority with the Scripture: Nevertheless, doubts were rais'd concerning putting the Books of the Scripture into order. This while Petrus Paulus Vergerius, Bishop of Justinopolis in Istria, coming to the Council, was repuls'd: For, as he had been employ'd in Germany against the Lutherans with so little advantage to the Pope, as while he labour'd to confute the Protestants, himself became one; so they would not admit him, though he pretended his business was only to purge himself, but remanded him to the Pope, who shortly after depriv'd him of his Bishoprick.

III. And now that being declar'd without more ado to be holy Scripture, which the Roman Church had receiv'd, question arose concerning the Translation of it. Some saying, that to understand only the Latin Text, was not to receive the infallible word of God, but that of the Translator; and therefore that the Originals should be viewed, and a Translation made which the Council should declare Authentick. But if this should seem a long work, it were good (at least) to verify their Latin Translation with the Original Text: Howbeit, the greater part said, it was necessary to hold the Latin Translation to be Divine and Authentick, since otherwise they would be obnoxious to the Lutherans, and a gate open'd to innumerable Heresies: For if Men might examine Translations, all would be reduc'd to Pedantism, and new Grammarians would give the Law. Besides that, Inquisitors could not convince Hereticks without knowledge of the Original Tongues. Many other Points coincident hereunto, were likewise handled, too long to be here rehears'd.

IV. Then they came to the Exposition of Scriptures, and the ancient Fathers were declar'd as the Rule thereof.

V. In conclusion, it was requir'd, whether all these determinations were to be enacted under the Anathema: In which, after much doubt, a middle course was held. So that the eighth of April, Session IV. two Decrees were read; one to Authorise the Scriptures read in the Roman Church, and the Traditions receiv'd there, both concerning Faith and Manners: The second to declare the vulgar Translation to be Authentick, and that it should not be expounded contrary to the sense deliver'd by the Church, and unanimous consent of the Fathers: The Penalty in the first Decree being Anathema, in the second such as pleas'd the Ordinary. And so the next Session was deferr'd till the seventeenth of June, and these Decrees Printed; which at length, being publish'd in Germany, it was thought strange, that five Cardinals, and XLVIII Bishops only, should so easily determine these great Points, without hearing what could be objected to the contrary.

About this time our King was certified by Edmund Howard, his Ambassador at Rome, that the French labour'd to procure a Censure against him in the Council. But as the Peace formerly mentioned between King Henry and Francis, was shortly after concluded, so this took no effect.

And now the Pope thought fit to add divers to the number of those Cardinals and Prelates at Rome he us'd to advise with concerning the Council; admonishing the Legates together at Trent, First, Not to publish any Decree henceforth, without approbation from Rome. Secondly, Not to spend time in Points not controverted. Thirdly, Above all things to take heed of disputing the Papal Authority. Which being done, he requir'd the Bishops and Abbats of the Swiss to come to the Council: He also proceeded against the Archbishop of Cologne, Condemning, Excommunicating and depriving him for adhering to the Lutherans: Furthermore, he intreated the Emperor to execute the Sentence. But he conceiving the Archbishop was at his Devotion; and besides, knowing that such a rigorous proceeding would but alarm the Protestants, and force the Archbishop to colleague with them, neglected to perform this request: And the rather, that the Duke of Saxe had signified unto him, that he saw clearly the Popes intentions were wholly bent to establish his own Authority: And therefore, that it was time to assemble a National Council in Germany, or to treat seriously of matter of Religion in the Diet.

And now the Council in Congregation propos'd the Point of Original Sin: But the Spanish Prelates desir'd rather a Reformation of the abuses in Preaching and Lectures: Adding, that they had express Letters from the Emperor, not to enter yet into matters of Doctrine: Which also the intelligence found in our Records, doth particularly affirm. The Legates, (on the other side) urg'd the Popes Bull. In conclusion, both Points were resolv'd, and the Theologians enjoyn'd to handle matter of Faith among themselves, and with the assistance of some Canonists to treat of a Reformation. According to which order, Lectures and Preaching being first spoken of, some dissention appear'd: The Bishops desiring the ordering of these things should immediately depend on them: But the Legates contending to maintain the Pontifical Authority, by which these duties were committed to Fryars Mendicants, &c. This Controversie finding no Issue, the Pope writ unto the Council, that they should begin with Original Sin; observing yet a due respect unto the Emperor. Notwithstanding, the Legates thought fit the business of Reading and Preaching should first be dispatch'd, which was not without some contention: For as it hath been an ancient Arcanum Imperii among the Popes for conserving their Jurisdiction, to exempt Bishops from their Archbishops, and Abbats and Fryars again from Bishops, &c. so some wrangling pass'd; while each part strove to maintain its Authority: The Bishops complaining of the vanity and covetousness of the Preaching Fryars; and these again objecting the negligence of Bishops, and idleness of Parish-Priests. But all at last, was (in a sort) reconciled, the Bishops being 1546. being allow'd Authority over the Regulars, only when they would hold it as from the Pope. After which, the Point of Original Sin being brought into Examination, Cardinal Paceco a Spaniard, said, it was not yet time, nor until the business of Germany were riper. Nevertheless, the question was urg'd; yet so as it was protracted, both by the many difficulties of it, and the Diet at Ratisbonne; which, beginning towards the end of May, made the Prelates intente to its Proceedings. Our King not omitting also to inform himself of what should pass by the Bishop of Westminster's means, whom he had imploy'd thither. But little good follow'd of this Diet: For while the Roman-Catholicks would not allow that Controversies of Religion should be decided in a National Council (as the Protestants desir'd;) nor they again submit to the Council of Trent, being, in their Opinion, a most partial and factious Assembly, the Emperor knew not what well to resolve: He would have been glad of such a Peace as might have conserv'd his Authority, without caring much to hear of Errors discover'd in either of the opposite Parts; or that they had found out some witty and new distinction. But there is not any thing more hard than to devise how a free and equal Council may be held, or who should be a competent Judge of the emergent differences; since, as any of those who are Parties in the business, cannot properly exercise that Function; so, to appeal to any other that were of a different Religion, should be not only to call the parts, but the whole into question. Nevertheless, it may be demonstrated, that a more even course may be kept herein than hath been hitherto practis'd, and a more indifferent for all Mankind: Which as it is deeply concern'd in all the rigid Decrees of Religion, so in some sort or other should intervene; in which case, certainly the Spirit of God would preside.

June.
Emperor prepares War against the Protestants.

The Emperor this while having made many secret Provisions for War, certain notice thereof came to the Protestants at the Diet, who because he had made Peace with France, and Truce for one year with the Turk, did easily conjecture it was intended against them; especially it being related that the Pope and Ferdinand did arm; so that every thing was in confusion. The Emperor us'd much industry to draw all those Protestants who were not Collegu'd with the rest at Smalcald, unto his Party, telling them this War was only against Rebels, and promising them the exercise of their Religion.

The Protestants, on the other side, declar'd in a publick Remonstrance, that the Emperors intentions were far other than he pretended; exhorting therefore both them and one another to stand firm.

Sept. V.
Two Decrees pass the Council of Trent.

This while the Council held the Fifth Session, and two Decrees pass'd: 1. Concerning Original Sin, and the Benefit of Baptism, &c. 2. Concerning Lectures and Preaching; wherein the Bishops and Clergy were commanded to be diligent and careful. This being done, the French Ambassador Petrus Danesius made a long and eloquent Oration, shewing the affection their Kings had ever born to the Christian Religion: And how that Gregory the First had for this cause given the Title of Catholique to Childebert; and that his King had therefore sent him Ambassador thither, desiring first, that some determination might be made in Religion; then, that those Priviledges should be conserv'd, of which Lodovicus Pius was in Possession, and all the sequent Kings; and that the Priviledges and Immunities of the Church of France might be confirm'd. To whom no Answer was given but a Complement.

The Decrees being now Printed and Published in Germany, gave much occasion of discourse and unsatisfaction. The Emperor himself not liking that in the business of Reformation, the smaller Points had been handled, and the greater pretermitted; and that the Controversies in matter of Faith had been thus stirred, and especially that of Original Sin, as being almost reconciled in some former Conferences in Germany. And now the Cardinal of Trent having absolutely concluded that League betwixt the Pope and the Emperor against the Protestants, and those which refus'd the Council of Trent (which by the Cardinal Farnese his means, was formerly treated of) all sides prepar'd for War: The Pope also sending Men and Money in that proportion which is above-mentioned, or (as some will have it) besides the twelve thousand Foot, only five hundred Horse, to be maintain'd for six Months at his charge, and 200000 Crowns in Money. Moreover, he granted the Emperor (for the present year) the half of all the Revenues of the Churches of Spain, and that he might alienate of the Rents of the Monasteries of these Kingdoms, to the value of five hundred thousand Crowns, upon condition that during the said six Months, the Emperor might make no accord with the Protestants without him; and that of all which was gotten, he should have a certain Portion: And that when the time was expir'd, if the War did continue, they should treat of new Conditions. It being free for the Emperor (in the mean while) to try all fair means for reducing the Protestants to submit to this Council: For which end also he treated with them, professing that he did not undertake this War for cause of Religion, but respects of State, and because some deny to obey his Laws, and had confederated themselves mutually, with Strangers against him, and usurp'd other Mens Possessions, and chiefly Ecclesiastical, procuring to make Bishopricks and Abbeyes hereditary to their Families; and that having divers ways endeavour'd to reduce them, they were still more insolent. The Protestants, on the other side, did strive to clear themselves unto the World from imputation of Rebellion, shewing, that Religion only was cause of this War, which the Pope and Council of Trent had kindled against them: Requiring from the Emperor performance of the Oath he took upon receiving his Dignity in Francfort, which they pretended he had broken in this abrupt making of War. They sent also to England and France (being now newly reconcil'd) to borrow Money. But our King answer'd, that the course of things being now alter'd, he could not resolve on any thing without better information. Nevertheless, that upon their standing firm together, he might furnish some Money upon fitting Conditions. This caus'd the Protestants to make new Levies at home: And the rather, that the Pope had about this time by Bull publish'd, that the War was for Religion.

And now Philip Landgrave of Hesse having his Forces ready, comes into the Field, and the Duke of Saxe after; whereupon they both were proscrib'd by the Emperor (then being at Ratisbonne) who breaking up the Diet, commanded another to be held the first of Feb. 1547.

This while the Council of Trent sitting, the Secretary declar'd (in the name of the Legates) that the next point to be examin'd, was that of Divine Grace; and they shall the rather follow this Order, because it was us'd in the Augustan Confession, which they intended to condemn. Nevertheless, the Imperialists urg'd still a Reformation: But being over-ru'd, certain Theologians 1546. ans were appointed to gather the Lutherans Opinions.

Decision concerning Justification, Faith and Works.

That of Justification, Faith and Works was propos'd in XXV. Articles. But when the point of Justification by Faith was urg'd, the word FAITH was found ambiguous; yet at last all agreeing, that Justifying Faith was an assent to all things reveal'd by God, and propos'd by the Church as necessary. It was further distinguish'd into a solitary, dead, meerly Historical Faith, and a lively one working by Charity. Then was disput'd which of these did justify; and some affirm'd both: The first whereof was to be understood yet as the Basis and Ground of the latter: And here many School-subtilties arising, were hotly pursu'd by the Dominicans on the one side, and Franciscans on the other; the former holding (with Luther) that all our Works without Faith are Sin; the Franciscans opposing, that Man by his natural free-will may observe the Law, and do good, and thereby prepare himself, ex congruo, for Grace, since God fails not him who doth what he can. After this they fell to examine the nature of Grace, of Justification, of Imputation, &c. Concerning which the Reader may find more in Concilio Tridentino. Only I shall observe (as conducing to my History) that these Disputes were thus purposely spun out, partly by the procurement of the Emperor, who still desir'd that nothing should yet be decreed in matter of Faith; and partly by the industry of the Court of Rome, who studied to hinder the reformation in Discipline.

Maurice D. of Saxony, a Protestant, sides with the Emperor.

The Emperor now, that he might divide the Protestants, encourageth Maurice Duke of Saxe, Cosen-German to the Elector, and Son-in-Law to the Landgrave, to invade the States of these proscrib'd Princes: To which also he was sufficiently dispos'd. This while the Pope did a little temporize: For though he knew the Emperor would be obnoxious to him, as long as there was so manifest an use of his Assistance; yet withal, he did not desire Charles should be too absolute in Germany, lest afterwards he should turn his Arms upon Italy, and give the Law to his Country and Religion, upon pretence that there was no other way to conserve Peace. Neither were the Catholics themselves in Germany over-forward to take his part, lest under colour of reducing Religion to its former state by Arms, he would overthrow their Liberty. For preventing, whereof, as well as divers other suspicions among the Protestants (that the Council of Trent was assembled only to condemn them) he sent again to the Pope, to desire that the Council might continue, and the Legates might treat only of a Reformation. To which, because he knew some were averse, he directed a particular Message unto the Cardinal Santa Croce, telling him, that if he offer'd to dissolve the Council, he would cause him to be thrown into the River Adige. The Pope finding the Emperor thus in earnest, continues the Council; writing yet to the Legates, that they should entertain the time: And for this purpose Fastings, Prayers, and a Jubile (now publish'd for the good success of this War) did serve. Neither was it without cause; the Protestants Army being now drawn near Tirol, to hinder the Italians from joyning with the Imperialists. The danger whereof being magnified by the more timorous sort of Bishops, many were desirous to retire, while some fled from the Council. But the Cardinal of Trent newly return'd from Rome, comforted those which remain'd. And now the Popes and other the Italian Auxiliary Forces passing by Trent into Germany, another way than the Protestants expected, they at last at Landshut in Bavaria joyn'd with the Emperor;

who bestow'd upon Ottavio Farnese (their General) the Order of the Toison, and took a muster of his Men: The Protestant Army being at Donawert, which they had newly taken, and in that readiness, that they attended only their advantage to fight.

But we will leave them in this posture a while, to tell a notable accident which happen'd at Malines in Brabant, 7 August, 1546. Certain Barrels of Powder, to the number of seven hundred, being stow'd in the bottom of a great Tower, Lightning falling thereon, and kindling it, the Tower was rais'd from his foundations on high, and scatter'd in the Air; the stones whereof flying every way, threw down two hundred Houses in the City, and as many in the Suburbs, kill'd five hundred Men, and hurt two thousand; the wind whereof broke Glas-windows every where, and open'd many Locks. Besides which, it had this prodigious effect, that it dry'd up all the water in a ditch adjoyning, being a Pike deep, and levell'd the Earth, rooting up together many Trees; of which kind, it was observ'd, that those which lost only their leaves and fruit, budded again, and bore in Autumn.

But it seems more strange which Stow relates, that in England this year a Potter falling asleep, April 27. could not be awaken'd in fourteen days and nights, finding himself yet afterwards as if he had taken but one nights rest.

The Duke of Saxe and Landgrave of Hesse, who commanded the Protestant Army, being compos'd of seventy or eighty thousand Foot, and ten thousand Horse, and an hundred Canon, thought it unjust to begin the War till they had sent the Emperor a Defie: Stiling him yet therein not by that name; but as a pretender to be Emperor. He on the other side, little regarding the Language, endeavour'd one while to overthrow, and another while to divide them. The whole passage whereof may be seen in Luys d'Avila, to whom I refer the Reader. And the rather, that his Excellence Prince Maurice de Nassau, did recommend the Book to me, more than once, as a Master-piece in its kind.

While these Armies coast each other, the Legates in Trent (now free from the Soldatesque) advis'd how to delay the time, admitting new matters, which also their intemperate disputes did furnish. The Cardinal Santa Croce projecting also, that the former Controversies should be renew'd of Preparatory Works, Observance of the Law, &c. Whereupon the point of Free-will was brought into question, and certain Opinions of the Reformers, therein odiously propos'd. From whence arose a question, whether believing and not believing were in our power? And many things were said thereupon, (it seeming at last equally absurd to believe all things to be in our Power, and nothing.) These Points again begot distinctions, and at last brought in the Article of Predestination, which with the Consequences was so heard, as being disput'd by the Prelates and Divines in a hundred Congregations, and afterward reduc'd into a form of Decree by the Cardinal Santa Croce: Yet he had so much adoe to content all sides, that from the beginning of September, to the end of November, each day some words therein were alter'd; yet so, as at length it past, and was sent to the Pope, who remitted it to the Learned Men at Rome, by whom it was approv'd, as being conceiv'd in such terms, that all parts might fit and apply it to their own Opinions. In the point of Reformation, the qualities requir'd for the Promotion of Prelates was handled, and many good things said, but the means how to observe them were as little found, as how to bind their Superiours

Much was said also, concerning Matters of Residency: The particulars whereof produc'd that Controversie, as in the year 1562, and 1563. came to a great height. The present Contention was between the Spanish Prelates; who for the magnifying of the Episcopal Dignity, held that Residence was Ex jure Divino; and the Italian Bishops, who for sustaining the Popes Authority, said, it was commanded by him only, and therefore might be dispens'd with, &c. But this dispute being put off by the Legates, the Ancient Canons for Residency were reviv'd, and some new ones enacted, which were the more willingly accepted, in that the abuse of Exemptions of Regular and Secular Priests from the Jurisdiction of their Ordinary, was moderated.

- Septemb. The Emperor now having heard that our King treated with the Protestants, expostulated the matter with him. But the King deny'd, he intended any Aid to the Protestants; saying yet, that if he sought friendship abroad he was not to be blam'd, since the Emperor in his new Treaty with the Bishop of Rome, had agreed to fall on those that refus'd the Bishops Authority, and the Council of Trent; wherein, though the King were not particularly nam'd, yet that he was taken for a Lutheran. Nevertheless, that he treated not with the Protestants, and therefore wish'd the Emperor to have a better opinion of him, since if he would have given credit to his Advice, he need not to have entred those dangers he was in. And now the Pope hearing how things pass'd, commanded the Cardinal Farnese to return. For though the Emperor by secret fomenting the emulation for Command which pass'd between the Duke of Saxe and Landgrave, was in a good way to compass his ends; yet because he made not an overt War of Religion, the Pope both recall'd the Cardinal, and permitted some of the Italian Gentry to come with him. Nevertheless, about the midst of

Where also the Protestants omitted a notable Opportunity of falling on the Imperialists; some blows yet pass'd, and Donawert was regain'd by Ottavio Farnese: Shortly after which, the Duke of Saxe was constrain'd to retire to his own Country, for the defence thereof, against

Of which our King was particularly advertis'd by Somerset his Herald, who accompanying Bruno, (now returning from England to the Protestant Army) observ'd all Occurrences. The Protestant Forces now being withdrawn, divers Princes and Cities of that League treated of an Accommodation with the Emperor when they might have some honest caution for the exercising of their Religion. But the Emperor would give none by writing, though otherwise promise was made by the Imperial Ministers, that they should not be molested. And thus the Emperor recover'd much great Ordinance, and huge sums of Money from some Cities by way of Reparation for their faults, and rest'd absolute Sovereign of the upper and greater part of Germany; whereby he was enabled to give Law to the rest, and to constrain Herman Archbishop of Cologne (which had lately appeal'd from the Pope to a lawful Council in Germany) to surrender his Archbishoprick. Which state of things being advertis'd hither, our King thought fit to comply with the Emperor, for this purpose also acquainting him with some Passages, which might give him just occasion to be jealous of Francis. For though (by the advice of the Cardinal of Tournon) to make his Authority at home more entire, he had lately condemn'd to the fire certain Citizens of Meaux, who combin'd for a private Reformation in Religion, yet he treated with the Protestants at this time.
- 1546.
- The Pope also hearing of that which pass'd, began to think of his own Affairs, before all Germany were reduc'd to the Emperors Obedience: Infomuch, that though his Forces were much diminish'd, (between those that return'd with the Cardinal, and others that run away) he yet recall'd the rest about the middle of December, upon pretence that they had stay'd the six Months which he had promis'd; alledging for further excuse, that he was not able to sustain the Charge. But this being ill taken by the Emperor, since the heads of the Rebellion (as he term'd them) were not yet taken in; the Pope for his further Justification, reply'd, that he was not made partaker of the Accord betwixt the Emperor and the Cities and Princes: And that it was much to the prejudice of the Catholick Faith, in tolerating Heresie, which might have been exterminated. Besides, that according to the Articles of their Treaty, he should have participated of the Profits and Spoils of the War. And not content herewith, he deny'd the Emperor the further Revenues of the Spanish Clergy. So that though the Imperial Ministers at Rome told him, he had done nothing unless he perfect'd his Work, they could not prevail. For further testimony also of his displeasure to the Emperor, raising a Faction in Genoia against the Dei, being the Emperors friends.
- The Pope and Emperor dis-
fer.
- Neither did he (as some have it) fear, that the Emperor (having so much to do in Germany) could hastily invade him, or trouble him, otherwise than by according with the Protestants, and causing them to repair to the Council of Trent, which yet he thought not fit to dissolve, though seven Months had pass'd, without publishing any thing treated therein. So that, notwithstanding he knew that the Emperor would be discontented at his rigid proceedings in matters of Doctrine, he us'd the Florentine Motto, Cosa fatta capo ha: And thereupon writ to the Legates, that they should hold a Session, and publish the Decrees already made; which also was done, the Protestants yet questioning the Authority of them. Among the Cities of Germany that submitted, Ulme was one; where also the Emperor winter'd, with intention to continue War the next Spring; which the Protestants understanding, thought fit (though once suing for Peace) to send severai Ambassadors into England and France to demand Succours (though in vain) both Kings dying shortly after.
- While business of Religion was thus treated of July 8. abroad, our King by Proclamation did severely forbid the Translation of the New Testament, by Tindal and Coverdale, or any other than is permitted by Parliament: As also the English Book of Fritb, Wickliff, Tindal, &c. which our King most studiously suppress'd; both because he would have his Subjects decline the bitter Language and Doctrine to be found in some of them, and that he would introduce his own, or at least a more sober Reformation. Whereof also he was the more sensible, in that Women began now ordinarily to dispute Controversies, and urge the Text: Infomuch, that Anne Askew, a Gentlewoman, defended her self therewith against her Persecutors; though not so, but that she was burnt for it. Besides, the Queen her self did this year run no little danger: For as she began about this time to give ear unto those who declaim'd against the abuses of the Roman Church, she thought 1546. thought her self so well instructed in Religion, that she would debate with the King thereof: Which yet the King did but impatiently hear; both as the anguish of a sore Leg he had at this time made him very froward, and as he lov'd not to be contradicted in his Opinions, especially, as he said, in his old Age, and by his Wife. This again was exaggerated by Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester so far, that by representing the hazard she incurr'd by contravening the Six Articles, and the late Proclamation, in reading of forbidden Books, and teaching openly her Doctrine, the King gave Winchester, and Wriothesley the Chancellor, and others leave to consult about the drawing of Articles against her, which they fail'd not to present unto the King, who subscrib'd them: Infomuch, that her Enemies expected only a Warrant for carrying her by night to the Tower. Which the Queen accidentally having notice of, fell into that passion and bitter bewailing her Misfortune, that the King hearing the perplexity she was in, sent his Physicians, and after came himself to her Chamber, where compassionating her estate, he us'd such kind words as did help to recover her. Infomuch, that the next night, being attended by the Lady Anne her Sister, Wife to Sir William Herbert, after Earl of Pembroke, she went unto the Kings Bed-chamber, where he courteously welcomed her, and began to talk of Religion.

But she wittily excusing her self by the weakness of her Sex and Judgment, said, she would refer her self in this and all other Causes, to his Majesties Wisdom. Not so (by Saint Mary) quoth the King, you are become a Doctor, Kate, to instruct us (as we take it) and not to be instructed or directed by us. But the Queen replying, that what she said was rather to pass away the time and pain of his Infirmitie, than to hold Argument; and that she hop'd by hearing his Majesties learned Discourse, to receive some profit thereby. The King answer'd, And is it even so (Sweet-heart?) then are we perfect friends again: Which also he confirm'd by divers Testimonies. But as her Maligners knew nothing of this Reconcilement, they prepar'd the next day to carry her to the Tower, at a time limited by the Kings Warrant. This being come, and she happening to be merrily talking with him in his Garden, the Lord Wriothesley with forty of the Guard comes in; whom the King sternly be- holding, and after calling to him (at some distance from the Queen) so expostulated the matter, as at last he reviled, and commanded him out of his sight and presence. Nevertheless, at the Kings return, she was an humble suiter for his Pardon. But the King answer'd no otherwise, than that she (poor Soul) did not know how evil he deserv'd this grace at her hands. And thus, by her opportune submission she escap'd: Though yet some believe, it was not so much the Kings intention herein to use the rigour of the Law, as to deter her from reading forbidden Books. Howsoever, if he were not in earnest, it was thought a terrible jest, especially to a Queen, that had the reputation of a vertuous, humble, and observant Wife. But Winchester, who (it was thought) chiefly endeavoured her ruine, did himself not long after fall into the Kings disfavour, as by his submission extant in our Records doth appear: Though whether on this occasion, or that he was a special friend to the Duke of Norfolk, who was now also in disgrace with the King (as shall be told hereafter,) or any other cause, is not there determined. Howsoever, the King excluded him out of the number of those whom he appointed his Executors, and Counsellors to his Son and Successor, Edward VI.

Concerning Scottish Business this year, little pass'd worth the writing, that I can find, save only that King Henry sent the Earl of Lenox into Ireland with Command, that he together with the Earl of Ormond, and a certain Lord out of the Scottish Isles (as he term'd himself) who had adhered to our King, should fall upon Scotland: But as the Enterprize was discover'd, they were forc'd to retire to Dublin, where the said Scottish Lord, who brought three Gallies with him for this Enterprize, died.

This while Cardinal Beton persecuting those of the reform'd Religion in that Country, was himself slain at St. Andrews in his Castle, by certain Gentlemen who surpriz'd the place; and after defended it, until the Governour besieg'd, and (at last) took it by the help of some Succour which the French sent them in their Gallies. That kind of Shipping being so built in those days, that they brook'd our Seas with no little advantage, when the times were fair.

I shall conclude this year with the disaster of the renown'd Lord the Duke of Norfolk, and the execution of his Son Henry the Earl of Surrey, which pass'd in this manner, as our Records tell us.

The Dutches Elizabeth, Daughter to Edward Stafford Duke of Buckingham, having for many years entertain'd so violent jealousies of the Duke her Husbands matrimonial Affection and Loyalty, as it broke out at last to open Rancour, divers occasions of Scandal were given: Infomuch, that not being content with having surmiz'd a long while since two Articles against him, she again in sundry Letters to the Lord Privy Seal, both averr'd the Articles, and manifestly accus'd some of his Minions, repeated divers hard usages she pretended to receive from them, and briefly discover'd all the ordinary passions of her offended Sex. This again being urg'd in a time when the King was in his declining Age, and for the rest, disquieted with scruples, that the Dukes Greatness or Interests in sequent times might interrupt the order he intended to give, was not unwillingly heard. So that notwithstanding his many important and faithful Services, both in War and Peace, at Home and Abroad, he and his Son Henry Earl of Surrey were expos'd to the malignity and detraction of their Accusers. This again fell out in an unfortunate time: For besides that the Lady his Dutches had now for above four years been separated from him; his Son the Earl of Surrey was but newly, and perchance, scarce reconcil'd with him; his Daughter Mary Dutches of Richmond not only inclined to the Protestant Party, (which lov'd not the Duke) but grown an extream enemy of her Brother: So that there was not only a kind of intestine division in his Family, but this again many secret ways fomented.

Among which, the industry of one Mrs. Holland, thought to be the Duke's Favourite, appear'd not a little, as desirous (at what price soever) to conserve her self. Besides, divers at the Kings Council disaffected him, and particularly the Earl of Holland, as knowing that after the Kings death (now thought to be imminent) none was so capable to oppose him in the place he aspir'd to of Protector. All which Circumstances concurring, and being voyced abroad, incouraged divers of his Adversaries to declare themselves: And the rather, because it was notorious, how the King had not only withdrawn much of his wonted favour, but promised impunity to such as could discover any thing concerning him.

The first that manifested himself was Sir Richard Southwel, who said that he knew certain things of the Earl, that touch'd his fidelity to the King: The Earl, before the Lord Chancellor Wriothesley, 1546. Wriothesley, the Lord St. John, the Earl of Hertford, and others, vehemently affirmed himself a true Man, desiring to be try'd by Justice, or else offering himself to fight in his Shirt with Southwell: But the Lords for the present only committed them. The Duke this while, hearing his Son was in trouble, sends to divers of his Friends to know the Cause, and particularly to the Bishop of Winchester: Those Letters yet (it is probable) fell into the King's Council's hands; but could not preserve him from being involved in his Son's Fortune: So that he was sent for, and the same day, not long after his Son, committed to the Tower. Divers Persons also were examined concerning his Affairs. Mrs. Elizabeth Holland being disposed, confess'd, that the Duke had told her, that none of the King's Council loved him, because they were no Noblemen born themselves; as also because he believ'd too truly in the Sacrament of the Altar. Moreover, that the King loved him not, because he was too much lov'd in his Country; but that he would follow his Father's Lesson, which was, That the less others set by him, the more he would set by himself. As also, that the Duke complain'd that he was not of the most secret (or, as it is there term'd, the Privy privy) Council. And that the King was much grown of his Body, and that he could not go up and down the Stairs, but was let up and down by a Device. And that his Majesty was sickly, and could not long endure; and the Realm like to be in an ill case through diversity of Opinions. And that if he were a young Man, and the Realm in quiet, he would ask leave to see the Vernacle; which he said, was the Picture of Christ given to Women by himself as he went to death. As touching his Arms, that she had not heard the Duke speak of his own, but of his Son's, that he liked them not, and that he had gather'd them himself knew not from whence; and that he placed the Norfolk's Arms wrong, and had found fault with him: And therefore that she should take no pattern of his Son's Arms to work them with her Needle in his House, but as he gave them. Furthermore, she confess'd that the Earl of Surrey lov'd her not, nor the Dutches of Richmond him; and that she addicted her self much to the said Dutches.

Mary Dutches of Richmond being examin'd, confess'd, That the Duke her Father wou'd have had her marry Sir Thomas Seymour, Brother to the Earl of Hertford, which her Brother also desir'd, wishing her withal to endear her self so into the King's Favour, as she might the better rule here as others had done; and that she refused: And that her Father would have had the Earl of Surrey to have matched with the Earl of Hertford's Daughter, which her Brother likewise heard of (and that this was the Cause of his Father's Displeasure) as taking Hertford to be his Enemy. And that her Brother was so much incens'd against the said Earl, as the Duke his Father said thereupon, His Son would lose as much as he had gather'd together.

Moreover, That the Earl her Brother should say, These new Men loved no Nobility; and if God call'd away the King, they should smart for it. And that her Brother hated them all since his being in Custody in Windsor Castle; but that her Father seem'd not to care for their ill will, saying, His Truth should bear him out. Concerning Arms, she said, that she thought that her Brother had more than seven Rolls; and that some, that he had added more of Anjou, and of Lancelott Du-lac. And that her Father since the Attainder of the Duke of Buckingham (who bare the King's Arms) where the Arms of her Mother (Daughter to the said Duke, were rayn-

ed in his Coat, had put a Blank-quarter in the place, but that her Brother had reassum'd them. Also that instead of the Duke's Coronet, was put to his Arms a Cap of Maintenance Purple, with powdered Furr, and with a Crown, to her judgment, much like to a close Crown; and underneath the Arms was a Cipher, which she took to be the King's Cipher, HR. As also that her Father never said that the King hated him, but his Counsellors; but that her Brother said, the King was displeased with him (as he thought) for the loss of the great Journey. Which Displeasure, he conceiv'd, was set forward by them who hated him, for setting up an Altar in the Church at Boulogne. And that her Brother should say, God long save my Father's Life; for if he were dead, they would shortly have my Head. And that he reviled some of the present Council, not forgetting the old Cardinal. Also that he dissuaded her from going too far in reading the Scripture. Some passionate Words of her Brother she likewise repeated, as also some circumstantial Speeches, little for his advantage; yet so, as they seem'd much to clear her Father.

Sir Edmund Knewet being examined, said, he knew no Untruth directly by the Earl of Surrey, but suspected him of Dissimulation and Vanity: And that a Servant of his had been in Italy with Cardinal Poole, and was receiv'd again at his return. Moreover, that he kept one Pasquil an Italian as a Jester, but more likely a Spy, and so reputed. He mentioned also one Peregrine an Italian entertain'd by the said Earl; adding that he lov'd to converse with Strangers, and to conform his Behaviour to them. And that he thought he had therein some great ill device.

One Thomas Pope also informed the Council, that John Freeman told him, that the Duke (at Nottingham, in the time of the Commotion of the North) should say in the presence of an hundred Persons, that the Act of Uses was the worst Act that ever was made, and that Freeman affirm'd those Words before the Lord Audeley, late Lord Chancellor. These Depositions, together with others (as it seems) being brought to the King's Judges at Norwich, they signified by their Letter unto the Lords of the Council, dated Jan. 7. that the King's Solicitor and Mr. Stamford had brought the Indictments, and that they were found true, and the Duke and his Son indicted thereupon of High-Treason; and that they made haste to bring the said Indictment to London; desiring further to know whether Sir Thomas Paston, Sir Edmund Knewet, Sir John Peer, and others, should be of the same Jury. Upon the thirteenth (the King being now dangerously sick) the Earl of Surrey was arraign'd in Guild-Hall in London, before the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Mayor, and other of Surrey's Commissioners. Where the Earl, as he was of try'd a deep Understanding, sharp Wit, and deep Courage, defended himself many ways: Sometimes denying their Accusations as false, and together weakning the Credit of his Adversaries; sometimes interpreting the Words he said, in a far other Sense than that in which they were represented. For the point of bearing his Arms (a good defence among which those of Edmund the Confessor are related) alledging that he had the Opinion of Heralds therein. And finally, when a Witness was brought against him viva voce, who pretended to repeat some high Words of the Earl's by way of discourse, which concern'd him nearly, and that thereupon the said Witness should return a braving Answer; the Earl reply'd no otherwise to the Jury, than that he left it to them to judge, whether it were probable that this Man should speak thus to the Earl of Surrey, and he not strike him 1546. him again. In conclusion, he pleaded not guilty; but the Jury (which was a common Inquest, not of the Peers, because the Earl was not a Parliament Lord) condemn'd him. Whereupon also Judgment of Death was given, and he beheaded at Tower-hill. And thus ended the Earl; a Man learned, and of an excellent Wit, as his Compositions shew.

This While the King (though his Sicknes increased) omitted not to give order to seize on the Duke's Goods, and together to inform himself of all which might be material against him. Not forgetting also to cause Wriothesley to advertise the King's Ambassadors in foreign Parts, that the Duke of Norfolk and his Son had conspir'd to take upon them the Government of the King, during his Majesty's Life, as also after his Death to get into their hands the Lord Prince; but that their Devices were revealed, and they committed to the Tower. And that for preventing uncertain bruits, they were willing to communicate the premisses. But the Duke, who had now as much merit of ancient Service to plead for him, as any Subject of his time could pretend to, thought fit from the Tower to write unto the King in this manner.

His Letter to the King
 Most Gracious and most Sovereign Lord, I your most humble Subject prostitute at your foot, do most humbly beseech your Highness to be my good and gracious Lord. I am sure some great Enemy of mine hath informed your Majesty of some untrue matter against me. Sir, God doth know, in all my life, I never thought one untrue Thought against you, or your Succession, nor can no more judge or cast in my mind what should be laid to my charge, than the Child that was born this night. And certainly, if I knew that I had offended your Majesty in any point of Untruth, I would declare the same to your Highness. But (as God help me) I cannot accuse my self so much as in Thought. Most noble and merciful Sovereign Lord, For all the old Service I have done you in my life, be so good and gracious a Lord unto me, that either my Accusers and I together may be brought before your Royal Majesty; or if your pleasure shall not be to take that pains, then before your Council: Then if I shall not make it apparent that I am wrongfully accus'd, let me, without more respite, have punishment according to my deserts: Alas! most merciful Prince, I have no refuge but only at your hands, and therefore at the reverence of Christ's Passion have pity of me, and let me not be cast away by false Enemies Informations. Undoubtedly, I know not that I have offended any Man, or that any Man was offended with me, unless it were such as are angry with me for being quick against such as have been accused for Sacramentaries. And as for all causes of Religion, I say now, and have said to your Majesty and many others, I do know you to be a Prince of such Virtue and Knowledge, that whatsoever Laws you have in times past made, or hereafter shall make, I shall to the extremity of my power stick unto them as long as my life shall last. So that if any Men be angry with me for these Causes, they do me wrong. Other Cause I know not why any Man should bear me any ill will: And for this cause I know divers have done, as doth appear by casting Libels abroad against me. Finally, (most gracious Sovereign Lord) I most humbly beseech your Majesty to have pity of me, and let me recover your gracious Favour, with taking of me all the Lands and Goods I have, or as much thereof as pleaseth your Highness to take, leaving me what it shall please you to appoint; and that according as is before written, I may know what is laid to my Charge, and that I may bear some comfortable word from your Majesty. And I shall during my life pray for your prosperous estate long to endure.

Your most sorrowful Subject,

THO. NORFOLK.

To the Lords he wrote thus:

Item, Most humbly to beseech, my Lords, That I might have some of the Books that are at Lambeth; for unless I may have Books to read e'er I fall on sleep, and after I wake again, I cannot sleep, nor did not this dozen Years.

Also to desire that I might have a Ghostly Father sent to me, and that I might receive my Maker.

Also that I might have Mass, and to be bound upon my life to speak no word to him that shall say Mass, which he may do in the other Chamber, and I to remain within.

Item, To have licence in the day time, to walk in the Chamber without, and in the Night to be lock'd in, as I am now. At my first coming I had a Chamber without a-days. I would gladly have licence to send to London, to buy one Book of St. Augustin's, De Civitate Dei; and of Josephus, De Antiquitatibus; and another of Sabellicus; who doth declare most of any Book that I have read, how the Bishop of Rome from time to time hath usurp'd his Power against all Princes, by their unwise sufferance.

Item, For Sheets.

Nevertheless, the Duke remained as condemn'd to perpetual Prison, without that his great Services formerly render'd, or his Submission on this occasion could restore him; which was in these Words, as I find by our Records in an Original.

THOMAS Duke of Norfolk, do confess and acknowledge my self most untruly, and contrary to my Oath and Allegiance, to have offended the King's most Excellent Majesty, in the disclosing and opening of his privy and secret Counsel at divers and sundry times, to divers and sundry Persons, to the great peril of his Highness, and disappointing of his most prudent and regal Affairs.

T. N.

Also, I likewise confess, That I have concealed High Treason, in keeping secret the false and traitorous Act, most presumptuously committed by my Son Henry Howard Earl of Surrey, against the King's Majesty and his Laws, in the putting and using the Arms of St. Edward the Confessor, King of the Realm of England before the Conquest, in his Scutcheon or Arms: Which said Arms of St. Edward appertain only to the King of this Realm, and to none other Person or Persons; whereunto the said Earl by no means or way could make any Claim or Title, by me, or any of mine or his Ancestors.

T. N.

Also, I likewise confess, That to the Peril, Slander, and Disinheriton of the King's Majesty, and his noble Son Prince Edward, his Son and Heir apparent, I have against all right, unjustly, and without Authority, born in the first Quarter of my Arms, ever since the Death of my Father, the Arms of England, with a difference of the Labels of Silver, which are the proper Arms of my said Prince, to be born for this Realm of England only; whereby I have not only done prejudice to the King's Majesty, and the said Lord the Prince, but also given occasion that his 1546. Highness might be disturb'd or interrupted of the Crown of this Realm, and my said Lord Prince might be destroy'd, disturb'd and interrupted in Fame, Body, and Title, of the Inheritance to the Crown of this Realm. Which I know and confess by the Laws of the Realm to be High Treason.

High-

T. N.

For the which my said hainous Offences, I have worthily deserv'd by the Laws of the Realm to be attainted of High Treason, and to suffer the Punishment, Losses and Forfeitures that appertain thereunto. And although I be not worthy to have or enjoy any part of the King's Majesty's Clemency and Mercy to be extended to me, considering the great and manifold Benefits that I and mine have received of his Highness: Yet I most humbly, and with a most sorrowful and repentant Heart, do beseech his Highness to have Mercy, Pity, and Compassion on me. And I shall most devoutly and heartily make my daily Prayer to God for the preservation of his most noble Succession, as long as Life and Breath shall continue in me.

T. N.

Written the twelfth day of the Month of January, in the Year of our Lord God 1546. after the Computation of the Church of England, and in the thirty eighth Year of our Sovereign Lord Henry VIII. by the Grace of God King of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith; and of the Church of England, and also of Ireland the Supream Head. In witness of all the premisses, I the said Duke have subscribed my Name with my own hand, in the presence of the Lord Wriothesley Lord Chancellor, the Lord St. John Lord President of the Council, the Earl of Hertford Lord Great Chamberlain, the Viscount Lisle Lord High Admiral, Sir Anthony Brown Master of the Horse, Sir William Paget Secretary, Sir Richard Rich, Sir John Baker of our said Sovereign Lord's Privy Council, Sir Richard Lister, Sir Edward Montague, the two Chief Justices.

Without Compulsion, without Force, without Advice or Counsel, I have and do subscribe the premisses, submitting me only to the King's most gracious Pity and Mercy, most humbly beseeching his Highness to extend the same unto me his most sorrowful Subject.

his Punishment.

Notwithstanding all which Submission, joined with the Merits of his Services, it was thought that the Duke would hardly escape, had not the King's Death, following shortly after, reserved him to more merciful times. For our King having long labour'd under the burden of an extreme fat and unweildy Body, and together being afflicted with a fore Leg, took (at the Palace of Westminster, in January, this Year) his Death-bed; being for the rest not without sense of his present condition. For he both caused a Church of the Franciscans in London (lately suppress'd) to be open'd again, and made a Parish-Church, endowing it with 500 Marks per annum; and bestow'd both the Ground and Buildings of the said Covent, as also the adjoining Hospital of St. Bartholomew, on the City, for the relief of the Poor: Where now is the fair Hospital called Christ-Church: He suppress'd the Stews on the Bank-side, and made his last Will and Testament, the Original whereof yet having not seen, I shall mention no other wife.

As for Sanders's affirmation, that he was not desirous to be reconciled to the Roman Church; and that his Courtiers (especially those who had profited themselves of Abbies) did divert him; and that the Bishops rested doubtful what to answer, lest they should be entrapped; and how Winchester did cunningly evade the Danger, I leave to his Credit. Others affirming, that he desir'd to speak with Cranmer, who yet not coming sooner than that the King was speechless (though in good memory) the King extended his hand to him; and that thereupon Cranmer besought him to give some Sign of his trust in God by Christ, and that the King should strain his Hand. However, it may be collected, that he died religiously and penitently, when he had reign'd seven and thirty Years, nine Months and six Days; and after he had lived five and fifty Years and seven Months; and was carried to Windsor, where he had began a fair Monument, and founded a College for thirteen poor Knights, and two Priests to pray for his Soul.

And now if the Reader (according to my manner in other great Personages) do expect some Character of this Prince, I must affirm (as in the beginning) that the course of his Life being commonly held various and diverse from it self, he will hardly suffer any, and that his History will be his best Character and Description. However, since others have so much defam'd him, as will appear by the following Objections, I shall strive to rectifie their Understandings who are impartial Lovers of Truth; without either presuming audaciously to condemn a Prince, heretofore Sovereign of our Kingdom, or omitting the just freedom of an Historian.

And because his most bitter Censurers agree, that he had all manner of Perfection either of Nature or Education; and that he was (besides) of a most deep Judgment in all Affairs to which he apply'd himself; a Prince not only liberal and indulgent to his Family, and Court, but even to Strangers, whom he willingly saw; and one that made choice both of able and good Men for the Clergy, and of wise and grave Counsellors for his State-Affairs; and above all, a Prince of a Royal Courage: I shall not controvert these Points, but come to my particular Observations. According to which, I find him to have been ever most zealous of his Honour and Dignity; in so much, that his most question'd Passages were countenanc'd either with home or foreign Authority: So many Universities of Italy and France maintaining his repudiating of Queen Katharine of Spain; and his Parliament (for the rest) authorizing the Divorces and Decapitations of his following Wives, the Dissolutions of the Monasteries, and divers others of his most branded Actions: So that by his Parliaments in publick, and 1547. and Juries in private Affairs, he at least wanted not Colour and Pretext to make them specious to the World; which also he had reason to affect: Outward Esteem and Reputation being the same to great Persons which the Skin is to the Fruit, which though it be but a slight and delicate Cover, yet without it the Fruit will presently discolour and rot.

As for matter of State, I dare say, never Prince went upon a truer Maxim for this Kingdom; which was, to make himself Arbiter of Christendom: And had it not cost him so much, none had ever proceeded more wisely. But as he would be an Actor (for the most part) where he needed only be a Spectator, he both engaged himself beyond what was requisite, and by calling in the Money he lent his Confederates and Allies, did often disoblige them when he had most need of their Friendship. Yet thus he was the most Active Prince of his time. The Examples whereof are so frequent in this History, that there was no Treaty, or almost Conventicle in Christendom, wherein he had not his particular Agent and Interest; which, together with his Intelligence in all Countries, and concerning all Affairs, and the Pensions given for that purpose, was one of his vast ways for spending of Money.

Again, I observe, that there never was Prince more delighted in Interviews, or (generally) came off better from them. To which also, as his goodly Personage and excellent Qualities did much dispose him, so they gave him a particular Advantage and Lustre. Howbeit, as these Voyages were extreme costly, so when he made use thereof to conclude a Treaty, it did not always succeed; especially where Credit was yielded to any single and private Word. Infomuch, that at his last being with Francis (where he intended, upon his bare Promise, lier la partie for the most important Affairs of Christendom) he found himself so much frustrated and deceiv'd.

At home it was his manner to treat much with his Parliaments; where, if gentle means serv'd not, he came to some degrees of the rough; though the more sparingly, in that he knew his People did but too much fear him. Besides, he understood well, that foul ways are not always passable, nor to be used (especially in suspected and dangerous times) but where others fail. However, it may be noted, That none of his Predecessors understood the temper of Parliaments better than himself, or that prevail'd himself more dexterously of them. Therefore, without being much troubled at the tumultuous beginnings of the rasher sort, he would give them that leave, which all new things must have, to settle. Which being done, his next care was to discover and prevent those privy Combinations that were not for his service. After which, coming to the point of Contribution, he generally took strict order (by his Commissioners) that Gentlemen in the Country should not spare each other; but that the true or (at least) near approaching value of every Mans Goods and Lands should be certified. And this he did the rather, because he knew the Custom of his People was to reckon with him about their Subsidies, and indeed, rather to number, than to weigh their Gifts.

His Faults As for his Faults, I find that of opinionate and wilful much objected: Infomuch, that the Impressions privately given him by any Court-whisperer, were hardly or never to be effaced. And herein the Persons near him had a singular Ability; while beginning with the Commendations of those they would disgrace, their manner was to insinuate such Exceptions, as they would commend a Man more in few Words, than commend him in many: Doing therein like cunning Wrestlers, who to throw one down, first take him up. Besides, this Wilfulness had a most dangerous quality annexed to it (especially towards his latter end) being an intense Jealousy almost of all Persons and Affairs, which dispos'd him easily to think the worst. Whereas it is a greater part of Wisdom to prevent, than to suspect. These Conditions again being armed with Power, produc'd such terrible effects, as stiled him both at home and abroad by the Name of Cruel; which also hardly can be avoided; especially, if that Attribute be due, not only to those Princes who inflict capital Punishments frequently, and for small Crimes, but to those who pardon not all that are capable of Mercy. And for testimonies in this kind, some urge two Queens, one Cardinal (in procinctu, at least) or two (for Poole was condemn'd, though absent) Dukes, Marquisses, Earls, and Earls Sons, twelve; Barons and Knights eighteen; Abbats, Priors, Monks and Priests seventy seven; of the more common sort, between one Religion and another, huge Multitudes. He gave some Proofs yet that he could forgive; tho' as they were few and late, they serv'd not to recover him the Name of a Clement Prince. As for Covetousness, or Rapine, another main Fault observ'd by Sanders, as extending not only to a promiscuous overthrow of Religious Houses, but a notable derogation of Title of Supream Head of the Church in his Dominions (and the rather, that he still retained the substance of the Roman Catholick Religion) nothing, that I know, can on those terms palliate it, unless it might be collected, that the Religious Orders in his Kingdom would have assisted those who threaten'd Invasion from abroad, and that he had no other extraordinary means than their Revenues then left to defend himself. For certainly, the publick pretext, taken from their excessive numbers in proportion to a well compos'd State, or the inordinate and vicious life of the general sort, cannot sufficiently excuse him; since, together with the supernumerary and debauch'd Abbeyes, Priories and Nunneries, he subverted and extinguish'd the good and opportune; without leaving any Receptacle for such as through Age or Infirmary being unapt for secular business, would end their days in a devout and a retir'd life. Nevertheless, as he erected divers new Bishopricks, increased the number of Colleges, and the Stipend of Readers in the Universities, and did many other pious Works, it is probable he intended some Reparation. Though (as the Roman Catholick Party conceives it) they were neither satisfactory for, nor equivalent to the Desolations and Ruines he procur'd, when yet he should pretend that the Revenues and Number of the Gentry and Soldatesque of the Kingdom were augmented thereby. Howbeit, as in this Act of overthrowing Monasteries, his Parliaments were deeply engag'd, it will be dangerous to question the Authority thereof, since things done by Publick Vote, where they find not Reason, make it; neither have many Laws other ground than the Constitution of the Times; which yet afterwards changing, leave their Interpretation doubtful: Infomuch, that Posterity might justly abrogate them when the Causes thereof ceas'd, had they the Power to do it. For which regard also I shall not interpose my Opinion otherwise, than that this King had met with no occasion to do that which hath caused so much Scandal to him and his Parliaments.

But whereas Sanders hath remarked Covetousness as a great Vice in this King, I could wish it had been with more limitation, and so as he noted the other extreme (being Prodigality) for the 1547. the greater fault: The examples of both being so pregnant in the Kings Father and himself. The first, by an exact inquiry into the corruptions and abuses of his Officers and Subjects, and the prevailing himself thereof to bring all into good order; and the getting of Money together, whether by ordinary or extraordinary means (only when they were not manifestly unjust) and lastly, by frugality, acquiring to himself the name of prudent at home, and puissant abroad; as being known to have in his Coffers always as much as would pay an Army Royal. Whereas this King, so often exhausting his Treasury, that he was constrain'd at last to have recourse to unusual and grievous ways for relieving his wants, did not only disaffect his Subjects in great part (as appear'd in the Rebellion of the Northern Men and others, though to their Confusion) but expos'd his Kingdom to the Invasion of his Neighbours: Who knowing (as all Princes do) to about how much their Neighbours Revenues amount, and that there remain'd no longer any ready way to improve them, did collect thence what forces he could furnish; and consequently, would have assail'd him at home, but that their mutual divisions did hinder them. Whereby it appears, that what in Henry VII. is call'd by some Covetousness, was a Royal Vertue: Whereas the excessive and needless expences of Henry VIII. drew after them those miserable Consequences which the World hath so much reproach'd. Howbeit, there may be occasion to doubt, whether the immense Treasure which Henry VII. left behind, were not (accidentally) the cause of those ills that follow'd: While the young Prince his Son, finding such a mass of Money, did first carelessly spend, and after strive to supply as he could.

As for the third Vice, wherewith he was justly charg'd, being Lust and Wantonness; there is little to answer, more than that it was rather a personal fault, than damageable to the Publick: Howbeit, they who reprove it, ought not only to examine Circumstances (which much aggravate or extenuate the fact) but even the complexions of Men. That Concupiscence which in some is a Vice, being in others a disease of Repletion, in others a necessity of Nature. It doth not yet appear that this fault did hasten the death of his Queens; he being noted more for practising of private Pleasures, than secret Mischiefs, so that if any undue Motive did cooperate herein, it may be thought an inordinate desire to have Posterity (especially Masculine) which might be the undoubted Heirs of him and the Kingdom, rather than any thing else.

With all his crimes yet, he was one of the most glorious Princes of his time: Infomuch, that not only the chief Potentates of Christendom did court him, but his Subjects in general did highly reverence him, as the many tryals he put them to, sufficiently testifie: Which yet expir'd so quickly, that it may be truly said, all his Pomp died with him; his Memory being now expos'd to that obloquy, as his Accusers will neither admit reason of State to cover any where, or necessity to excuse his Actions. For, as they were either discontented Clergy-men (for his relinquishing the Papal Authority, and overthrowing the Monasteries;) or offended Women (for divers severe examples against their Sex) that first oppos'd and cry'd him down, the clamour hath been the greater: So that although one William Thomas a Clerk to the Council to Edward the Sixth, and living about the latter times of Henry the Eighth's Reign, did in great part defend him in an Italian Book, printed Anno 1552, it hath not avail'd.

But what this Prince was, and whether, and how far forth excusable in point of State, Conscience, or Honour, a diligent observation of his Actions, together with a conjuncture of the times, will (I conceive) better declare to the judicious Reader, than any factious relation on what side whatsoever. To conclude; I wish I could leave him in his Grave.

(a) All Historians, with one Consent, state the Birth of this Prince to be on the Eve of St. Edward, (whence 'tis likely he had that Name given him) that is, October 12. except Nic. Sanders, who puts it at the Sixth of the Ides of October, which answers to the 10th of that Month; unwilling, perhaps, that this Prince should have so fortunate an Omen, as to be born on the Eve of that English Saint and King.

Three Days after, viz. the 15th Day of October, with very great Splendor and Solemnity, he was baptiz'd, those of the highest Nobility, the Bishops, Abbots, Dignify'd Clergy, and Chaplains, with abundance of Knights and Gentlemen, being summon'd to be present. The Prince was carry'd from his Lodgings to the Chapel by the Marchioness of Exeter, with a most illustrious Attendance. Pliny Anno 1537. Pliny writeth; Auspiciatus enecta matre nascuntur, sicut Scipio Africanus prior natus. These were called Cæsares, and afterwards Cæsares, as Pliny, cap. 9. Festus Pompeius, Solinus, and Titius Probus, Fest. lib. 3. affirm, Quia cæso matris utero in lucem prodif- Solin. ca. 4. sent.

In this Manner was Cæso Fabius born, whom Livy reporteth to have been thrice Consul, first with Lucius Amilius, next with Sp. Furius, and thirdly with T. Virginus. Thus also was Scipio born; who, by reason of his brave Achievements in Africk, was surnamed Scipio Africanus prior: But in that Pliny affirmeth, that he was the first who was called Cæsar, à cæso matris utero, he seemeth to have made a slip; for before him, and somewhat before the Wars with the Samnites, one Claudius was surnamed Cæsar, because he was in that Fashion brought into the World.

In ancient times these Births were esteemed sacred to Apollo, as Servius noteth out of these Words in Virgil:

Lib. 10. Inde Lycham ferit exectum cum matre perempta,
Et tibi Phæbe sacrum. —

And therefore Æsculapius, because he was ripped from his Mother's Womb, was feigned to be the Son of Apollo; as Servius upon another Place of Virgil hath observed. For this Cause also, in the ancient State of Rome, Things consecrated to Apollo were kept by the Family of the Cæsars. That Julius Cæsar was so born, it is an uncontrollable Report; but that he was the first of the Family of Cæsars, who was so either named or born, it is a thick misty Error, supported chiefly by some Men of excellent Judgment in their own Professions, but childishly unskilful in any thing besides. Pliny writeth, that his Father was surnamed Cæsar; who having born the Office of Prætor, determined his Life by sudden Death.

What would have been either the Fortunes or Endeavours of K. EDWARD, he never attained to Years of Proof. Assuredly both for the Time of his Age and Reign, he is rather to be admired than commended, whereby he raised an high Expectation for Times to ensue. In one point he was like the like-born Julius Cæsar: For as Cæsar in the midst of his greatest Actions wrote an exact and curious Commentary of all his notable Enterprizes by Arms, so this Edward during all the Time of his Reign, but most especially towards the End, kept a most judicious (b) Journal of all the most principal Passages of the Affairs of his Estate. These Memorials, written with King Edward's Hand, (which now shall be the Ground of this History) were imparted unto me by the Great Treasurer of English Antiquities, Sir Robert Cotton Kt. & Bar. who, as he hath been a most industrious both Collector and Conserver of choice Pieces in that Kind, so is he most ingenuously free to communicate the Use of them to others.

This young Prince was brought up among Nurses, until he arrived to the Age of six Years. When he had passed this weak and sappy Age, he was committed to Dr. Coxe, who after was his Almoner, (c) and Mr. John Cheeke, Men of mean Birth; (d) but so well esteemed for Virtue and Learning, by reason of the Place of their Employment, that they might well be said to be born of themselves. These having equal Authority for Instruction of the young Prince, and well agreeing, bare equal Stroke in divers Faculties; Dr. Coxe for Knowledge of Divinity, Philosophy, and Gravity of Manners; Mr. Cheeke for Eloquence in the Latin and Greek Tongues: But for other Sufficiencies (so far as it appears by the Books which he wrote) Pedantick enough. (e) Others also were appointed to acquaint him with the Use of the most respected Foreign Languages; all jointly endeavouring to infuse into him Knowledge and Virtue by some mixture of honest Delight.

Under these Teachers the Prince thrived so well, that in short time he spake the French Tongue perfectly. In the Latin Tongue he could declaim upon the suddain no less both readily and purely than many who were reputed amongst the most learned of these Times. He attained not only commendable Knowledge, but Speech in the Greek, Spanish and Italian Languages; having always great Judgment in measuring his Words by his Matter; his Speech being alike, both fluent and weighty, such as best becomed a Prince. As for natu-

(b) This Journal is now printed among the Collections, at the End of the Second Volume of the History of the Reformation, by the Bishop of Salisbury, taken from the Volume Nero, c. 10. in the Cotton Library. It commences from the Year 1537. the Year of his Birth, and so proceeds more largely from the Year of his Accession to the Crown, viz. 1547. unto the End of November, 1552.

(c) And Master also of his Requests.

(d) Sir Anthony Cook Kt. was also a great Guide of his Learning and Manners in these his early Years, and his chief Instructor. In saying, the two other were of mean Birth, the Historian wrongs one, if not both: For Cheeke's Family was ancient, and of good Wealth. This Cheeke was sprung from the Cheekes of the Isle of Wight; the Antiquity of which Family is trac'd as far backwards as King Richard the Second's Time, when a Cheeke married a Daughter of the Lord Mountague, as appears in the Heralds Books.

(e) Upon Cheeke's Books and Learning, as well as his Birth, he leaves a Blot; saying, he was Pedantick enough. He translated two Orations of St. Chrysostom into elegant Latin. He wrote The true Subject to the Rebel, in the Time of the Insurrection under this King. And there were Letters in Latin passed between Bishop Gardiner and him from Cambridge, concerning the right pronouncing of the Greek Tongue; which were afterwards publish'd; with some other Letters, printed occasionally: Which no Man can depart from the reading of, but with very high Opinion of his great Ingenuity and Gravity. He was a Man of great Reading; an excellent Platonist, Orator, and Philosopher; one of the first Restorers of good polite Learning in Cambridge. Dr. Tho. Wylson, Secretary of State to Queen Elizabeth, and his Contemporary at the University, and one that knew him well, call'd him, That rare Learned Man, and Singular Ornament of the Land.

Ann 1546. ral Philosophy, for Logick, Musick, Astronomy, and other Liberal Sciences, his Perfections were such, that the great Italian Philosopher Cardane, having tasted him by many Conferences, and finding him most strongly to encounter his new devised Paradoxes in Philosophy, seemed to be astonished between Admiration and Delight, and divulged his Abilities to be miraculous. (f) These his Acquirements by Industry were exceedingly both enriched and enlarged by many excellent Endowments of Nature: For in Disposition he was mild, gracious and pleasant, of an Heavenly Wit; in Body beautiful, but especially in his Eyes, which seemed to have a starry Liveliness and Lustre in them; generally he seemed to be as Cardane reported of him, A MIRACLE OF NATURE.

King Henry's Death.

When he was a few Months above nine Years of Age, great Preparation was made either for creating or for declaring him to be Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwal, and Count Palatine of Chester. (g) In the midst whereof King Henry his Father ended his Life of a Dropsy, accompanied with a spreading Scar of his Thigh. Hereupon Edward Earl of Hertford, and Sir Anthony Browne Kt. of the Order and Master of the Horse, were forthwith dispatched, by the Residue of the Council, to the young King, then lying at Hertford. (h) These came unto him, and the next Day brought him to Enfield, neither with Preparation nor Train any more than ordinary. Here they first declared unto him and to the Lady Elizabeth his Sister the Death of King Henry their Father: Upon which Tidings they both brake forth into such unforced and unfeigned Passions, as it plainly appeared, that good Nature did work in them beyond all other Respects. Never was Sorrow more sweetly set forth, their Faces seeming rather to beautify their Sorrow, than their Sorrow to cloud the Beauty of their Faces. Their young Years, their excellent Beauties, their lovely and lively Enterchange of Complaints, in such Sort graced their Grief, as the most Iron Eyes at that time present were drawn thereby into Society of their Tears.

King Edward comes to London.

The next Day following, being the last of January, the young King advanced towards London, the Earl of Hertford riding next before him, and Sir Anthony Browne behind. The same Day he was proclaimed King, and his Lodging was prepared within the Tower. He there was received by the Constable and Lieutenant on Horseback without the Gates, and upon the Bridge next the Ward-Gate by all the chief Lords of his Council. These attended him to his Chamber of Presence, and there swore Allegiance unto him.

Here he remained about three Weeks; and in the mean time the Council appointed unto him by his Father's Will daily fate, for ordering the Affairs of the Kingdom. Among these, the Earl of Hertford was elected, * and forthwith proclaimed Protector of the Realm, and Governor of the King's Person, until he should accomplish the Age of eighteen Years. To this Office he was deemed most fit, for that he was the King's Uncle by the Mother's Side, very near unto him in Blood, but yet of no Capacity to succeed; by reason whereof his natural Affection and Duty was less easy to be over-carried by Ambition. A few Days after, * the Lord Protector knighted the King within the Tower, and immediately the King stood up under his Cloth of State, took the Sword from the Lord Protector, and dubbed the Lord Mayor of London Knight. Hence * ensued divers other Advancements in Honour: For Sir Edward Seymer, Lord Protector and Earl of Hertford, was created Duke of Somerset; the Lord William Parre, Earl of Essex, was proclaimed Marquess of Northampton; Sir Thomas Seymer, the King's Uncle, was made Lord of Sudley and High Admiral of England; Sir Richard Rich was made Lord Rich; Sir William Willoughby Lord Willoughby of Parreham; and Sir Edmund Sheffield Lord Sheffield of Buterwike. And because high Titles of Honour were in that Time of the King's Minority sparingly granted, because Dignity then waited upon Desert, which caused it again to be waited on by Respect, every of these testified for others, that it was the Pleasure of the King's Father before his Death, that these Titles should thus be conferred.

During this time the Body of King Henry was with honourable Solemnities (i) conveyed from London to Sheene, * and thence to Windsor, where the Corps and Company lodged that Night.

(f) But this Philosophical Conference of the King with Cardan, was not now at the Beginning of his Reign, but some Years after, when he was fifteen Years of Age.

(g) L. Herbert writes, this Prince was made so but six Days after his Birth; at which Time there was a Creation of two other Earls, viz. Hertford and Southampton: But this indeed the Author took from this King's Journal, that mentions great Preparations for it about this Time.

(h) Hollingshead makes the Place of the King's present Residence to be at Hatfield: But our Author follows herein the King's Journal, wherein those two Noblemen are said to come to him to Hertford.

(i) Because these Honourable Solemnities are not in any of our Historians particularly set down, take this short Account of it, from a Volume in the Office of Arms.

The Chest wherein the Royal Corps was laid stood in the midst of the Privy Chamber, with Lights, and Divine Service said about him, with Masses, Obsequies, and continual Watch, made by the Chaplains and Gentlemen of the Privy Chamber, in their Order and Course, Night and Day, for five Days, till the Chapel was ready; where was a goodly Hearse, with eighty square Tapers, every Light containing two Foot in Length, in the whole 1800 Weight of Wax, [another Relation writeth about 2000 Weight,] garnished with Pensils, Escutcheons, Banners and Bannerols of Descents; and at the four Corners, Banners of Saints, beaten in fine Gold upon Damask; with a Majesty thereover of rich Cloth of Tissue, and Vallance of black Silk, and Fringe of black Silk and Gold; and the Barriers without the Hearse, and the Sides and Floor of the said Chapel, covered with black Cloth to the High Altar; and at the Sides and Ceiling of the said Chapel set with Banners and Standards of St. George and others. The 2d of February the Corps was removed, and brought into the Chapel, by the Lord Great Master and Officers of the Household, and there placed within the Hearse, under a Pall of rich Cloth of Tissue, garnished with Escutcheons, and a rich Cloth of Gold set with precious Stones thereon. It continued there twelve Days, with Masses

This Solemnity being finished, the King, on the 19th of February, 1547. rode in great State from the Tower to the Palace of Westminster; and the Day following was Crowned by the Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted with other Bishops, and all the chief Nobility of the Realm, about the 29th Year of the Empire of Charles V. and the 33d of the Reign of Francis I. of France, and in the 5th Year both of the Reign and Age of Mary Queen of Scotland.

King Edward's Coronation.

A general Pardon.

* The 6th of March.

King Edward's Virtues.

The same Day a general Pardon was granted to all Persons, as it hath been usual at Coronations: But by some envious Oppositions, or for some other Causes unknown, six only were excepted, the Duke of Norfolk, Cardinal Pole, Edward le Courtois, eldest Son to the Marquis of Exeter, Dr. Pates, Mr. Fortescue, and Mr. Throgmorton: But they overlived that Envy, and had their Pardons afterwards, in the first Year of the Reign of Queen Mary. A few Days after * the Earl of Southampton, Lord Chancellor of England, for being Oppositive, (as it was reported, and obstinately opposite to the rest of the Lords in Matters of Council) was removed both from his Office of being Chancellor, and from his Place and Authority in Council, (k) and the Great Seal was delivered to Sir William Pavlet, Lord St. John, who was Lord Great Master of the King's Household: But this Wound of Disgrace never left bleeding, until it was stopt by the Protector's Fall.

It is certain, that from the first Entrance of of this King to his Reign, never was King either more loving to others, or better beloved generally of all: The one whereof proceeded from the Goodness of his Disposition, the other from many Graces and Virtues illustrious in him; for, besides his excellent Beauty and Modesty befitting a Prince, besides his sweet Humanity, the very Life of mortal Condition, besides a natural Disposition to all Literature, whereto he seemed rather born than instructed, many noble and high Virtues sparkled in him, especially Clemency, Courage, Care, and Knowledge in Affairs of State.

To Clemency he was much enclined, especially in Matters of Blood, and most especially if it were for Religion; a Virtue so much the more esteemed, by how much it had been less used before; insomuch that albeit he was most earnestly affected to that Religion wherein he had been brought up: Yet none were executed in his time for other Religion, but only two blasphemous Hereticks, Joan Butcher and George a Dutchman.

And when Joan Butcher was to be burned, all the Council could not procure him to set his Hand to the Warrant: Wherefore they employed Thomas Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, to deal privately with him for his Subscription. But the King remained firm both in Reason and Resolution, affirming, That he would not drive her headlong to the Devil: But because Hereticks for the most part have a Strain of Madness, he thought it best to apply her with some Corporal Chastisements, which with Respite of Time might happily reduce her to good Order. The Archbishop was violent both by Perswasions and Entreaties; and when with meer Importunity he had prevailed, the King in subscribing his Name said, That he would lay all the Charge thereof upon the Archbishop before God. Not many Years passed, but this Archbishop also felt the Smart of the Fire: And, it may be, that by his Importunity for Blood he did offend; for a and Diriges sung and said every Day; Norroy each Day standing at the Choir Door, and beginning with these Words, pronounced aloud, Of your Charity, Pray for the Soul of the High and Mighty Prince, our late Sovereign Lord and King, HENRY VIII. February the 14th the Corps was removed, and lodged that Night at Syon, with the Mourners and Company; and the next Day arrived at Windsor: And the next Day, being February the 16th, the Corps was interred. Stephen Bishop of Winchester preached the Sermon, on that Text, Blessed are the Dead which die in the Lord: Where he declared the Frailty of Man, and the Community of Death, both to High and Low; and shewing the Loss that all had sustained by the Death of so Gracious a King: Yet comforting them again by the Resurrection in the Life to come. And exhorted them all to joyce and give Thanks to Almighty God for having sent so towardsly and virtuous a Prince to Reign after him; desiring all Men to continue in Obedience and Duty: With many other Exhortations, notably set forth, and with great Learning.

The Corps being let down by a Vice, with the Help of 16 tall Yeomen of the Guard, the same Bishop, standing at the Head of the Vault, proceeded in the Service of the Burial; and about the same stood all the Head Officers of the Household, as, the Lord Great Master, Lord Chamberlain, Lord Treasurer, Comptroller, Sergeant-Porter, and the Four Gentlemen-Ushers in Ordinary, with their Staves and Rods in their Hands; and when the Mold was brought and cast into the Grave by the Prelate executing, at the Words Pulvis Pulveris, Cinis Cineri, first the Lord Great Master, and after the Lord Chamberlain, and all the rest, brake their Staves in Shivers upon their Heads, and cast them after the Corps within the Pit, with exceeding Sorrow and Heaviness, not without grievous Sighs and Tears.

After this finished, and De Profundis said, and the Grave covered again with Planks, Garter stood in the midst of the Choir, accompanied with all them of his Office in their Coats of Arms, and with a loud Voice proclaimed, Almighty God, of his Infinite Goodness, give good Life and long to the most High and Mighty Prince, our Sovereign Lord, King EDWARD VI. by the Grace of GOD, King of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, and in Earth, under GOD, of the Church of England and Ireland the Supreme Head, and Sovereign of the most Noble Order of the Garter: And with that he cried, VIVE LE NOBLE ROY EDWARD; and the rest of the Officers of Arms cried the same three several times after him.

Then the Trumpets sounded with great Melody and Courage, to the Comfort of all them that were there present.

(k) This Verbatim from Hollingshed: But both he and our Author must be warily understood here; so as not to mean that the Earl was removed from being a Privy Counsellor, but from the Authority he had at the Board before: For this Earl was not removed from being a Counsellor till the 4th of the King at Candlemas, when he and the Earl of Arundel were both put out, as Hollingshed himself writes. What the Crime of the Lord Chancellor was, and the Proceedings thereupon, may be seen at large in Bishop Burnet's History of the Reformation; the Account wherof he seems to have from the Council Book.

Ann 1547. good Thing is not good, if it be immoderately desired or done. (1)

His Courage.

His Courage did appear in the great Delight he took in Representations of Battels, Skirmishes, Assaults, and of all kind of Military Exercises; his Judgment was great, either for Errors, or fine Contrivances in the Field: And no Actions of Arms were executed in his Time, but he would perfectly understand by what Advantages on the one side, or Oversights on the other, the Event succeeded. He took great Pleasure in Exercises of Activity, whereto he much trained his Servants; and to that end he often appointed Challenges among them, for Wrestling, Leaping, Running, Riding, Shooting at Rovers and at Rounds, and such like Games; and at Riding and Shooting would sometimes be of one of the Sides. He had 100 Archers of his ordinary Guard, who once mustering before him, shot two Arrows every Man together through an Inch Board of well-season'd Timber: All stroke through the Board, and their Arrows stuck in another Board behind; and divers peared both the Boards generally. None might be of his Guard but besides of tall and comely Stature, such as were either good Archers or Wrestlers, or Casters of the Bar, or Leapers or Runners, or of some other Man-like Quality. He was exceeding skilful in Fortifications; and bestowed great Cost in strengthening Calais, Berwick, and other Parts thereabout. He knew all the principal Ports in England, Scotland, Ireland, France, and other Countries not far distant, how they lay, when the Tide served, what Vessels of Burthen they could receive, and what Winds served for Entrance.

His Care and Knowledge of Affairs of State.

Touching his Care and Knowledge in Affairs of State, nothing was more conspicuous in him. He was much conversant amongst his Council, and could well understand what Matters passed their Judgments, and upon what Grounds. In Matters discoursed by them, he would often encounter their Reasons, and add most lively Reasons of his own; insomuch that at last they made an Order, That no Matters of Weight should be debated, unless he were present. Admirable he was to collect the Speeches and Opinions of many; and to draw their Differences to a true head, always bended himself rather Judiciously to resolve, than by Doubts and Distinctions to perplex a Business. He had a Chest, whereof he always carried the Key about him, for keeping Record of such Matters as were concluded by his Council: And embracing Business for part of his Solace, he appointed set Times with Dr. Cox, Master of his Requests, for speeding poor Mens Causes, without tedious Attendance or Delay. Of all the Magistrates, Justices, and Gentlemen of Sort, within his Realm, he knew their Names, their Housekeeping, their Religion, and Manner of Life. He was skilful in the Exchange beyond the Seas, and in all the Circumstances and Practices thereof; and so was he both skilful and provident in Matters of the Mint at home. To Ambassadors he would give Answer upon the suddain, and touch both orderly and fully upon every Part of their Orations, to the Delight and Admiration of all the Hearers. He much frequented Sermons, and penned Notes with his own Hand; his Notes he cypher'd with Greek Characters, to the end that they who waited on him should not read them. His Disports were ingenuous and man-like, whereby he always learned somewhat. And yet, as well from these as his Businesses of State, he daily reserved some Hours for his private Studies and Exercises with his Teachers. These Endeavours fell upon so excellent a Capacity, that in every short Distance of Time he made incredible Encrease both in Learning and Experience of Affairs, and consequently in Love of all Men.

His Sports.

His Studies.

Presently after that he was settled in his Government, Dr. Wotton the King's Ambassador, Resident with the Queen Dowager of Hungary, Regent of the Low Countries under the Emperor, was discharged of that Attendance, and addressed to the Emperor's Court, there to reside Ambassador for the King, instead of Dr. Bonner Bishop of London and of Sir Francis Bryan, who were called home. He was furnished with Instructions, that being first informed from the former Ambassadors, as well of the general State of the Emperor's Court, as of such particular Intelligences as might serve to advance the King's Intentions, he should deal with the Emperor to declare all Scots for his Enemies, except such as should be Friends to the King, which should appear by his safe Conduct: That because it had been agreed between the Emperor and the late King of England, that the Year next ensuing they should with Joint-Forces, invade the Territories of the French King, he should move the Emperor to advise of some Order and Form for those Proceedings: That whereas the Duke of Lorraine had been late before at the Emperor's Court, and made some Overture for Peace or Truce between the Emperor and the French King, he should be informed by Sir Francis Bryan of the whole State of that Business, and wait Opportunity to put the Emperor in Remembrance, That it had been covenanted

Dr. Wotton Ambassador with the Emperor.

His Instructions.

(1) This severe Charge laid upon Archbishop Cranmer, a good Man, whether it be true or not, I cannot tell: The King mentioneth nothing of it in his Journal, only that Joan was burnt for her Obstinacy in her Heresy: And the Character here given to the Archbishop is utterly disagreeing to his Temper: For none was more tender of Blood than he; none more pitiful and compassionate: Nor was he a Man of rigorous Methods and violent Courses. Indeed Fox mentions, that the Council put Cranmer upon moving the King to sign the Warrant; which was a Sign he had no great Forwardness to it himself: And, in Obedience to them he did labour with the King about it, and obtained it. And though he did this, it neither argued Violence, nor Importunity for Blood: For as he was not present at her Condemnation, as appears by the Council Book; so he may be concluded thence to have no Desire of this Person's Death. And it was needful at this time, that Protestants should shew that they were no Friends to Heresy; which, it is likely, might have confirmed the Papists to believe they were, if at this Juncture the chief Prelate and Patron of the Protestant Religion should have shewn any Partiality towards such an Heretick. And the Archbishop's Thoughts, I am apt to be believe, were, that this Fear of Death which this Woman saw so near, when the Warrant was signed for her Execution, might serve to reclaim her from her Error, though his and other Learned Mens Reasonings with her, being both ignorant and obstinate, were ineffectual. This seemed fit to be noted here, to vindicate the Chief Instrument of our Reformation, against our Author's Pen, who bore no Good-will to Churchmen.

Anno 1547. between him and the King of England, that neither of them should treat of Peace or Truce with the French King, or any other common Enemy, without Consent of the other; and that the King of England had well observed that Article, in refusing to give ear to the French Ambassador making Overture for such a Treaty: That whereas it had been agreed between him and the King of England, that either of them should send certain Ships to Sea, well mann'd and apparell'd for Fight, which all that Year had been performed by the King, whereas the Emperor shifted the Default upon his Officers; in case he should not cause the said Navy to be forthwith furnished, he should wait Occasion to sollicite the same. Lastly, That he should carry a nimble Ear, as well touching any Variation in all these Matters, as for other Occurrences in France, Spain, Italy, Almain, and thereof advertise the King.

The King entertains a Treaty with France. But notwithstanding all these Cautions and Preventions of Peace or Truce between the Emperor and the French, the King of England finding the Emperor slow in his Performances, and much suspecting his secret Ends, entertained a Treaty of Peace with France, but secretly and afar off, and to be governed as Occasions should vary; and in regard hereof Agreement was made, That all Ships and Goods which had been surpris'd at Sea by the English upon the French, or by the French upon the English, since the Beginning of that Treaty, should be freely discharged. And albeit the English had great Advantage in Value of Repairs, as being always both more strong and active at Sea; yet the King by his Proclamation commanded, that forthwith Restitution should be made.

Preparations for War with Scotland. Hostility being thus suspended with France, Preparation was made for Wars against Scotland, the Occasion whereof did thus arise:
